The program was sponsored by the Columbia University College Republicans, a five-year-old group that says on its Web site that it has 600 members. Its president, Chris Kulawik, a junior, is described on the site as a "staunch conservative" who "endeavors to attain the cherished title of 'Most Despised Person on Campus.' "

He said he was "very much surprised" by Wednesday night's events.

"We always understood that this is a very left-wing campus," he said. "But to see your peers resort to physical violence because they disagree with you is very frightening."

He said he had been working to ensure there is more campus security next week when his group has three more potentially controversial speakers, including Walid Shoebat, a former P.L.O. member, and Hilmar von Campe, an author who fought for Germany during World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0078467

When asked how he chooses speakers, and whether he tries to stir up controversy, he said he chooses people that his group's members request.

Wei Wei Hsing, 20, is a junior at Columbia and general manager of the Columbia Political Union, which has frequently co-sponsored events with the College Republicans, including a lecture by John Ashcroft last year. She criticized both Mr. Gilchrist's supporters and the protesters for yelling and shouting before the lecture started, setting a tone of intolerance. But she said the controversy simply reflected the political mood. "The polarization of the country in general is reflected in the microcosm of Columbia," she said. "And because people here happen to read the news more, and talk about politics, it's expressed more outwardly."

The Minuteman Project, which calls itself a "citizens' vigilance operation," featured photos, video and news accounts of the Columbia events yesterday on its Web site and said they amounted "a riot."

"At Columbia University free speech took quite the hit," it said. "At an event hosted by the college Republicans at Columbia we were reminded that the left advocates free speech only for those who regurgitate the same tripe that they spew."

Columbia officials said yesterday that while there had been pushing and shoving on stage, as protesters surrounded Mr. Gilchrist and others tried to defend him, there were no reports of injuries.

Mr. Bollinger said he believed that the importance of free speech must be reinforced repeatedly. He said he hoped to do "a number of things" over the next several weeks to accomplish that on campus.

Donna Lieberman, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union, said yesterday, "Academic freedom thrives when all ideas, including racist ideas, have the opportunity to be aired."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Budget Deficit Drops To $250 Billion (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 7, 2006

The federal budget deficit estimate for the fiscal year just completed has dropped to $250 billion, congressional estimators said Friday, as the economy continued to fuel impressive tax revenues.

The Congressional Budget Office's latest estimate is $10 billion below CBO predictions issued in August and well below a July White House prediction of $296 billion.

The improving deficit picture — Bush predicted a $423 billion deficit in his February budget — has been driven by better-than-expected tax receipts, especially from corporate profits, CBO said.

The 2005 deficit registered $318 billion; the record $413 billion deficit was posted in 2004.

At $250 billion, it would be the lowest since the $158 billion figure in 2002, the first deficit following four years of surpluses.

The CBO estimate continues a positive trend on the deficit after a grim deficit performance during President Bush's first term, and comes despite soaring war costs and $50 billion in emergency spending for hurricane relief.

House Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, credited the improving deficit numbers to "a responsible budget blueprint and pro-growth policies," even as Democrats pointed out that at $250 billion, the deficit is still one of the largest in history.

"Though today's estimates for 2006 are not as pessimistic as some earlier estimates, it is clear that the budget remains on the wrong track," said top budget panel Democrat John Spratt Jr. of South Carolina. "The Congressional Budget Office and even the Bush administration are estimating that deficits will be even larger next year."

White House budget chief Rob Portman said the economy's current performance, with the unemployment dropping to 4.6 percent in September and the Dow Jones industrial average hitting record highs this week, provided more evidence that the president's economic policies are working.

"This economy is strong and growing," Portman told reporters at a briefing. "This is a very strong indication that the president's tax relief program is working."

DOJ_NMG_0078468

But when measured against the size of the economy, which is the comparison economists think is most important, the deficit picture looks even better.

At 1.9 percent of gross domestic product, the 2006 deficit registers far below those seen in the 1980s and early 1990s. The modern record of 6 percent of GDP came in 1983 and deficits greater than 4 percent in 1991 and 1992 drove Congress to embark on a 1993 deficit-cutting drive.

Still, the long-term deficit picture remains bleak due to the looming retirement of the Baby Boom generation, which threatens to swamp Social Security and the Medicare health care program for the elderly.

The CBO estimates reflect actual government revenues and expenditures through August and estimates for September. The Treasury and the White House budget office are expected to release official deficit numbers next week.

Tax receipts are up $253 billion, a whopping 12 percent over last year. That's the thirds consecutive year of strong revenue growth after a dismal performance in the early part of the decade. Revenues dropped three years in a row after fiscal 2000 but picked up again in 2004.

Taxes paid quarterly on corporate profits and by wealthier people and small businessmen were especially strong in 2006. Corporate income taxes rose 27 percent over 2005 while nonwithheld receipts increased 19 percent.

In contrast, income taxes and payroll taxes for Social Security, Medicare and unemployment insurance grew by only 7 percent. Critics of GOP economic policies say that's a sign that lower- and middle-income people aren't getting as much of a lift from the current recovery.

"The benefits of the economic expansion have not been equally distributed," said Jim Horney, a budget analysts for the liberal-leaning Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

Budget Deficit Progress Will Be Tough To Sustain (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

THE WHITE HOUSE, eager to share some good news before the November elections, will release next week the final deficit tally for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30. The news will be good: The deficit is likely to come in well below the previous year's $318 billion, perhaps as low as $250 billion if the Congressional Budget Office's guess is right.

That will allow President Bush to boast that he has met his goal of halving the deficit, measured as a share of the gross domestic product, ahead of schedule. "The president's goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009, which drew the scoffs of many, is now likely to be reached before that date," Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, told the Senate Budget Committee the other day, a preview of what's to come next week. There's even talk that the president will set a new headline-grabbing goal: balancing the federal budget by the end of the decade.

That would require a major change in fiscal policy, such as spending cuts or tax increases. Despite the good news about last year -- largely the result of a remarkable 12% surge in tax receipts from individuals and corporations that overwhelmed a nearly 9% increase in spending -- the smart money says the deficit is very likely to get deeper from here. "The world doesn't end, but the deficit goes in the other direction next year," says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former CBO director. Interest rates are rising, adding to the government's annual interest tab. Iraq continues to be costly. The revenue surge already is beginning to fade. And a slowing economy is likely to restrain revenue growth even further. A one-percentage-point drop in economic growth for a full year increases the deficit by about $35 billion.

Pleasant-looking projections that suggest a happier near-term deficit trend obscure two big items: They assume that Congress will resist intense lobbying by the American Medical Association and allow an existing law to take effect that would slice Medicare doctors' fees by 5%. Just delaying the cut by one year would add $11 billion to the deficit over five years. And then there's the pesky Alternative Minimum Tax, which needs another adjustment to stop it from reaching further into the middle class, one that would cost nearly $50 billion a year.

Budget wonks on Capitol Hill fret that these short-term deficit "improvements" will lead their bosses to conclude that they needn't make major changes to Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security spending, thereby precipitating even tougher choices in the future. New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, echoing his predecessor's warnings of a demographic time bomb, said this past week: "At the heart of the choices our elected representatives will have to make...will be an issue of fairness: What responsibility do we, who are alive today, have to future generations?"

DOJ_NMG_0078469

FDA Budget Malnourished (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

A study of ADHD drug risks may be halted as the agency struggles to keep up with demands.

WASHINGTON — When scientific advisors urged the Food and Drug Administration in February to put a strong warning about suspected cardiovascular risks on attention-deficit drugs taken by millions of children and adults, agency officials said more clinical evidence was needed.

Now, the FDA-funded study meant to authoritatively answer questions about the drugs for attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder may be halted in midstream. The reason: The agency doesn't have the money to finish it.

The threat to the study, as revealed in documents and interviews, stems from chronic shortchanging of the nation's drug safety program. It is one symptom of a federal agency increasingly constrained by a budget that has failed to keep up with costs. This crunch is even more dire in the food division, which tries to keep tainted foodstuffs from supermarket shelves.

Even as concerns grow, the agency has budgeted only $1.6 million for such safety studies of medications already on the market, and that number is scheduled to drop to $900,000 in the coming year. Outside experts estimate that the agency needs $20 million to $100 million a year to conduct such studies.

Recently, three former secretaries of Health and Human Services sounded a public alarm about what they saw as a dangerous squeeze on the overall FDA budget. Tommy G. Thompson, who served in President Bush's first term; Donna Shalala, who served under President Clinton; and Louis W. Sullivan, who served under President George H.W. Bush, joined consumer and industry groups in calling on the administration to substantially boost — perhaps double — the agency's $1.5-billion annual budget, which has increased only modestly in recent years.

FDA officials declined to discuss problems with funding for drug safety, saying the issue was under internal review. In a statement, the agency acknowledged that more money was needed for safety and noted that funding to complete the ADHD study had "not yet been identified."

A special fact-finding panel of the Institute of Medicine recently put the troubles in blunt terms in a report that called for significant FDA changes. Funding for drug safety is "especially inadequate [and] resource limitations have hobbled the agency's ability to improve and expand this essential component of its mission," the panel concluded.

FDA officials estimate the study of ADHD medications, including such well-known brands as Ritalin and Adderall, will cost $2 million to $3 million. About $1 million has been committed.

By analyzing the records of thousands of individuals, outside medical researchers have been trying to determine whether the medications predispose patients to heart attacks and sudden death.

Most ADHD drugs are derived from powerful stimulants. They help patients concentrate, but they also raise blood pressure, a major risk factor for heart disease and stroke. The medications, once given primarily to children, are increasingly prescribed for adults — a population more susceptible to heart problems. About 2.5 million children and 1.5 million adults now take such medications.

"If the FDA lacks the resources to complete the study of cardiovascular risks of ADHD drugs, the consequences can have a profound adverse impact on public health," said Dr. Steven Nissen, chairman of cardiovascular medicine at the Cleveland Clinic.

"The makers of these agents have no incentive to study the hazards of their own drugs. Therefore, the FDA will likely represent the only entity capable of objectively assessing the safety of the ADHD drugs."

The ADHD study is not the only example of a patchwork system.

The FDA bought — at a cost of $500,000 a year — a British database that is considered a state-of-the-art tool for drug safety research.

The General Practice Research Database contains complete medical records on 4 million patients that can be mined for information on reactions to drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0078470

But the FDA has acknowledged that its drug safety office doesn't have enough professionals — epidemiologists, biostatisticians and computer programmers — to take full advantage of the database.

Meanwhile, the 90-person drug safety office is reeling from a surge in reports on medication side effects. The number of such "adverse event" reports jumped from about 250,000 in 2000 to more than 450,000 in 2005.

The trend reflects greater use of prescription drugs, growing awareness of their risks and improvements in the reporting system.

"We have to do difficult triage about which ones we are going to follow up on," said an FDA official closely involved with the agency's budget who asked not to be identified because of the sensitivity of discussions within the Bush administration. "Our funding is just not robust enough for scientific research."

Fully funding the ADHD risk study would mean "we wouldn't be able to do too many other studies," the official added.

The FDA's budget crunch has also hurt its ability to safeguard fresh produce, some critics say. That has become an issue in the aftermath of the E. coli outbreak traced to California spinach. The number of inspectors and field office staffers has been cut from 2,217 in 2003 to about 1,960.

"The agency is like a fire department running around with a little fire extinguisher," said Michael Jacobson, director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a nutrition advocacy group. "The money situation for foods is probably worse than it's ever been."

Earlier this year, the FDA's food division announced that budget pressures had forced cuts in its headquarters workforce from 950 in 2003 to fewer than 850, with further reductions expected.

The FDA has "been presented with unique challenges, and we will not be able to take on the same large number of objectives we have identified in previous years," Robert E. Brackett, director of the food division, wrote in an unusually candid letter to consumer and industry groups. "The challenges are likely to continue [in 2007] and beyond for domestic agencies in the federal government."

The agency's budget challenge has three facets, outside experts and agency officials say.

First, modest annual increases for the FDA have not kept up with escalating salaries for its doctors, pharmacologists, epidemiologists and other professionals. For example, experts in the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research made an average of $70,000 in 1997, but now command salaries of $140,000 to keep up with industry.

A recent internal FDA analysis estimated that the 2006 budget would have needed to be $2.2 billion — not $1.5 billion — just to keep pace with increases in personnel costs.

Second, the post-market drug safety program — with a few exceptions — is not allowed to tap into user fees that pharmaceutical companies pay the agency for the review of proposed new drugs. The user fees add about $400 million a year to the FDA's $1.5-billion budget.

Finally, compared with funding for the National Institutes of Health, which sponsors cutting-edge medical research, securing more money for the FDA has been a low priority for the administration and Congress. The NIH budget has increased from $20.5 billion in 2001 to $28.6 billion.

"There has been a dramatic increase in the attention focused on NIH, and we believe similar attention needs to be given to the FDA," said Sheila Burke, chairwoman of the Institute of Medicine panel that recently reported on drug safety. "The center of that effort has to be an increase in resources. There is no question that it needs to be done."

Meanwhile, despite the uncertainty over funding for the ADHD study, researchers are continuing work on it.

They plan to use several medical databases to try to address three key issues: whether there is a link between ADHD drugs and higher rates of heart attack and sudden death in children; whether such a risk exists for adults; and whether there is a link between ADHD drugs and heart-rhythm abnormalities in children.

They have designed the study, but without more money won't be able to determine whether these popular drugs can lead to heart attacks.

"That's a very important question," said Laurel Habel, an epidemiologist at the Kaiser Foundation Research Institute in Oakland, which is participating in the study.

DOJ_NMG_0078471

"These drugs are being prescribed for a large and growing number of children, and they are also being prescribed to a growing number of adults. And, in general, they are medications that are taken for the long term."

ricardo.alonso-zaldivar@
latimes.com

President Bush To Honor His Father At Ship Christening (VAPILOT)

By Jon Glass

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 7, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS - Today's christening of the aircraft carrier George H.W. Bush may be wet and windy, but workers building the $6 billion warship say they'll be shining.

"This will be a national asset, and I take a lot of pride in that," said Kevin Green, a construction superintendent at Northrop Grumman Newport News, on Friday afternoon. "This is our moment as a company to show off - this is our ship right now."

The massive gray CVN-77 towered 20 stories behind Green as work crews in hard hats and storm gear made final preparations for today's 10 a.m. ceremony in chilly, wind-driven rain. The National Weather Service forecast calls for light rain and 15 to 20 mph northerly winds this morning.

"It's going to be a wonderful day, regardless," said Scott Stabler, vice president of the company's CVN-77 program. "There are a handful of truly great days in shipbuilding, and the christening is one of them."

President Bush will give the keynote address in honor of his father, the carrier's namesake and the nation's 41st president, who will be present.

Construction on the ship, which began in 2001, is about 60 percent completed and is slated for delivery to the Navy in late 2008. The christening is open to the public.

Mr. Fixit (NYT)

By Jacob Heilbrunn

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

One of George W. Bush's most remarkable accomplishments has been to burnish the reputations of his Republican predecessors. The longer Bush is in office, the better they look by comparison. Even realist foreign policy doctrine, revered by Richard Nixon and George H. W. Bush and scorned for decades by the right as a synonym for pusillanimity, has begun to make something of a comeback within the ranks of the party, as William F. Buckley Jr. and George F. Will, among others, look askance at the neoconservative crusade that has issued in the Iraq imbroglio.

It would hardly be surprising if James A. Baker III felt a certain measure of vindication about this unexpected turn of events. Though the ruthlessly efficient Baker preserved — or, if you prefer, secured — Bush's victory in Florida during the contentious 2000 presidential election, he has always been condemned by the right as a moderate. Like many officials from the first Bush administration, including the former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft, Baker was exiled to the sidelines as the younger Bush embraced the right. Unlike Scowcroft, however, Baker has maintained a studied silence about the current Bush administration.

That doesn't change in " 'Work Hard, Study ... and Keep Out of Politics!' " (written with Steve Fiffer). Anyone looking for yet another Republican apostate to denounce Bush should look elsewhere. But there's no need to worry: the stiletto once wielded so deftly by Baker in Washington has not gone dull. Baker, who has already discussed the end of the cold war in an earlier book called "The Politics of Diplomacy," here offers a more personal account that implicitly contrasts the past with the present, and is the more telling for its restraint. He focuses on his years as a political operative and official in the Ford, Reagan and Bush 1 administrations to draw lessons about the importance of planning ahead in running political campaigns and governments. Though his memoir may at some points envelop the Reagan years in a nostalgic haze, it provides an extraordinarily illuminating account of the decades-old Republican feud between old-money power brokers and true believers. Ultimately, it shows how he successfully kept the right in check — and what happens when someone doesn't.

Baker's pragmatic approach can probably be traced to the fact that money, not the political barricades, was what always interested his forebears: the title of his memoir was the motto of James Addison Baker, his grandfather and the family patriarch, who ran a law firm in Houston and helped transform that city into the capital of the American oil industry. The young Baker dutifully followed in the legal footsteps of his elders, but after the sudden death of his first wife, he was eager for a distraction. In 1970, he dropped out of the Democratic Party and signed on with the Republicans in order to join his longtime tennis doubles partner's campaign for the United States Senate. It failed, but "from that time forward," Baker writes, "I was hooked on politics and forever linked with the candidate, George Herbert Walker Bush." Baker, who chafed at continuing to work as a corporate lawyer, didn't get his big break until 1975, when Bush helped him land his first Washington job as under secretary of commerce in the Ford administration. Soon enough, the political smarts Baker displayed in dealing with unions and trade issues caught the eye of the White House, which tapped him to lead the hunt for swing delegates during the 1976 Republican primary fight against Ronald Reagan, who depicted Gerald Ford and Henry Kissinger as soft on the Red menace.

DOJ_NMG_0078472

Baker sent out biographical questionnaires to the delegates and relentlessly stalked the uncommitteds, convinced "the contest would go to the outfit that did the best job of corralling its own herd while picking off strays from the other side." He picked them off. A grateful Ford promoted Baker to run his campaign against Jimmy Carter, but no amount of political savvy could rescue Ford from his serial self-inflicted wounds.

When Bush ran for the Republican presidential nomination in 1980, Baker was in his element. As his campaign manager, Baker drew on a network of contacts to raise money and, in an imitation of the 1976 Carter strategy, plotted to reduce the cluttered field to Reagan versus Bush as rapidly as possible. He succeeded. By sending out one million pieces of mail in the final week before the Iowa caucuses and making thousands of telephone calls, Baker outfoxed the Reagan forces, allowing Bush to score an upset victory. "Hell," said Charles Black, a Reagan political operative, "I didn't know it was gonna be a primary." But the tidal wave of the resurgent right soon washed over the Bush forces, and Bush's only political life preserver was to accept Reagan's offer of the vice-presidential nomination. It was a telling moment. Where Dwight Eisenhower had deigned to offer the vice presidency to Richard Nixon, now the right was the master and the Eastern Establishment the supplicant.

Still, Baker, against all the odds, managed to insinuate himself into the Reagan camp by offering unsolicited advice about the coming election to Reagan's campaign manager, William Casey, and to the Gipper himself. Even though Baker had led primary battles against him, Reagan recognized his talents and named him White House chief of staff. The right was apoplectic: it accused Baker of being a Trojan horse for the Eastern Establishment and of selling out its social agenda on abortion, school prayer and other hot-button issues. Baker knows better: he quotes Reagan as telling him, "Jim, I'd rather get 80 percent of what I want than to go over the cliff with my flag flying." Together with Michael Deaver and Ed Meese, Baker formed a "troika" that exercised firm control. According to him, this system gave Reagan "a functional administrative system to keep things moving, plus a useful way to hear competing views on important issues."

It was no accident that after Baker left to head the Treasury Department, Reagan's second term almost ended in disaster. Had Baker remained in the White House and become national security adviser, he would have unquestionably quashed the cabal that ended up hijacking Central American and Middle Eastern policy. Reagan wrote in his memoir, "My decision not to appoint Jim Baker as national security adviser, I suppose, was a turning point for my administration, although I had no idea at the time how significant it would prove to be." Instead, the lunatics took charge of the asylum, dragging a befuddled Reagan into the arms-for-hostages deal, which turned into the Iran-contra affair — a reckless endeavor prefiguring, in many ways, the ideological zealotry that, on a far grander scale, has mired the United States in Iraq.

As George H. W. Bush's secretary of state, Baker remained the object of the right's ire. Bush's refusal to continue on to Baghdad, reluctance to intervene in Bosnia and criticism of Israel were laid at the doorstep of realists like Baker, whose record was, in truth, not unblemished. Baker's realpolitik could curdle into cynical indifference when it came to the Balkans. But there is a difference between making mistakes and wholesale ineptitude. Only recently has George W. Bush reached out to Baker, acceding to his appointment as co-chairman of a high-level nonpartisan commission on Iraq. By now, however, it's unlikely that even this faithful retainer can once more pull Bush's chestnuts out of the fire.

Kicked While Down (NYT)

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078473

In a blow to labor unions, the National Labor Relations Board recently expanded the pool of workers exempted from union membership. Specifically, the labor board found that registered nurses who assigned others to some shifts or tasks were supervisors, and thus not eligible to join unions. It was a bad decision, not only because of the specifics of the case, but also in its broader ramifications.

There are good reasons to bar managers from unionizing. It is extremely difficult to run a large organization efficiently if the people at the top are unable to easily hold their managers accountable for overall success or failure. But responsibilities like making out a schedule do not amount to management. If they did, interns would be the only non- managers in many of today's workplaces.

Companies facing unionization drives have long found it convenient to discover that employees who are basically rank-and-file workers are actually managers. That seems to be the case with the nurses. The board's decision opens the door for possibly millions of health-care workers and other professionals to be disqualified from the option of union protection.

This is one more step curbing the power of organized labor since President Bush came to office. The administration's philosophical vendetta against unions has come at a time when their power is already on the wane. Membership has fallen to 7.8 percent of the private work force in this country, from over a third in the 1950's. Far from balancing the scales, the anti-union drive comes when workers are already at a historic low in bargaining strength. Despite a growing economy and rising productivity, hourly wages adjusted for inflation have declined 2 percent since 2003. Corporate profits, meanwhile, are at their highest share of gross domestic product since the 1960's.

We are getting closer and closer to a work force with no benefits and no substantive protections. Some unions succumbed to corruption and contributed to their own decline. But their role in giving common workers a voice is essential to a functioning society.

The Kennedy Court? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

The Roberts Court started its second term this week, but to read the coverage you might think that the nine-member Supreme Court has been reduced to Justice Anthony Kennedy's single vote.

Of course, Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts are the new members, and it remains to be seen how they'll vote on some of the hot-button issues the court will hear this term. But in replacing Sandra Day O'Connor and William Rehnquist on the court, Messrs. Roberts and Alito have thrust Justice Kennedy onto center-stage, as he now stands squarely between the four liberal and four conservative Justices on a number of issues. We had a foretaste of this last term, with Justice Kennedy playing kingmaker in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld and Rapanos v. U.S. In both cases, the vote was effectively 4-1-4, with Justice Kennedy controlling the outcome and muddying the jurisprudence.

Hamdan dealt with the design of military commissions for trying detainees in the war on terror. Justice Kennedy mostly sided with the liberal minority in the case, turning the liberal bloc into a Kennedian majority and forcing Congress to write a set of rules by which some detainees may soon, finally, be tried. In Rapanos, an environmental-regulation case, Justice Kennedy more or less sided with the conservatives on the Court, but on idiosyncratic grounds that caused the Chief Justice to lament the resulting muddle.

It's unlikely we've seen the last one-man majority from Justice Kennedy. This possibility is not lost on the political left, which explains the current publicity given to Justice Kennedy's role. The hope seems to be that Justice Kennedy can be conditioned with carrots and sticks to make him the next Blackmun or Souter -- earning praise for his "moderation" if he votes with the liberal wing, but earning obloquy if he tacks right.

Thus, we can expect a good deal of hand-wringing about whether Justice Kennedy will take an "activist" view in the partial-birth abortion case docketed for November. Here the Court will weigh the constitutionality of the 2003 Partial-Birth Abortion Act. In 2000, the Court struck down a Nebraska law banning partial-birth abortions by a 5-4 vote. Justice Kennedy vigorously dissented from that decision, writing that the majority had misinterpreted Planned Parenthood v. Casey, the 1992 decision that Justice Kennedy helped write. This would seem to offer Justice Kennedy a clear rationale for upholding the federal ban on partial-birth abortions, which may be why pundits are already wondering aloud whether Justice Kennedy will adhere to his "strong respect for stare decisis."

DOJ_NMG_0078474

In December the court will hear two consolidated race-related cases; both deal with the use of race in assigning public-school students to classrooms. In the 2003 University of Michigan affirmative-action cases, Sandra Day O'Connor cast the deciding votes. The Court upheld the Michigan law school's racial-preference program. Justice Kennedy dissented from that decision, but did so on the grounds that the decision didn't give judges adequate authority to review racial-preference programs in the future. Given this judicial-supremacist line of reasoning, it is difficult to know how Justice Kennedy will approach the racial-preference cases the Court will hear this term.

What is clear is that Justice Kennedy enjoys being in the position of he who decides. It seems this term will offer him ample scope to play Solomon. The problem with this "swing-vote" theory is that it trivializes the Court into a results-based political body when there are real judicial disputes to settle. The Court would be best helped if Justice Kennedy pointed it toward clarity rather than judicial confusion.

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Job Numbers Remain Strong (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Unemployment went down and paychecks went up last month, the government said yesterday, and it added that job growth for the year ending in March may have been far stronger than previously thought.

The announcements were greeted warmly by the White House -- and less so by the financial markets. Stock and bond prices fell amid fears the tight job market, by adding to inflation, will compel the Federal Reserve to hold interest rates steady or even raise them to slow economic growth. Many traders had convinced themselves that the Fed would cut rates early next year, but that looks increasingly unlikely.

President Bush traveled yesterday to a FedEx sorting facility to tout the job numbers and the rest of the Republican economic record a month before congressional elections.

"I'm pleased with the economic progress we're making," he said as other White House representatives used multiple briefings and statements to highlight yesterday's news.

The Labor Department's employment report -- and other figures released last week -- depict an economy that remained generally healthy in September outside of the slumping housing market. Workers found jobs and got paid more, while consumers hit the stores and auto showrooms to spend some of the extra cash gained from falling gasoline prices.

The unemployment rate fell to 4.6 percent in September from 4.7 percent in August, which was down from 4.8 percent in July. The jobless rate has varied from 4.6 to 4.8 percent all year. Considering that a few workers have such poor skills as to be nearly unemployable, many economists consider a rate below 5 percent to constitute full employment, meaning just about every worker with the skills and desire to work can find a job.

Demand for labor helped drive workers' average hourly wages, not including those of most managers, up to $16.84 last month. That's a 4 percent increase from September 2005, the fastest wage growth in more than five years.

But other details in the Labor report bolstered some economists' expectations that unemployment will rise as the housing downturn drags on, cooling economic growth to a below-average pace for many months.

The number of jobs on employers' payrolls rose only slightly in September, as employers turned more cautious in their hiring. Retailers, temporary employment agencies and manufacturers cut nearly as many jobs as other employers added. And a measure of the number of hours worked across the country slipped slightly last month, as it did the month before -- a tentative sign of softening labor demand.

The major stock indicators all fell yesterday, with analysts seeing the weak job growth as further evidence that economic growth is slowing while inflation pressures remain high. The Dow Jones industrial average, which had hit new records on three consecutive days last week, lost 16.48 points yesterday, or 0.14 percent, to close at 11,850.21.

DOJ_NMG_0078475

The report reflects "an economy with a solid labor force," said Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research Corp. But with low unemployment and rising wages, he said, "there's simply no way you can paint this report other than inflationary."

The Bush administration emphasized the positive. The president's advisers have been frustrated that he gets little credit for an economy that remains healthy by many measures. Just 39 percent of those questioned in the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll in August approved of Bush's handling of the economy, compared with 59 percent who disapproved.

"This economy is strong and growing," White House budget director Rob Portman said during a meeting with reporters. "The president's pro-growth policies, including the tax relief, are working."

Democrats rejected the administration effort as spin. "Under their economic policies, the rich are getting richer, the poor are getting poorer and the middle class is getting squeezed," Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement. "President Bush may be 'pleased' with what his economy has done, but hard-working families know America needs a new direction."

Bush decided to highlight economic issues yesterday by spending part of his morning at the FedEx facility in Northeast Washington. He conducted an hour-long roundtable with business executives who described how they got started, and he used their stories to emphasize his tax cuts and other initiatives.

Bush also said he sees increasing protectionism and isolationism among the American people. When Clifton Broumand, who owns a Maryland company that makes keyboards and computer mice, complained that China rips off designs for his products, Bush shared the lament. "This is the problem," the president said.

Democrats sought to shift attention to slowing economic growth, which has cooled from a torrid 5.6 percent annual rate in the first three months of the year to a pace closer to 2 percent in the second half of the year, by many estimates.

"Slower economic growth is taking its toll on job creation," declared Jack Reed (R.I.), the ranking Senate Democrat on Congress's Joint Economic Committee.

Though unemployment dipped, yesterday's data showed that employers added just 51,000 new jobs in September, a negligible number in an economy with 135.6 million payroll workers.

Labor analysts also released a preliminary finding that the economy may have added 810,000 more jobs than previously tallied in the 12 months that ended in March. If that estimate holds, it would mark a much bigger revision than usually occurs during a lengthy process of gathering information from unemployment insurance filings. And it would help explain why tax revenue surged so unexpectedly this spring and why consumer spending has held steady even as the cooling housing market has slowed the nation's economic growth.

The employers that added jobs last month included doctor's offices, hospital, insurers, lenders, restaurants and businesses that needed accountants and managers.

Employment related to housing has flattened, according to the Economic Policy Institute, which focuses on labor issues. Last year, housing-related industries -- construction, real estate and lending -- added 321,000 jobs, according to the institute's calculations. This year, they've added 6,000.

Another sign of potential weakness is the continuing decline in temporary service agency jobs, which have fallen by 36,000 since December. Employers tend to add temps as the economy gains momentum, waiting to see if the growth continues before adding permanent employees. Conversely, during a slowdown, "when layoffs may become necessary, the contract or temp workers are the first out the door," said Ray Stone, of Stone & McCarthy Research Associates.

US Labour Market Tighter Than Estimated (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington And Daniel Pimlott, Michael Mackenzie And Richard Beales In New York

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

The US economy added many more jobs than previously estimated in the later stages of the current cycle, dramatic new data revealed on Friday, raising the prospect that the labour market today may also be tighter than previously thought.

According to the new figures, the economy added 810,000 more jobs than earlier estimated between April 2005 and March 2006, an average of 67,500 more jobs every month over that period.

DOJ_NMG_0078476

The upward revision – the biggest in a quarter of a century – casts the expansion in a new light, leaving it less "jobless" than before, though the rate of job creation since the 2001 recession remains low by historic standards.

Friday's employment report also showed the unemployment rate fell from 4.7 per cent to 4.6 per cent in September.

The latest non-farm payroll numbers offered a mixed picture, with only 51,000 jobs added in September – well short of analysts' estimates of about 125,000 – but a combined 61,000 upward revision for July and August.

The job market data sent stocks and bonds lower as the signs of unexpectedly high employment outweighed the weak headline growth in September.

Meanwhile, the Congressional Budget Office announced that it was cutting its estimate for the federal budget deficit by another $10bn to $250bn, down from $318bn the previous year.

Bush administration economic officials seized on the jobs and deficit numbers to try to draw political debate away from the scandal in Congress on to the economy ahead of mid-term elections next month.

"We now find we created not 5.7m new jobs but 6.6m new jobs since August 2003," Rob Portman, director of the office of management and budget, said on Friday. "That happens to be about the time when the president's tax relief was fully implemented."

Mr Portman said the official figures for the deficit, which will be announced next week, will also be better than forecast in July, with tax revenues higher than their historic average of 18.2 per cent of gross domestic product. Some analysts said that the employment report vindicated the Federal Reserve's continued focus on inflation in spite of signs of slowing economic growth in the US.

"A few key aspects of the report are strong and will add to fears that labour market resources are tight and will keep the pressure on the Fed to err on the side of tightening," said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Hourly wages rose by 0.2 per cent, bringing the year-on-year increase to 4.0 per cent.

"The 810,000 upward revision was far larger than typical, and implies an increment of almost 70,000 to monthly payroll gains in the year ending in March," said Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America.

Joshua Shapiro, chief US economist at MFR, said the revisions pointed to "a much more vibrant labour market in the not too distant past than had been reported earlier".

Stocks were lower on the news after three days of multi-year highs. Treasuries also fell on fears the report made it less likely the Fed would cut rates next year.

"The bond market was looking for further signs of moderation and didn't get it," said Kevin Flanagan, fixed income strategist at Morgan Stanley.

He said the upward revisions and wage growth did not support the market perception the Fed could cut rates soon.

But other economists questioned the reliability of the data.

"We are skeptical, given the quality of the data," said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics.

The US jobs report also indicated that people evacuated as a result of Hurricane Katrina are still struggling to find work a year on.

The unemployment rate for evacuees was 8.3 per cent in September.

But the rate was much higher for evacuees who were not living in their old homes.

Job Growth Was Slack Last Month (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

For American workers, the job market is starting to look a lot less inviting.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that employment grew by just 51,000 jobs in September, adding slack job growth to the emerging tableau of an economy gradually slowed by higher interest rates, expensive energy and a sputtering housing sector.

DOJ_NMG_0078477

In the last three years, the American economy has added about six million jobs. Unemployment, which dipped to 4.6 percent last month, has fallen to the lowest point since early 2001. And in recent months, the wages of ordinary workers have finally started to increase enough to slightly outpace inflation.

But the new government data, said Joseph LaVorgna, chief United States economist at Deutsche Bank, suggests that "the best news on job creation is behind us."

The payroll growth recorded in September — culled from a survey of some 300,000 businesses that is seasonally adjusted in an effort to factor out normal variations — was the weakest since October of last year. And even though job growth for the previous two months was revised up significantly, it now appears that payroll growth has decelerated sharply.

From March 2005 through March 2006, according to new information from the Labor Department, job growth averaged 236,000 a month. For the last three months, it has averaged just 121,000.

Analysts said the downshift puts the Federal Reserve and its chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, in a good position to keep interest rates steady.

"The slowdown the Fed wants to engineer is clearly in the data," said Robert J. Barbera, chief economist of ITG Hoenig. "This is just what the doctor ordered if the doctor is Ben Bernanke."

Still, the job market may not be quite as weak as the monthly number suggested. Not only did unemployment — based on a separate survey of households that showed more robust employment gains — fall slightly to 4.6 percent from 4.7 percent in August, but paychecks also recorded some of their biggest gains so far this year.

Hourly wages for regular workers, excluding managers, rose 4 percent in September compared with a year earlier. This was the same as in August but higher than any other month since June 2001 —when workers were still benefiting from inertial wage gains coming out of the Internet-fueled economy of the late 1990's.

The mixed signals left financial markets divided, with the bond market falling while stocks mostly treaded water.

Contributing to the confusion was an unusually large annual revision of payrolls, with the Labor Department now saying that it had undercounted employment growth by 810,000 jobs from March 2005 to March 2006.

In surveying employers in September, though, the government found that most were being much more cautious than earlier in the year.

Health care providers added 24,000 jobs. Hotels and restaurants increased employment by 19,000. Manufacturers cut 19,000 jobs in September; retailers shed 12,000.

And while construction companies unexpectedly added 8,000 jobs, experts do not think they will be hiring much in the future, and many may soon be shedding workers.

"It's going to be a teeter-totter," said Kenneth Simonson, chief economist of the Associated General Contractors of America. "I would expect construction growth over the next 12 months to be minimal, perhaps less than 1 percent."

Over all, the index of total hours worked in the private sector, the broadest measure of demand for labor, declined from 105.1 to 105.0 in September. But some economists, looking at other evidence like healthy consumer spending and the recent decline in gasoline prices, predicted that the current slowdown in employment will not last.

"If you were a lawyer, you would have no problem prosecuting this for reasonable doubt," said John Ryding, chief United States economist at Bear Stearns. "I would prosecute that any day."

He added that he expected the tight job market to put further pressure on the Fed to raise interest rates again soon.

President Bush pointed to the decline in unemployment as evidence that his economic policies are working, urging Congress to extend his tax cuts beyond their planned expiration at the end of the decade.

"Today we got more good news," President Bush said in a speech at a Federal Express operation in Washington. "I'm pleased with the economic progress we're making."

Still, most economists see a slowing economy taking its toll on hiring, with many now predicting that the Fed's next interest rate movement will be down, as it moves next year to try to revive growth.

"The Fed now has less justification to raise interest rates in the future," said Anthony Chan, chief economist at J. P. Morgan Private Client Services.

DOJ_NMG_0078478

Mr. Bernanke, in a speech in New York on Wednesday, said that he also foresaw slower growth. He predicted that the falloff in the housing market would shave output in the second half of the year by about one percentage point.

By and large, economists are not uncomfortable with the gradual deceleration of economic growth recorded to far. "The trend doesn't appear to be that alarming at all," Mr. Chan said.

But the changing condition of the labor market may not be so benign for workers. "The data is consistent with stable to modestly rising unemployment," Mr. Barbera said. "Roughly 4.5 percent unemployment is as tight as it's going to get. I see no obvious additional increases in workers' bargaining power."

Sluggish Job Growth Could Affect Elections (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. economy added a disappointing 51,000 jobs last month, the government said Friday, and although hiring in July and August was revised sharply higher, lackluster employment growth is still expected to dog Republicans in upcoming midterm elections.

The economy is slowing from last year's pace but has proven to be resilient, weathering a housing slowdown while providing modest wage gains in recent months. Falling energy prices have also helped. On Friday, investors pushed up bond yields, signaling faith that the economy won't slow as much as they once believed.

But President Bush and his party have struggled to capitalize on such gains, analysts and polls say. Even with the Federal Reserve pausing its campaign to raise interest rates, Republicans face voters worried about jobs and the possibility of a recession.

As a result, Republicans could lose several seats in both houses of Congress, analysts say.

"There's an uncomfortable problem for Republicans right now — which is the economy is headed toward slower growth in response to Federal Reserve policy," said Kevin Hassett, director of economic policy studies at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

"The economy has been doing well in recent years and Republicans may not have received enough credit, but that's all going to become irrelevant in November because we're getting all this disappointing data," Hassett said.

Analysts had expected 120,000 new jobs for September, and instead saw the slowest monthly job growth since October 2005, according to data from the Labor Department on Friday.

The economy has added an average 137,000 jobs a month this year versus 165,000 last year. Employment grew 1.2% this year, down from 1.5% last year and 1.6% in 2004, according to the Labor Department.

Offsetting the disappointing September data were revised Labor Department figures showing that 188,000 new jobs were added in August, 60,000 more than originally reported. July hiring was also revised higher by 2,000 jobs, to 123,000. That brought the average monthly jobs gains to 121,000 this quarter.

The Labor Department also revised upward by 810,000 its estimate of the number of new jobs added in the 12 months ended in March, bringing that period's monthly average up to 200,000. A final estimate is expected in February.

The unemployment rate fell to 4.6% in September from 4.7% in August.

Some analysts pointed to September wage gains as a sign of increasing economic strength. Average hourly and weekly earnings rose 0.2% last month, and both are up 4% for the year. Analysts said that could lead to wage gains beating inflation if oil prices don't rise again soon.

"There are risks to the economy going forward, but I don't think this particular report shows risks," said Ethan Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Bros. in New York. "I think this shows an economy that's doing well."

Still, Democrats continued to seize on sluggish job creation and wage gains. Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), ranking Democrat on the congressional Joint Economic Committee, released a statement Friday berating the administration for creating fewer jobs than in past recoveries.

"Job growth has been quite modest and wages have not kept pace with high energy prices and soaring healthcare costs," Reed wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0078479

Bush touted Friday's job numbers during a morning visit to a FedEx Corp. office at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., and deployed Cabinet members to spread the message nationwide.

"Wages are going up, energy prices are falling, which means people are going to have more money in their pocket to save, invest or spend," Bush said.

Californians were almost evenly divided on the economy in the coming year, with 45% expecting good times, 43% expecting bad times and 12% undecided, according to a poll released last week by the nonpartisan Public Policy Institute of California in San Francisco. Likely voters were more optimistic: 48% expected good times ahead; 40%, bad times; and 12% undecided.

One reason for increased consumer confidence may be lower gasoline prices, which dropped to a national average of $2.31 this week, according to the Energy Department.

"The easing of gas prices is one of those signals in the economy that tells people they don't have to worry about inflation and rising prices as much as they might have been feeling," said Mark Baldassare, the institute's research and survey director.

Homeowners who have seen the value of their homes double in recent years have reason to feel encouraged too, said Dean Baker, co-director of the left-leaning Center for Economic and Policy Research in Washington. Employment was up last month in construction, and the sector added 36,000 jobs during the last three months. Real estate held steady, employing 2.1% more workers than this time last year.

But homeowners who have borrowed heavily against their homes now worry that, as housing sales and starts fall, prices will nose-dive, Baker said. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke warned earlier this week that housing is likely to undergo a "substantial correction."

"Certainly in large chunks of the country — the East Coast, California, Florida, Seattle — housing has been going up and now that they see a turn. That has to be kind of scary," Baker said. "People's confidence about the future is limited. We've sort of been treading water but there's a lot of bad signs on the horizon."

Manufacturing and retail both shed jobs last month: 19,000 in manufacturing, including 3,800 at textile mills, and 11,900 in retail. Manufacturing has lost 12% of its workforce during the last year.

Harris, the Lehman Bros. analyst, predicts that the economy will weather the housing slump and add an average 100,000 jobs a month during the next year, growing at an annual rate of 2.5% during the next three to four quarters as it coasts toward the Fed's intended soft landing. The economy grew 2.6% in the second quarter after posting a 5.6% rate in the first three months.

On Friday, Harris joined the consensus among analysts, who expect the Fed to pause again at its next meeting Oct. 24 to see how much the economy is slowing, rather than raise interest rates to combat signs of wage inflation in the jobs report.

"They've got a tough choice" between fighting inflation and preventing a recession, Harris said. "You can't fight both wars at the same time."

molly.hennessy-fiske@latimes
.com

Jobs Report Shows A Mixed Picture (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

Job creation sputtered in September, in a sign that the economy is cooling, but other data suggested that the labor market is still producing enough jobs to boost wages.

The Labor Department Friday released the mixed data, which economists said made any interest-rate changes by the Federal Reserve unlikely before year's end. Speaking ahead of congressional elections next month, Bush administration officials said the figures pointed to a healthy economy.

Payrolls of nonfarm employers increased by 51,000 in September after a gain of 188,000 in August, according to the data. Last month's tepid pace of hiring -- the weakest since the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina last fall -- is fresh evidence that the economy is still slowing under the weight of higher interest rates and a weakening housing market.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

DOJ_NMG_0078480

1

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez2 comments on the jobs data and the state of the economy.

President Bush speaks3 on the new economic data, stressing that entrepreneurs are helped low taxes and intellectual property rights.

Journal reporter Lee Hawkins says4 that one of the reasons for disappointing September job numbers are the massive layoffs in the automotive sector.

Council of Economic Advisors chairman Edward Lazear explains5 the revisions in job data, which he says suggest balance and robustness in the economy, including growth in non-residential construction.

DESKTOP NEWS ALERTS

6

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.7

At the same time, though, unemployment dipped to 4.6% in September from 4.7% the previous month. Hourly pay for workers occupying production or nonmanagerial positions rose 0.2%, putting the average hourly wage 4% higher than a year ago.

And revisions of previous data showed that employers added 60,000 more jobs in August than initially estimated. The Labor Department said it expects upcoming revisions to show that the economy created roughly 70,000 more jobs per month in the year that ended in March than initially estimated.

Economists said the latest data suggest that the Federal Reserve is unlikely to change interest rates before year's end. "We continue to see the [Fed] on hold for the time being," said Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America Corp.

The Fed halted its rate-raising campaign in August in hopes of easing inflation through slower economic growth.

A main reason it may not feel the need to raise rates further to stem inflation, besides the recent drop in oil prices, is that wage growth isn't putting the kind of upward pressure on prices that it has in past economic expansions.

"Wage pressures are cresting," said Zoltan Pozsar, an economist at Moody's Economy.com9. He said average hourly earnings expanded at a 4.5% annual rate in the second quarter, but then grew at a slower pace of 3.9% in the third quarter.

Bond investors focused on the upward revisions to earlier months' employment and other signs of job market firmness in the report, and drove down bond prices. As a result, the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.7%.

The decline in the politically prominent unemployment rate, the upward revisions to last year's payrolls and the modest acceleration in wage growth could help the Bush administration's efforts to play up the strengths of the economy heading into next month's congressional elections. "The labor market to my mind is still very tight," Edward Lazear, chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, told reporters Friday.

Mr. Lazear also highlighted that construction employment has held up despite the continuing decline in home building. The Labor Department said employment in residential construction and trade contractors fell by 15,600 jobs last month but rose by 15,800 jobs for nonresidential construction. He said that was evidence that the economy is in transition to greater dependence on business investment and exports, from its reliance on housing and consumer spending. "I like the fact the economy is becoming more balanced," he said.

Employment even picked up at some building-equipment and garden-supply stores last month. Home-improvement chain Lowe's Cos. said it employs 25,000 more workers now than it did a year ago.

Elsewhere, there are signs that the housing slump is hitting the labor market. Wood-product and furniture manufacturers cut a total of 7,700 positions in September and have trimmed jobs compared with a year ago, according to the Labor Department. Real-estate employment has flatlined since June.

Mortgage banking titan Countrywide Financial Corp. said it is in the process of eliminating between 5% and 10% of nonrevenue-generating positions as part of a plan to trim its budget by $500 million this year.

One bright spot for the labor market has been the stock-market rally. Financial-services firms added 16,000 jobs in September and roughly 170,000 positions over the past year, the Labor Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0078481

St. Louis brokerage firm Edward Jones said it hired 289 future investment representatives last month, its second-highest monthly intake ever.

Price Woodward, who oversees recruiting for the company, said Edward Jones increased broker compensation by roughly 25% this year after several years of holding pay steady. The typical first-year broker at the company will earn $54,000 in annual compensation, Mr. Woodward said, although 60% of that is from commissions and bonuses.

Separately, the Federal Reserve said consumer credit rose at a 2.6% annual rate in August against 4.3% in July, another sign of slowing economic activity. The data do not include mortgages.

-- Greg Ip contributed to this article.

Unemployment Falls; Wages Up 4 Percent (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

The nation's unemployment rate fell to 4.6 percent last month, down from 4.7 in August, and average wages rose by 4 percent over the previous year -- the best performance for both measures in five years.

The monthly Labor Department report released yesterday revealed that 51,000 new jobs were reported last month, a disappointing figure, but job gains were stronger than reported earlier for the previous year and a half.

"The economy is actually stronger than these employment numbers suggest," said Bernard Baumohl, executive director of the Economic Outlook Group, a Princeton, N.J., economic-advisory firm. The figures were mixed and elicited widely varying reactions from financial markets and analysts.

The stock market declined after focusing on the weakness in job growth, which was the lowest new-jobs figure since Hurricane Katrina blew a hole in the economy last year, and included sizable job losses in manufacturing and retail trade as factories and stores continued to retrench.

A revision in the number of jobs created in August, to 188,000, and a huge revision adding 810,000 to the number of jobs created between March 2005 and March 2006 sparked fears of inflation in the bond market and suggested an underlying strength in the labor market that is unlikely to dissipate anytime soon.

"At the very least, this shows the soft landing is still on course," Mr. Baumohl said. "There is little to suggest that we are on the precipice of a recession."

Roger M. Kubarych, economist at HVB Group, said the report was "mixed," but the downtrend in job growth is likely to continue this fall and raise further concerns about economic weakness.

"Announced job cuts in the motor vehicles and computer industry will be taking effect in the next few months, so payroll gains will likely subside further," he said. Since workers laid off in those industries tend to be highly paid, their job losses "may temper wage increases" later this year, he said.

Dean Baker, economist with the Center for Economic and Policy Research, said that while the report showed some hidden strengths, the continued addition of jobs in housing-related construction and finance seems unlikely to continue, given the big drops in home sales and mortgage financings in the last year.

"With housing data showing a sharp downturn, it is implausible that employment in the sector will not soon be affected," he said. "Given that employment elsewhere is already weak, when the downturn in the housing-related sectors begins to show up, the prospects for employment will be bleak."

Embattled House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert sought to highlight the good news as he and other Republican leaders struggle to maintain their majority in Congress.

"September's lower unemployment rate, steady job growth and increased hourly earnings comes on the heels of a record-setting week on Wall Street," the Illinois Republican noted.

Peter Morici, a former chief economist at the International Trade Commission, said the Federal Reserve should be pleased with the soft growth shown in the report.

"Subpar jobs-and-wage growth indicates the economy is slowing significantly and underperforming its potential. In the months ahead, loosening labor-market conditions will put a lid on wages and help contain inflation," he said. "Along with lower gasoline and natural-gas prices, modest wage pressures will keep prices in check and the Federal Reserve will have no cause to raise interest rates."

DOJ_NMG_0078482

For workers, the picture is decidedly mixed, Mr. Morici said. Those with more education and skills in professions like health care, finance and information technology have little trouble finding jobs, while those with only a high school education face higher unemployment rates around 6 percent.

Displaced manufacturing workers are having a particularly difficult time, as factories continue to shed jobs despite growth in exports and big-ticket capital goods.

"Had the current economic expansion followed the pattern of past recoveries, 2 million manufacturing jobs would have been regained" instead of lost, he said. The layoffs in manufacturing have been concentrated in the Rust Belt and are having an impact on the upcoming elections.

"Much of the stress in the jobs market falls in contested congressional districts in western Pennsylvania, New York and the lower Midwest," he said. "This combination of economics and geography explains why Republicans are in danger of losing control of the House of Representatives."

Shares Rest After A Record Week (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

Wall Street ended a record-breaking week quietly yesterday, edging lower after the Labor Department said employers added far fewer jobs than expected last month. The major indexes all scored big gains for the week.

While the jobs report gave investors further confirmation that the economy was slowing — employers created just 51,000 new jobs last month, well off the 120,000 Wall Street expected — the market is now concerned that the economy might be moderating too much.

Even the prospect of a rate cut by the Federal Reserve came as little comfort yesterday.

“We’ve had a market that wants to see bad news as good news with respect to the Fed,” said Bryan Piskorowski, a market analyst at Wachovia Securities. Now, he said, the economy is slowing, the housing market is slowing, and consumer spending is starting to slow. “You run that tight wire where bad news eventually becomes bad news,” he said.

Investors concerned about the jobs report yesterday were also disappointed by news of the resignation of a General Motors board member who had lobbied unsuccessfully for an alliance with other automakers.

Still, hopes for a Fed rate cut as well as a further decline in oil prices helped drive the Dow Jones industrial average to three consecutive record closes this week. The blue chips also set new intraday highs. Broader indexes showed robust gains, though remained well below their records.

The Dow fell 16.48 points, or 0.14 percent, to 11,850.21 yesterday, slightly below the record close of 11,866.69 set the day before. For the week, the Dow was up 1.47 percent.

Broader stock indicators also fell yesterday. The Standard & Poor’s 500-stock index was down 3.64 points, or 0.27 percent, to 1,349.58, and the Nasdaq composite index fell 6.35 points, or 0.28 percent, to 2,299.99. For the week, the S.& P. gained 1.03 percent, while the Nasdaq gained 1.84 percent.

Light crude oil settled down 27 cents at $59.76 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Investors are still paying close attention to oil prices, as their decline has helped drive the market’s upward rise in recent months. Crude prices are down sharply from their trading high of $78.40 a barrel set in July.

G.M. was down $2.08, or 6.3 percent, to $31.05 after Jerome York resigned from the automaker’s board after the company’s failure to form an alliance with the Nissan Motor Company of Japan and Renault of France.

In other corporate news, Micron Technology fell $2.40, or 13.7 percent, to $15.14 after issuing a profit report that disappointed investors. Lackluster sales of flash memory chips raised questions about the company’s efforts to diversify.

Crown Castle International, which builds signal towers for mobile phones, declined $1.65, or 4.7 percent, to $33.10, after agreeing to acquire a rival, Global Signal, for $4 billion in cash and stock. Global Signal rose $3.84, or 7.7 percent, to $53.94.

DOJ_NMG_0078483

Chattem rose $9.77, or 28.4 percent, to $44.20 after it agreed to buy five over-the-counter products, including mouthwash and a sleep aid, from Johnson & Johnson and Pfizer.

Bonds fell, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note losing 21/32, to 10113/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.69 percent, from 4.60 percent late Thursday.

Wall Street Dips But Finishes Week Higher (FT)

By John O'doherty In New York

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

US stocks dipped on Friday, but finished the week higher after three consecutive days of record closing peaks for the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

Aerospace group Boeing led gainers on the Dow, up 6.1 per cent over the week to $83.68. On Tuesday, EADS, the parent of Boeing's rival Airbus, issued a €4.8bn ($6bn) profit warning and said delivery of its A380 superjumbo would be delayed by a further year. Christian Streiff, chief executive of Airbus, said it could take a decade for Airbus to catch up with Boeing.

The blue chip index was also buoyed by gains in chemicals group Dupont, which added 4.9 per cent to $44.95. Industrial products group Honeywell gained 3.4 per cent to $42.31.

Coffee chain Starbucks jumped 12.8 per cent to $38.41 – its best week in six years – after it said September same-store sales had risen 6 per cent, almost double analysts' estimates. The company raised its growth target to 40,000 outlets worldwide.

Investors in casino operator Harrah's Entertainment hit the jackpot after private equity groups Apollo and Texas Pacific made a $15bn offer to take the company private, pushing its shares up 15 per cent to $76.41. The Dow Jones Wilshire Gambling Index has gained 17 per cent in the past eight weeks.

Sovereign Bancorp added 12 per cent to a three-year high of $24.10 after reports that the bank's board could terminate the contract of the chairman and chief executive, potentially opening it up to takeover bids.

At the close, the Dow was up 1.5 per cent over the week, but down 0.1 per cent or 16.48 points on the day, at 11,850.21.

The S&P 500 was up 1 per cent for the week, but down 0.3 per cent or 3.64 points on the day, at 1,349.58.

The Nasdaq Composite gained 1.8 per cent over the week to 2,299.59, a loss of 0.3 per cent or 6.35 points on the day.

Equities were supported by hopes that the outlook for the economy was improving.

"I think a soft-landing is absolutely what's going to happen," said Fritz Meyer, senior investment officer at Aim Investments.

"Sentiment has been increasing that there is more momentum in the economy than we thought, and the inflation statistics continue to look good."

General Motors dropped 6.6 per cent to $31.05 after Kirk Kerkorian said he would not buy additional stock in the company following its rejection of an alliance with Renault and Nissan. Mr Kerkorian's Tracinda investment group holds a 9.9 per cent stake in GM.

Recruitment and advertising website Monster Worldwide leapt 10.5 per cent to $39.98 after positive analyst comment on the stock. Morgan Stanley said Monster was well-positioned to benefit from the shift to online job listings.

There were mixed fortunes for makers of medical equipment. Quest Diagnostic, maker of medical testing equipment, tumbled 16.1 per cent to $51.30. On Tuesday, the company said it had lost its contract with health insurer UnitedHealth, a contract that accounts for 7 per cent of Quest's revenues.

St Jude Medical was more fortunate, jumping 8.9 per cent over the week to $38.43, after two of its implantable heart devices were approved by European regulators.

Falling crude oil prices depressed energy stocks in the first part of the week, although an informal agreement on a production cut by the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries mitigated some of the losses. The S&P Energy Index finished the week down 1.3 per cent.

Hess slid 5.6 per cent to $39.12, while National Oilwell Varco sank 6.6 per cent to $53.88 after JPMorgan lowered its rating on the stock from "overweight" to "neutral", citing earnings risk in North America.

Retailers were in focus after mostly reporting better-than-expected sales in September.

DOJ_NMG_0078484

Circuit City gained 8.4 per cent to $27.21, and Nordstrom rose 5.7 per cent to $44.69. Department store Dillards sank 6.8 per cent to $30.49 after it disappointed analysts with flat same-store sales in December.

Drugstore CVS lost 8.7 per cent to $29.32 as Wal-Mart announced it was expanding its discounted sales of generic drugs.

Micron Technologies, the maker of computer memory chips, slumped 13 per cent to $15.14 after its 47 per cent increase in fourth-quarter profit fell short of estimates.

Economy For Bellwether GE, A Big Report Card (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

Investors will be watching anxiously Friday when General Electric Co. reports third-quarter financial results. The industrial and financial giant disappointed investors with both its first- and second-quarter results. And the U.S. economy, for which GE has long been considered a bellwether, appears to have cooled in recent months.

This is a "critical quarter" for GE, says Ann Duignan, an analyst with Bear Stearns, noting investors' earlier disquiet. GE shares are up 13% in the past three months, but still trail the Dow Jones Industrial Average for the year.

Beyond GE, Ms. Duignan says, investors will "try to read into GE's comments what could follow for other companies." GE's far-flung operations touch much of the economy, from power turbines and media to aircraft engines, consumer credit and corporate financing. GE's plastics unit sells to the auto industry, and its appliance business is a barometer of housing. Ms. Duignan says orders for GE's aircraft engines, turbines, rail locomotives and oil-and-gas equipment look strong.

But a growing share of GE's business now comes from outside the U.S., which could help the company bridge a U.S. slowdown. International sales are projected to account for 49% of GE's estimated $163 billion of revenue this year, up from 40% five years ago.

Its airline-engines unit, for example, landed September orders from Qatar Airways, China Eastern Airlines and Ireland's AerVenture, with a combined value of nearly $15 billion. The transportation unit signed a $650 million contract for 310 new locomotives from Kazakhstan's national railroad. GE's energy unit recently opened a technology center in Warsaw to help develop coal-gasification equipment intended to reduce emissions that contribute to global warming.

Analysts estimate GE will post third-quarter revenue of $39.9 billion, down about 5% from a year ago, reflecting the sale of most of GE's insurance business. They peg earnings at 49 cents a share, up 11%.

GE rarely misses those targets. But analysts and investors sometimes fret about the "quality" of GE's posted numbers. In the second quarter, that meant concerns about an unexpectedly low tax rate at GE's financial units and an unexpected gain from the sale of a portion of GE's stake in Penske Truck Leasing. To minimize future complaints, GE has since outlined potential future gains from small sales, which the company says will be offset by increased pension and restructuring costs.

One critical unit to watch: the energy unit that makes power-plant turbines, which is recovering from a long slump that followed the collapse of Enron Corp. GE told investors this summer that operating profit at the unit would rise 25% to 30% in the second half of the year after falling 6% in the first half of the year.

Dow Set A Record In Height, But Weight Had A Lot To Do With That (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

Averages can be deceiving, as many investors can attest.

The Dow Jones industrial average, the best-known stock index in the United States, broke through its old high this week, for the first time exceeding the level of 10,722 set on Jan. 14, 2000. But only 10 of the 30 stocks in the index are higher than they were then.

By contrast, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was 9 percent lower than it was in January 2000, and even farther below its level when it peaked in March of that year. But most stocks in that index are higher than they were in 2000.

The Nasdaq composite index, which a decade ago was often cited as an indicator of small-stock performance, is still more than 40 percent below its high levels of 2000. But the Russell 2000, also viewed as an indicator of small-stock performance, is up more than 40 percent since January 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0078485

How can that be? It relates to how the indexes are computed, and to what they capture. The Dow never had the technology representation of some other indexes, which held it back in the old days and holds it up now. Moreover, it is calculated on a price-weighted basis, so that high-priced stocks have larger influences than lower-priced ones.

The S.& P., like most indexes, is calculated on a market capitalization basis, which means the most important stocks are the ones with the highest market value. Many of those stocks were swept up in 2000, as conservative investors bought the big-cap stocks, and are still recovering from that overvaluation.

The Nasdaq composite was, and is, heavily influenced by technology stocks. But the Russell 2000, which is periodically reconstituted to include the stocks with market capitalization ranks from 1,001 to 3,000, dropped many of those overvalued stocks as they grew larger, and thus was not as hurt in the bubble's aftermath.

As the graphic shows, the markets to invest in since 2000 have not been the ones most investors were comfortable with then. Most European markets are shown as being higher than they were in early 2000, but most or all of those increases reflect the fact that the moves are based on dollar performance. The CAC 40 in France, for example, is shown as being up 13 percent, but it is down almost 10 percent in euros. The gain came solely from the dollar's weakness.

The big winners were in emerging markets, often ones that investors had good reasons to avoid after the 1998 currency crises. A major Russian index is up 651 percent. Hungary, where there have been recent riots after the prime minister admitted lying to win re-election, is up 161 percent. (All figures are from Jan. 14, 2000, to Oct. 3, 2006.)

Peru is up nearly 500 percent, and Mexico has risen 150 percent. The Prague stock index in the Czech Republic is up almost 350 percent, but that performance seems poor next to that of the Slovak index next door, which has risen more than 600 percent.

Even Lebanon, whose economy and political situation have not exactly been good of late, is up 84 percent.

Can this continue? The tech stocks kept rising long after some warned they were ridiculously overvalued. But when they fell, they fell far and fast as owners found that no one wanted to buy them. That could happen to some of today's favorites as well.

To Muted Cheers, The Dow Climbs Past A Record (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

STOCKS shattered records. Corporate profits soared. Economists waxed about a so-called Goldilocks economy — not too hot, not too cold. Sound familiar? That was the siren song of the 1990's economic boom, and there was an eerie echo on Wall Street this week.

The only thing missing this time was the mirth. A wary sense of relief greeted a record for blue-chip stocks. Robust profit reports came with warnings of weak numbers to come. A fingers-crossed optimism underpinned economic forecasts.

And then there was another echo of the boom: a new round of criminal indictments of senior corporate officials. This time the charges were not for fraud or theft, but for spying.

A RELUCTANT RECORD After flirting with the record for several days running, the Dow Jones industrial average of 30 major stocks cracked the record closing high it set in January 2000 amid a technology-driven boom.

The rally, which peaked for the week on Thursday with a record close of 11,866.69, was driven not by expectations of rapid economic growth, as it was seven years ago, but by a rapid fall in energy prices caused in part by expectations that global economic growth is slowing.

Some economists interpreted lower oil prices and a cooling housing market as signs of more-stable growth rather than a slump. Others, however, noted that the Dow is a narrow measure of the market and that other closely watched benchmarks, including the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and the Nasdaq composite index, are still well below their tech-bubble records.

More information on the economy's direction will come on Friday, when retail sales figures are released.

SPYING CHARGES California authorities indicted Patricia C. Dunn, the former chairwoman of Hewlett-Packard, and four other people on criminal charges in the corporate espionage case that has rocked the company.

DOJ_NMG_0078486

In addition to Ms. Dunn, the indictment named Kevin T. Hunsaker, a former senior lawyer at H.P.; Ronald DeLia, a private detective from Massachusetts; Matthew DePante, manager of the Action Research Group, a Melbourne, Fla., information broker; and Bryan C. Wagner, a Colorado man who is believed to have obtained private phone records while working for Mr. DePante.

All five defendants were charged with using false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access to computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. All of the charges are felonies. Lawyers for Ms. Dunn and Mr. DePante said their clients were innocent. The other defendants and their lawyers did not immediately respond.

California's attorney general, Bill Lockyer, filed the charges, which stem from an internal H.P. investigation into leaks of confidential discussions among its directors. As part of the investigation, private investigators working for the company apparently used deception to obtain the private telephone records of company officials and others.

The United States attorney's office for Northern California is also conducting its own investigation, and could file federal charges in the case soon.

BIG BET A pair of private-equity firms teamed up to offer $15 billion in cash for Harrah's Entertainment, the country's largest casino operator. Combined with Harrah's long-term debt of $10 billion, the buyout would be worth more than $25 billion, making it one of the largest leveraged buyouts ever.

Private equity firms have raised billions of dollars this year to buy publicly traded companies, improve their management or financing, and then sell them or take them public to realize a profit. Until now, they have rarely tapped the gambling industry, and the offer sent the shares of other casino operators soaring. Harrah's operates Harrah's, Caesars and Horseshoe casinos in Las Vegas, Atlantic City and elsewhere.

Casino takeovers require buyers to be approved by gambling regulators in each state where the company operates, to make sure that organized crime does not infiltrate the industry.

STOCK CAR RACE Led by the introduction of its new pickup truck, Toyota said its sales in the United States jumped 20 percent last month and the company closed in on Ford as the No. 2 car company in America.

Toyota's gains came even as receding gasoline prices and generous manufacturer rebates propped up sagging sales of pickup trucks and sport utility vehicles, normally a field dominated by General Motors, Ford and Chrysler.

Ford increased its market share slightly, to 17.3 percent, but Toyota expanded faster and accounted for 16.5 percent of the market. Sales at G.M. fell almost 7 percent and its market share slipped to 21.6 percent.

With large inventories of unsold 2006 models, automakers plan to offer bigger incentives, including no-interest financing or thousands of dollars in cash rebates.

JUMBO PROBLEM Persistent assembly-line problems will further delay the first deliveries of the A380 superjumbo jet by Airbus, perhaps by as much as one more year, pushing the program off by a full two years.

The European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company, the parent company of Airbus, also warned that the delays would cut earnings over the next four years by 4.8 billion euros ($6.1 billion), more than double the amount forecast in June.

Compounding the problem, Emirates, the largest customer for the A380 plane, signaled publicly that it might cancel part of its multibillion-dollar order for the superjumbo jet. Emirates, which hopes to expand its long-haul international airline service through its base in the Middle East, was originally scheduled to receive its first planes this year; now the earliest it would receive its first jetliners is 2008.

EADS and Airbus said the first A380 would be delivered next year, to Singapore Airlines in October, down from nine that had been promised as recently as June.

OPEC's Oil-Price Line In The Sand Cartel's Effort To Maintain $60-a-Barrel Seems Doable, But Only For The Near Term (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

OPEC announced Thursday that it intends to steady the oil price at something like the current level of about $60 a barrel. It may be able to defend this level in the months to come, but over the long haul this effort is doomed.

DOJ_NMG_0078487

It certainly sounds ambitious by the standards of two years ago. The price then was $45 a barrel, and most experts and exporters thought that was too high to last. But experience changes standards. After more than a year of $60-plus prices, the level seems more plausible.

Plausibility matters, because the price defense is going to require some production cuts, at least for the short term. OPEC needs a target that its swing producers, especially Saudi Arabia, are willing to defend. Otherwise the group won't be able to stop squabbling over who should take the pain. At least for now, it looks like the will to succeed is there.

There are other trends working in OPEC's favor. The balance of supply and demand is still pretty tight. Although higher prices have slowed demand growth, the direction remains positive. That's largely because of the emerging markets, which accounted for 90% of incremental demand growth in 2005. And while new sources of oil eventually will come onstream, it's a slow process. For the moment, OPEC members control marginal supply. Outside of the cartel, production hasn't budged since 2004.

Second, financial conditions remain supportive of a high oil price. Low real interest rates and the recycling of petrodollars by oil exporters have mitigated the pain of higher oil prices. American households have blithely borrowed to fill the tanks of their SUVs.

But OPEC faces one huge obstacle. The cost of producing oil is much less than $60. Even Canadian oil sands, which require expensive and energy-intensive processing, are profitable at something like $50. Eventually, the lure of profits will bring on new supply, damping the price.

Fortress Within

Wall Street firm Morgan Stanley is hunting for a hedge fund manager. FrontPoint Partners, with whom it danced in the past, might be a good fit. But there are more ambitious targets to consider, such as Fortress Investment Group.

The Wild West era of the alternative asset-management industry is coming to a close. As a result, its practitioners are considering ways to cash out and grow like any normal business. Their options include going public and selling to bigger financial institutions.

But the first avenue looks more difficult today than it did just a few months ago. The implosion of Amaranth Advisors, troubles at other big funds like Vega and continued middling performance across the industry are making investors wary of the industry. RAB Capital, for example, a U.K.-listed hedge fund manager, has seen its stock plunge by a third in the past month. Even a Fortress, with $24 billion in hedge-fund and private-equity vehicles, would find it difficult to withstand these market pressures.

That may be one reason the firm has yet to file for an IPO despite months of contemplation. At RAB's valuation of 15% of assets under management, Fortress would be worth about $4 billion. But to Morgan Stanley, Fortress might be worth more. It would jump-start the Wall Street firm's attempts to gain a foothold in hedge funds and private equity, where it considerably lags behind chief rival Goldman Sachs. The two sides know each other a bit: top Fortress and Morgan Stanley honchos dined last week.

Of course, to entrepreneurs, going public and selling out aren't interchangeable outcomes. But a flirtation with the public markets is clearly a step closer to the exit than sitting still. Morgan Stanley has gotten its mojo back of late. Its stock price is up, risk-taking is being rewarded and talent has returned to the firm. To complete the turnaround, it needs to build a fortress in asset management. It might be quicker to buy one.

Private-Equity Eye?

The blow-up of Amaranth and a few cases of outright fraud have spurred calls for more oversight of hedge funds. Private equity, however, which has also attracted billions of dollars of pension money in recent years, has largely avoided the regulators' spotlight. Still, it may only take a few buyout scandals for this to change.

Like hedge funds, larger private-equity managers have to register with the SEC as investment advisers. But small buyout funds avoid all scrutiny. And even the registered funds have minimal disclosure requirements. Yet the private-equity world is growing rapidly. Investors have poured $172 billion into 253 funds in the U.S. so far this year, according to Dow Jones Private Equity Analyst (a publication owned by Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal). With all that money sloshing around, it would be surprising if there were no bad eggs.

DOJ_NMG_0078488

AA Capital, a $194 million fund that was spun off from the Dutch bank ABN Amro in 2001, could be one. The Securities and Exchange Commission has accused the fund of misappropriating nearly $11 million of its clients' cash. The SEC complaint charges that the firm's president, John Orecchio, put some of this money into a Michigan horse farm and slipped a wad to the manager of a Detroit strip club. Calls to AA Capital weren't returned.

Questionable use of limited partners' funds may not be the only type of abuse going on in private equity. There could also be inaccurate valuations. The longer lock-up periods and lack of a market price for private-equity investments make that relatively easy to practice and hard to detect. Some buyout firms are no doubt pushing the envelope when it comes to valuing portfolios. It's even conceivable that the increasing number of transactions between buyout funds have led some to swap favors in order to boost reported returns.

The leading private firms have lobbied hard to avoid getting caught up in hedge-fund regulation. These efforts could be thwarted if there's any more mischief among the minnows of their industry.

--Martin Hutchinson, Rob Cox and Lauren Silva

Wetterling Goes National With Her Call For Foley Inquiry (MINNST)

By Bob Von Sternberg

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 7, 2006

She delivered the Democrats' weekly address after drawing wide attention. Bachmann calls it opportunistic.

Sixth Congressional District candidate Patty Wetterling said on Friday that if a "full and complete investigation" finds that any congressmen covered up the Mark Foley scandal, they should be expelled.

Her comments were taped for the Democratic Party's five-minute response that will be broadcast nationally this morning after President Bush's weekly radio address.

It was a publicity coup for Wetterling in her campaign against state Sen. Michele Bachmann and came at the end of a week in which Wetterling pushed to link outrage over Foley's sexually explicit e-mails with teenage congressional pages with her work as a children's safety advocate since her son, Jacob, disappeared.

"For 17 years, I have fought for tough penalties for those who harm children," she said. "Members of Congress are not and should not be above the law."

Wetterling said Foley "sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug."

She repeated many of the points she raised in her latest TV ad and in a long string of interviews with national publications that turned their attention to her almost immediately after the scandal broke.

Bachmann has said Wetterling's focus on the issue has been opportunistic and called the ad "a rush to judgment."

Bachmann said on Friday that Wetterling's radio comments "are reminiscent of her TV ad, which even the Star Tribune called misleading. The investigation of this matter by the FBI and the ethics committee is already underway and was called for by the leadership."

Wetterling said on Friday that Bachmann's criticisms "are appalling."They show an insensitivity to the victims," she said. "T o not respond to this would have been wrong. This is something I know an awful lot about."

She said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called her earlier this week and asked her to present the radio address. "I wrote my own words," she said. "It's daunting, but it's an honor."

She said she had met Foley several times as her work crossed paths with his role as chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children. In July, Foley and Wetterling attended a signing ceremony at the White House for the Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006.

"I know Mark Foley, and he's done good things," she said. "It's a betrayal and hits me at a personal level."

When Wetterling arrived at KSTP's recording studio in St. Paul on Friday afternoon, she was met by four television c ameras and nearly a dozen local journalists. "Holy moley," she said, startled.

Bob von Sternberg • 612-673-7184 • vonste@startribune.com

In House Races, More G.O.P. Seats Are Seen At Risk (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — At least five more Republican Congressional seats are now in serious contention, analysts said Friday, an unwelcome development for Republicans as they begin to confront a political environment further darkened for them by the Congressional page scandal.

The fury over sexually charged messages sent to male teenage pages by Representative Mark Foley of Florida is undercutting Republican support among elderly voters, suburbanites and women, analysts from both parties said.

More immediately — and more alarmingly for Republican strategists who have looked to the party's powerful voter turnout operation to save the party this year — there are signs that the furor is sapping the enthusiasm of a group essential to Republican victories in 2002 and 2004: religious conservatives.

"The social conservatives are frustrated with what's going on," said Saulius Anuzis, the chairman of the Republican Party in Michigan, where, he said, one-third of his volunteers are social conservatives. "We have heard disappointment and disenchantment. The level of commitment isn't as fierce as it ought to be."

The political uproar is playing out in races across the country and comes with Republicans already struggling against the political weight of more bad news from Iraq. The page scandal has left leaders and candidates in both parties to come up with new strategies a month from Election Day.

Democrats placed advertisements linking embattled Republican incumbents to Mr. Foley, including spots in Ohio and Indiana that began broadcasting Friday. Democratic House and Senate candidates pressed Republican incumbents to say whether they thought Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who along with other senior members of the Republican leadership has come under fire as failing to act on early signals that Mr. Foley was sexually harassing teenagers, should stay in power.

In New Jersey, Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican Senate candidate, called on Mr. Hastert to step down.

The Democratic response to President Bush's radio address on Saturday features a Democratic House candidate, Patty Wetterling of Minnesota, attacking House Republican leaders as ignoring warnings about Mr. Foley's behavior, according to excerpts released Friday.

"Foley sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of Congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug to protect their political power," says Ms. Wetterling, a Democrat whose 11-year-old son was kidnapped 17 years ago and has not been found.

Republicans and their allies, including conservative talk radio hosts, have responded by rallying around Mr. Hastert and blaming Democrats and the news media for the frenzy.

Talk radio hosts, working off a list of talking points distributed by Republican Party officials, recounted how two decades ago, House Democrats stood behind Representative Gerry E. Studds, Democrat of Massachusetts, after he engaged in sex with a male page.

In upstate New York, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, who is trailing his Democratic challenger according to two new polls, planned to go on television to defend himself after a labor union began broadcasting a 30-second radio advertisement questioning whether he had done all he could after hearing a complaint that Mr. Foley was harassing teenagers.

"Nobody's angrier and more disappointed than me that I didn't catch his lies," Mr. Reynolds said in advertisements scheduled to begin over the weekend. "I trusted that others had investigated. Looking back, more should have been done, and for that I am sorry."

George Rasley, an aide to Representative Deborah Pryce, Republican of Ohio, who was linked to Mr. Foley in a Democratic advertisement that began running Friday, said the Foley investigation further soured an already tough environment for Republicans in Ohio, a state hammered by corruption investigations this year.

"This is one more thing that makes people wonder about politicians and politics," Mr. Rasley said. "It reinforces this notion of Washington being a place that bears no resemblance to real America."

The page scandal is part of a run of difficult tidings for Republicans, including a stream of bad news out of Iraq, disclosure of an intelligence report that found that the invasion might have worsened the threat of terrorism and Mr. Bush's continued unpopularity.

In the White House, aides have watched with frustration as campaign appearances by Mr. Bush, in which he hammers Democrats on national security, receive little coverage, subsumed by the Foley case.

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said he believed that Republicans turned a corner when Mr. Hastert accepted responsibility for the mishandling of the page scandal after days of being pressed to take action by restive Republicans.

"I'm looking at every single bit of public and private data," Mr. Mehlman said. "So far, I have seen a minimal effect of this particular situation, which is not to say that I don't take it seriously."

Democrats need to capture 15 House seats to take control of Congress; until the last week or two, about 40 Republican seats had been judged in play, of which 20 had been considered highly competitive. But analysts said at least five more Republican seats, and as many as eight, that had once been considered relative long shots for Democrats had now swung firmly into play.

At least two of those seats are directly related to the Foley scandal. One is held by Mr. Reynolds, who as chairman of the House Republican campaign committee had entered this election cycle as a prohibitive favorite for re-election. Republicans in Florida do not plan to spend any money to defend the seat once held by Mr. Foley, effectively conceding it to the Democratic challenger, Tim Mahoney, who, not taking any chances, is running advertisements in which he pledges to return "moral values" to Congress.

In other races, the Foley case has created an unfavorable backdrop for Republicans. In Pennsylvania this week, Representative Don Sherwood, a suddenly endangered Republican, bought time on television to offer an apology in response to allegations that he had abused his mistress. Analysts for both parties said the sweep of outrage over Congressional misbehavior had weakened Mr. Sherwood and forced him to deal directly with the issue.

Beyond that, analysts said the page scandal had raised new concerns about ethics in Congress, an unwanted focus for Republicans in races where Democrats have sought to make an issue of what they have called a Republican culture of corruption.

Those include re-election races by Representatives Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle, both of California, who have been touched by the fallout from the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, as well as the contests to fill two seats vacated by Republicans who have quit the race, Tom DeLay of Texas and Bob Ney of Ohio.

"I would think the Ney seat is more of a problem because of another round of ethics problems," said Stu Rothenberg, an independent analyst who studies Congressional races.

Amy Walter, an analyst who follows Congressional races for The Cook Political Report, said the Foley inquiry was having an indirect effect on races in which corruption might be an issue. "When the spotlight is where the spotlight sits right now," Ms. Walter said, "on scandal and dysfunction in Congress, then people like Pombo and Doolittle suffer."

Mr. Pombo has also been the target of advertisements by the Sierra Club and the League of Women Voters criticizing his record on environmental issues.

Other races that have become increasingly competitive are the one to replace Representative Katherine Harris, a Florida Republican running for the Senate, and the challenge to Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr., also a Florida Republican. Party officials said polls showed the two races were tight.

Officials in both parties said it was not the Foley scandal alone as much as the accumulated weight of problems for Republicans these past two weeks that was giving them concern.

"We're working to redirect the debate back to national security and lower taxes," said Brian Jones, the communications director for the Republican National Committee. "But this week that's proved to be a difficult task."

Republican pollsters said their first concern was that the page scandal could discourage Republican voters from turning out.

"We're not seeing it affecting voter behavior; we are seeing it affect voter intensity," said Glenn Bolger, a Republican pollster. "It's more of a deflation effect among Republicans than it is a motivator for Democrats. Does that change in the next 34 days? That's part of our job."

DOJ_NMG_0078491

Meanwhile, Democrats were pushing hard to make sure the Republicans' troubles stayed in the public consciousness. On Saturday, Democrats plan to run an advertisement against Mike Whalen, a Republican running for an open House seat in Iowa, picturing him alongside Mr. Hastert.

Democratic advertisements are linking Mr. Foley to both Ms. Pryce of Ohio and Representative Mike Sodrel of Indiana. Ms. Pryce once described Mr. Foley as a friend, one advertisement says, while Mr. Sodrel is criticized as taking a campaign contribution "from the House leadership, who knew about it but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley."

A fund-raiser for Mr. Sodrel headlined by Mr. Hastert was postponed this week. Mr. Sodrel's campaign manager, Cam Savage, said that was only because of a scheduling conflict.

Mr. Savage described the Foley scandal as an issue in Mr. Sodrel's district, but not an overwhelming one. "It's not the No. 1 priority on people's minds," he said, "but it does have some resonance to it."

Democrat Ads Attack GOP Over Scandal (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 7, 2006

More Democrats went on the attack Friday with campaign ads linking Republican candidates to the Mark Foley House page scandal while GOP candidates moved to distance themselves from embattled Speaker Dennis Hastert.

On Saturday, Democrat Patty Wetterling, a candidate for an open House seat in Minnesota, will continue the attack in the Democratic response to President Bush's weekly radio address as the party looks to reap political gains in coming midterm elections.

"Foley sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug to protect their political power," Wetterling said in the prerecorded address. "We must hold accountable all those complicit in allowing this victimization to happen."

Republican New Jersey Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. Friday became the first major GOP candidate to call for Hastert to resign, while additional campaign appearances by Hastert for House GOP candidates got canceled. Hastert has come under heavy attack within his party's rank and file for damage inflicted on the party just weeks before the Nov. 7 elections.

"Hastert should resign as speaker," Kean said. "He is the head of the institution and this happened on his watch."

Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, a Republican write-in candidate in the race to replace Tom DeLay in Texas, decided not to pursue plans to invite Hastert to raise money for her campaign after the Foley scandal broke.

"We just made a decision not to have" a fundraiser with Hastert, said Sekula-Gibbs' campaign manager, Lisa Diamond.

Democrats stepped up their attacks.

"What is going on in Washington? ... Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages. Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert looked the other way," says an ad for Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy, challenging seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, the No. 4 Republican in the House in a particularly competitive race.

And in culturally conservative southern Indiana, former Democratic Rep. Baron Hill took to the airwaves Friday with an ad attacking freshman Republican Mike Sodrel for taking thousands of dollars in donations from House GOP leaders, "who knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator congressman Foley."

At the same time, Hastert canceled plans to raise money for Sodrel on Tuesday.

Earlier, Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., a Baptist preacher and social conservative, canceled plans for a fundraiser with Hastert, who also dropped an appearance with Ohio GOP candidate Joy Padgett, who is in an uphill race to replace the disgraced Rep. Bob Ney.

The nonstop news cycles for over a week have been filled with details of Foley's lurid messages to former pages and accusations by former top Foley staff aide Kirk Fordham that top GOP aides, including some in Hastert's office, knew about Foley's problems and the issue of the pages years ago.

But with no significant developments Friday, GOP strategists hoped the party could catch its breath and gain traction on issues like lower gas prices, the peaking stock market and the economy. Great skittishness remained about unforeseen developments in the Foley saga, nevertheless.

DOJ_NMG_0078492

Democrats are increasingly optimistic that they will retake the House and possibly even the Senate. Even a prominent Senate Republican, John Cornyn of Texas, seemed pessimistic about his party keeping its hold on the House.

"It's happened in the past that we've had divided government in terms of the House and Senate," Cornyn said. "I'm sure we'll do our best to work together to try to address the nation's problems."

Democrat Christian Radio Ad Slams Foley (AP)

By David Hammer

AP, October 7, 2006

A Democratic candidate accuses her Republican rival of not doing enough to stop disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley and his salacious messages to teenage males in an ad for Christian radio stations.

Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy is challenging seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce, a member of the GOP House leadership, in one of the more competitive races. Kilroy's weeklong ads begin Saturday.

"What is going on in Washington? ... Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages," says the ad, which will air on Christian and Clear Channel Communications Inc., stations in central Ohio.

The spots cost Kilroy's campaign $5,000.

Foley, a former Florida congressman, helped Pryce get elected Republican Conference secretary, then Conference chairwoman — the No. 4 position in the House leadership. Pryce mentioned five friends in Congress in an article last month in Columbus Monthly magazine and Foley was one of them.

Pryce said she was out of the loop about complaints that Foley had sent improper messages to teenage male pages until after the congressman resigned Sept. 29.

"I was dumbfounded," she said.

Pryce held a news conference in Columbus, Ohio, to respond to the ad. She accused Kilroy of smearing her and gay-baiting, although Kilroy never mentioned homosexuality.

"She implied that since I knew him, I knew that he was a predator and I asssume there's only two conclusions you can draw from that: that I knew because I knew him, that he was a predator, or that I knew that he was gay because I knew him, that he was a predator," Pryce said.

Kilroy spokeswoman Amanda Wurst said the campaign chose Christian and conservative radio stations because their listeners are concerned about values.

The ad also blames Pryce for standing by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill, complaining that he looked the other way when warned of Foley's behavior.

Hastert said Thursday he did not know about the sexually explicit messages sent by Foley until last week, but he also took responsibility for the matter.

Standing Apart From His Party, Kean Calls For House Speaker To Step Down (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 6 — Breaking ranks with President Bush and his party once again, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican candidate for United States Senate in New Jersey, called Friday for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to resign in the aftermath of the Mark Foley scandal.

Mr. Kean did so without consulting any of the six Republicans in New Jersey's Congressional delegation, according to two Republicans involved in New Jersey politics.

"Hastert should resign as speaker," Mr. Kean said in a two-paragraph statement. "He is the head of the institution and this happened on his watch. I urge House leaders to go further by appointing an outside panel to review the matter immediately."

Mr. Kean has made ethics the central plank in his campaign to unseat the Democratic incumbent, Senator Robert Menendez. And although he has staked out reliably Republican positions on most issues, like Mr. Bush's tax cuts and the war in Iraq, Mr. Kean has also bucked party orthodoxy on occasion.

DOJ_NMG_0078493

He was one of the first Republicans to call on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign over his handling of the war in Iraq. He has also criticized Mr. Bush for his handling of Hurricane Katrina and the ballooning federal deficit.

But Mr. Kean has never taken so unequivocal and so contrarian a position at the hottest political moment: the widening scandal in which Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, is accused of having sent sexually suggestive electronic messages to underage Congressional pages. Mr. Foley resigned from the House last Friday after the existence of the messages was disclosed.

Mr. Menendez's campaign expressed skepticism over Mr. Kean's comments.

"This is Tom Kean Jr. running scared because New Jerseyans are just starting to understand he is just another Bush Republican, and a vote for him keeps all these guys in power," said Brian Fallon, a spokesman for Mr. Menendez.

GOP Leaders Rally To House Speaker's Defense (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Republican leaders closed ranks yesterday around House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, while candidates facing election in November continued to distance themselves from Mr. Hastert for his handling of a scandal that could cost Republicans control of Congress.

Several top Republicans, including President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, have rallied behind Mr. Hastert in recent days after the speaker and other House Republicans were criticized for not responding more aggressively when they learned of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's "over-friendly" relationship with a congressional page.

But in a clear indication of the damage the scandal could cause the Republican Party in November, some candidates continue to distance themselves.

State Sen. Tom Kean Jr., New Jersey Republican, who is running for the Senate, called yesterday for Mr. Hastert of Illinois to step down.

"He is the head of that institution, and this happened on his watch, and Kean urges House leaders to go further by appointing an outside panel to review the matter immediately," said Jill Hazelbaker, Mr. Kean's spokeswoman.

Mr. Kean hopes to unseat Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and pushed for a broad investigation of anyone in leadership who knew about the concerns involving Mr. Foley.

"This disturbing situation is another reason why the public holds the Congress in such low esteem. The culture of protecting each other has eroded Congress and the public's faith in government, and the system needs reform," Ms. Hazelbaker said.

In Kentucky, Rep. Ron Lewis this week canceled a fundraising appearance with Mr. Hastert.

Even candidates who aren't explicitly chiding Mr. Hastert are at least denouncing the Republican Congress for the scandal and casting doubt that an independent investigation can be conducted by the House ethics committee, which Thursday opened a probe into the matter.

"To assure that this grievous behavior does not occur again in the halls of Congress, an independent investigation is necessary," said Michael Bouchard, the Republican challenging Sen. Debbie Stabenow, Michigan Democrat. "The investigation must be taken out of the hands of politicians and put into the hands of trained investigators."

But Mr. Bouchard, the sheriff of Michigan's second-largest county, was quick to say that it's not a partisan issue.

"This is not about Republicans and Democrats. This is about right and wrong, cracking down on criminals, and protecting victims," he said yesterday. "An independent investigation will take politics out of the process."

Conservatives, for the most part, have toned down the calls for Mr. Hastert to give up his leadership post.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III said yesterday that Mr. Hastert should not become "a sacrificial lamb."

Mr. Baker warned on CBS' "The Early Show" yesterday that dumping Mr. Hastert would not bring an end to the scandal.

"If they throw Denny Hastert off the sled to slow down the wolves, it won't be long before you'll be crying, 'Hey, you've got to throw somebody else over because they knew about it, too,' " Mr. Baker said.

DOJ_NMG_0078494

And while the conservative publication Human Events stopped short of calling for Mr. Hastert to resign, an editorial yesterday said he should quit his speaker post before the next Congress is seated in January.

"Conservatives differ on whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert ought to resign right now, but it cannot be reasonably argued that Hastert is the best possible choice to lead Republicans in the next Congress," the publication said. "He is not."

Republicans Rally Round Hastert (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

It was Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the House and Republican leader, who best summarised his party's response to the scandal over a lawmaker's lewd internet messages to teenage interns. "There's a certain stench of hypocrisy," he said in reference to past sex scandals among Democrats.

For the time being, top Republicans are rallying behind Dennis Hastert, the current speaker, who on Thursday rejected calls to resign and who denied allegations that he knew of congressman Mark Foley's behaviour as early as 2003, when members of his staff on Capitol Hill were apparently informed.

But Mr Hastert also raised eyebrows when, by questioning the timing of the scandal, he hinted at a leftwing conspiracy to derail his party's mid-term election chances. The story hit the front pages last week, at a point when Republican chances appeared to be on the mend for the first time in more than a year.

Still, for many social conservatives, whose support has been critical to Republican election success ever since Mr Gingrich led the party to control of the House in 1994, the Foley scandal could prove to be the final straw. In the 2000 presidential elections, many Christian Republicans abstained from voting for George W. Bush when it was revealed he had once been caught driving under the influence of alcohol. In contrast, many analysts attributed Mr Bush's clear – although narrow – victory in the 2004 presidential election to his success in motivating socially conservative voters.

According to polls, that "intensity" of support app-ears to be falling off. Among voters who go to church once a week, only 44 per cent now lean towards the Republicans, compared with 58 per cent in 2004, according the Pew Research Center. For those who attend church more than once a week, the proportion has dropped from 64 to 56 per cent.

Although the mid-term elections have been dominated until now by other themes, such as the "war on terror", the war in Iraq and the state of the economy, moral issues often sway Christian voters on polling day. "Mid-term elections are all about motivating your party's base," said David Keene, the president of the Amer-ican Conservative Union. "There is no doubt about it, the Foley scandal has been very bad for Republican motivation."

The contrast could not be more stark with the 1994 elections, when Democrats stayed at home in droves, permitting Republicans to capture the House for the first time in a generation. Mr Gingrich's "contract with America", which helped deliver the Republican victory, was dominated by two pledges: to reduce the size of government and to restore ethics to Washington.

On both counts, large numbers of Republicans feel betrayed. Many traditional Republicans have been alienated by the growth in "K Street" lobby groups over the past decade and the accompanying rise in federal spending, which has grown at almost three times the rate of inflation since 2001.

Many social conservatives have grown disillusioned with their party's relative lack of success in pushing forward a moral agenda to restrict abortion, oppose gay marriage and rein back the culture of permissiveness. Just under a quarter of American voters describe themselves as "evangelical".

However, with more than a month to go before polling day, Republican leaders believe there is plenty of time for the scandal to blow over. They also believe that their party's larger campaign war chest and the fact that voters remain concerned about national security could still prove decisive in the build-up to voting.

"People know there is hypocrisy and double-standards in Washington and they know it falls on both sides of the aisle," said Saul Anuzis, the head of the Republican party in Michigan. "There is a good chance this scandal will be forgotten in a few weeks. The majority of voters aren't paying much attention."

Republicans Hope Hastert's Words And A Committee's Action Can Quell Uproar (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

DOJ_NMG_0078495

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — House Republicans held their breath on Friday and hoped that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's expression of remorse about the page scandal combined with the start of a House ethics investigation would stabilize his grip on power.

"The speaker has taken responsibility and is taking control of the situation," his spokesman, Ron Bonjean, said Friday afternoon.

After a chaotic week that began with the resignation of Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, other lawmakers were assessing whether Mr. Hastert's announcement on Thursday that he would not resign but would punish anyone found to have been derelict in the Foley case would be enough to calm the furor. They were hoping to avoid more leadership turmoil just one month before the midterm elections.

Even as the House ethics committee entered the second day of its inquiry, several contradictions had yet to be resolved, particularly whether Mr. Hastert's staff had been alerted to complaints about Mr. Foley before 2004. Kirk Fordham, a longtime aide to Mr. Foley who resigned this week from the office of another congressman, said he alerted Scott Palmer, the speaker's chief of staff, to Mr. Foley's behavior up to three years ago.

The speaker's office has denied hearing an advance warning from Mr. Fordham, but a senior Republican aide on Capitol Hill, who was close to Mr. Foley, confirmed Mr. Fordham's version of events in an interview on Friday. The aide, who declined to be identified because the matter was under investigation, said Mr. Fordham had alerted Mr. Palmer to concerns surrounding Mr. Foley's behavior with under-age pages.

Another senior Republican official who would speak about internal party matters only without being named said Mr. Hastert in his remarks had accomplished two goals sought by his colleagues: He had accepted some responsibility and had acknowledged that the response to complaints about the initial e-mail sent to a former teenage page in Louisiana had been inadequate.

"I'm hoping this is gone," said the official, who, like others, cautioned that new disclosures could quickly imperil Mr. Hastert and that the coming elections could answer the question of his future regardless.

After Mr. Hastert's remarks, other members of the leadership issued statements backing him, putting aside, at least for now, some of the divisions exposed over the scandal and who was responsible.

Republicans and some Democrats said the ethics committee had bought Mr. Hastert some relief by promising a full and relatively quick inquiry, though it was unclear whether the committee's findings would be known before the election. Aides in leadership offices said Friday that they were not aware of any staff members receiving requests to meet with the panel, which on Thursday approved nearly four dozen potential subpoenas for testimony and documents.

James A. Baker III, a leading Republican and former secretary of state with strong ties to the Bush family, also expressed support for Mr. Hastert on Friday, saying his resignation would do little to stem the uproar.

"If you think that's going to stop the story, you've been smoking dope, because the minute they get Denny, they'll go after the next person who might have known something about this," Mr. Baker said on Fox News. "I think the speaker's done the right thing by calling for an investigation."

In Oklahoma, a lawyer for a former page who has been identified as the recipient of explicit messages from Mr. Foley dismissed reports that the former page, now 21, was engaging in a practical joke. "From what I do know, this was not a prank," the lawyer, Stephen Jones, said on CNN.

The case continued to provoke sharp exchanges between Republicans and Democrats.

Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois and chairman of the board that oversees the page program, said he was outraged at criticism of his handling of the initial complaint against Mr. Foley. Mr. Shimkus said he was the person who questioned Mr. Foley, only to be told by the lawmaker that the initial e-mail communication was innocent.

"I did nothing wrong," said Mr. Shimkus, a former teacher, who on a radio program in his district accused Democrats of questioning his integrity in the matter.

Staffer Cites Earlier Role By Hastert's Office (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's chief of staff confronted then-Rep. Mark Foley about his inappropriate social contact with male pages well before the speaker said aides in his office took any action, a current congressional staff member with personal knowledge of Foley and his behavior with pages said yesterday.

The staff member said Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, met with the Florida Republican at the Capitol to discuss complaints about Foley's behavior toward pages. The alleged meeting occurred long before Hastert says aides in his office dispatched Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.) and the clerk of the House in November 2005 to confront Foley about troubling e-mails he had sent to a Louisiana boy.

The staff member's account buttresses the position of Foley's onetime chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, who said earlier this week that he had appealed to Palmer in 2003 or earlier to intervene, after Fordham's own efforts to stop Foley's behavior had failed. Fordham said Foley and Palmer, one of the most powerful figures in the House of Representatives, met within days to discuss the allegations.

Palmer said this week that the meeting Fordham described "did not happen." Timothy J. Heaphy, Fordham's attorney, said yesterday that Fordham is prepared to testify under oath that he had arranged the meeting and that both Foley and Palmer told him the meeting had taken place. Fordham spent more than three hours with the FBI on Thursday, and Heaphy said that on Friday he contacted the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to offer his client's cooperation.

"We are not preparing to cooperate. We are affirmatively seeking to," Heaphy said.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean declined to directly comment on the second House staff member's assertion, saying that it is a matter for a House ethics committee investigation. "The Standards Committee has asked that no one discuss this matter because of its ongoing investigation," Bonjean said.

The emergence of a second congressional staffer describing such a meeting came on a day that Hastert (R-Ill.) was working to solidify his hold on the speakership. Prominent Republicans, including President Bush, have defended Hastert, saying he should not step down, but the criticism continues to flow.

New Jersey's Thomas H. Kean Jr., whose candidacy offers the GOP its most promising hope to take a Senate seat from a Democrat in November, called for Hastert's resignation yesterday, as did the editorial page of the Los Angeles Times. Democratic House candidate Patty Wetterling of Minnesota, a child-safety advocate and the first to air a television commercial about the Foley scandal, will deliver the national Democratic response to Bush's weekly radio address today.

Hastert maintains that he knew nothing of Foley's actions until last week, when the story first broke and Foley resigned. His stance contradicts that of House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), both of whom said they had informed Hastert this spring.

Palmer has resolutely said he had no earlier meeting with Foley, and other leadership aides have questioned the truthfulness of Fordham. Fordham quit his job as Reynolds's chief of staff last week after acknowledging that he had tried to persuade ABC News not to publish the salacious instant-message exchanges between Foley and two former pages.

Hastert's office contends that the first confrontation with Foley occurred in November 2005, when Shimkus, the head of the House Page Board, and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl took Foley aside to discuss what they termed "over-friendly" e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana boy. Fordham's account not only pushed the matter back at least two years but also indicated that alarms over Foley's behavior had gone well beyond bland e-mails.

Sources close to Fordham say Trandahl repeatedly urged the longtime aide and close family friend to confront Foley about his inappropriate advances on pages. Each time, Foley pledged to no longer socialize with the teenagers, but, weeks later, Trandahl would again alert Fordham about more contacts. Out of frustration, the sources said, Fordham contacted Palmer, hoping that an intervention from such a powerful figure in the House would persuade Foley to stop.

Now, a second House aide familiar with Foley and his actions told The Washington Post yesterday that "Scott Palmer had spoken to Foley prior to November 2005." The aide spoke on the condition of anonymity because the matter is now the subject of a criminal investigation and the House ethics committee inquiry.

Two law enforcement officials said yesterday that the FBI had not yet determined whether a crime had occurred in the Foley case. Justice Department and FBI officials have cautioned that cases involving the enticement of minors are notoriously difficult to prosecute.

On Wednesday night, Palmer was described as highly emotional while aides sifted through e-mails and files to determine whether he had ever spoken to Fordham. Several people who spoke with Palmer said the chief of staff was emphatic in denying that he knew anything about Foley's questionable contacts with young male pages.

Palmer, who shares a townhouse with Hastert when they are in town, is more powerful than all but a few House members. Members know that he speaks for Hastert.

The divergent accounts have highlighted the holes in the public's understanding of Foley's undoing. And they are sure to ratchet up the pressure on Trandahl to come forward with his knowledge of events. As House clerk between January 1999 and November 2005, Trandahl had direct control over the page program.

Pages apparently saw Trandahl as a strict disciplinarian. In one instant-message exchange obtained by The Post, a former page, on his way to his first annual reunion in Washington, told Foley in January 2003 that "everyone is going to be pretty wasted a lot of the time in dc."

He then added, "well we dont have the [expletive] clerk to fire us anymore. . . . we didnt like trandahl that much . . . he isnt a nice guy . . . and he gets really scarey when he is mad."

Trandahl's departure came within days of his confrontation with Foley over e-mails that the congressman had sent a former page. House aides say the circumstances of Trandahl's exit were oddly quiet. The departure of a staff member of long standing, especially one as important as the House clerk, is usually marked with considerable fanfare, said Scott Lilly, a former Democratic staff director of the House Appropriations Committee. Debate is suspended in mid-afternoon to accommodate a stream of testimonials from lawmakers.

Trandahl's departure was marked by a one-minute salute from Shimkus and a brief insert into the Congressional Record.

"My one-hour Special Order changed to a five-minute Special Order, now to a one-minute," Shimkus said. "I just want to say thank you for the work you have done."

Lilly said: "He seemed to suddenly disappear in a puff of smoke."

Trandahl, now the executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, has not returned repeated phone calls and e-mails.

Congressional aides point to another factor that links Trandahl to the Foley matter. A member of the board of the national gay rights group Human Rights Campaign, Trandahl is openly homosexual and personally close to the now-disgraced former lawmaker, who announced through his lawyer this week that he is gay.

SPECIAL REPORT: SEX, LIES AND ELECTION DAY (NATJOUR)

By Brian Friel

National Journal, October 6, 2006

The Law's Long Arms

In March of this year, a federal judge sentenced Dwight Whorley of Richmond, Va., to 20 years in prison after he was found guilty of a variety of child-pornography charges, including receiving 20 obscene Japanese anime cartoons. The case drew attention in child-protection circles because Whorley was the first person convicted under a 2003 federal statute that makes viewing such nonphotographic material a crime.

Whorley was also convicted of sending and receiving 20 obscene e-mails that described sex involving children. He had broken the federal law that prohibits online viewing of "any obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, motion-picture film, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of indecent character."

That federal statute is one of several that could come into play as the FBI's Washington Field Office and the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section run an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., and his online sexual activities with underage boys. The federal investigators, as well as state and local agents who may be brought into the case, will try to determine what Foley actually did, the jurisdiction in which he did it, the age of the boys involved, and what state or federal laws he might have violated. "You've got to look at specifics," said Robert Peters, president of Morality in Media, a New York-based anti-pornography group. "Where did the thing get sent from? If it was all in Washington, that eliminates Florida.... And if it's interstate, then you're back to the federal law."

DOJ_NMG_0078498

The federal laws potentially in play include an obscenity statute that prohibits the "transfer of obscene material to minors" and defines a minor as a child age 15 or younger. The youngest alleged recipient of sexually suggestive or sexually explicit messages from Foley was 16.

The statutes that Whorley was convicted of violating are based on the material itself, not on the age of the sender or receiver. Under such laws, juries determine whether community standards were violated and whether the material in question appeals to "prurient" interests.

Also in play are federal and state "coercion and enticement" statutes. Federal law prohibits adults from persuading -- or attempting to persuade -- children younger than 18 to engage in illegal sexual activity. Brian Doyle, a former public-affairs officer in the Homeland Security Department, pleaded no contest in Florida last month after being arrested for engaging in online discussions about a sexual rendezvous with a law enforcement agent posing as a 14-year-old girl.

If Foley attempted to arrange sexual encounters with anyone under the age of consent, he could face enticement charges. The age of consent is 16 in the District and 18 in Florida. If Foley stopped short of arranging physical encounters, his messages still might constitute a sex crime, depending on location. California law, for example, makes it a crime for an adult to send material designed to "arouse" and "seduce" a minor. Florida law prohibits adults from using a computer to transmit a statement "encouraging ... sexual conduct of or with any minor." The federal coercion statute, which could be applied in conjunction with various state laws, carries a mandatory minimum prison sentence of 10 years, according to child-protection expert Mary Leary, a visiting professor at Catholic University of America's law school.

Leary, who stressed that she wasn't commenting specifically on the Foley investigation, said prosecution of online child sex cases relies heavily on each case's details -- where the activities occurred, when they took place, and who was involved. "It really is a fact-specific, fact-driven inquiry," she said.

Experts in the laws dealing with obscenity and child exploitation generally say that federal and state statutes are adequate for dealing with most online predators. "We have some excellent federal laws," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel for Concerned Women for America, a conservative Washington advocacy group. "They need more vigorous enforcement."

Melanie Sloan, executive director of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, is a former sex-crimes prosecutor. In July, Sloan sent the FBI copies of e-mails from Foley that had "freaked out" a former congressional page -- the first Foley messages that became public last week. At the time, the FBI did not see evidence of a federal crime. "The law is a little tricky," Sloan said when asked how the government will decide whether to bring charges. "The way you do it is, you find out what he did."

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "takes any allegations of child exploitation extremely seriously. And he has directed those in charge of the inquiry to take all appropriate steps to get to the bottom of this unfortunate situation as soon as possible."

For Shimkus, Stain From Foley Scandal Could Linger (MCT)

By Alan Bjerga

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - With more than a million dollars to spend and 69 percent of the votes in his last election, Rep. John Shimkus may well survive the Mark Foley scandal at the ballot box.

But should voters re-elect the Illinois Republican next month, they might be returning to Washington a man whose congressional influence could be diminished permanently by the scandal.

The stain from his role as the head of the House Page Board while former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., was making advances toward pages could trail Shimkus for years, political analysts said. That will make it more difficult for him to rise in the House of Representatives' ranks to top committee or leadership assignments that benefit his district.

DOJ_NMG_0078499

"Even being associated with a scandal can irreparably harm a career," said Steven Smith, political science professor at Washington University in St. Louis.

Shimkus is reeling this week from charges that, as the head of the page board, he wasn't aggressive enough in investigating concerns about Foley's conduct.

In a Belleville News-Democrat interview earlier this week, Shimkus defended his actions in 2005, when he reacted to a page's parents' worries over an "overly friendly" e-mail that Foley had sent their son by simply telling Foley to stay away from pages.

Shimkus said that, based on the information he had, his response seemed reasonable. Now that more explicit and damaging messages have been revealed, second-guessing - from himself as well as critics - is to be expected.

"I only tell people what I did with the information I had available, and history will judge that," he told the News-Democrat.

Ross Baker, a longtime Democratic congressional staffer who now teaches at Rutgers University in New Jersey, said it remained to be seen whether the public would view Shimkus as a participant in a cover-up or as someone who was in the wrong place at the wrong time.

"He's clearly not the principal player in this," Baker said.

But whether or not Shimkus' actions are defensible, political damage-by-association appears inevitable.

"This will continue to be a big mark against him," Baker said.

Democrats say Shimkus should lose his seat for his role in the scandal. While his opponent in November, Dan Stover, said he would rather talk about differences on issues other than the scandal, he acknowledges that it's giving his campaign new life.

And after November, assuming Shimkus is re-elected, the scandal could ruin his ability ever to take a bigger role in the House, where he has served since 1997, Smith said.

"Even if it turns out he did everything right, Republicans won't ever want to read news stories that say, `Leader Shimkus, who was involved in the House page scandal ...'

"Politics is a lot about reputation," Smith continued. "Congress is a competitive place, and there are plenty of other legislators without baggage" competing with Shimkus for more power and projects for their districts.

"Any legislator touched by this will be disadvantaged within the House," Smith said.

Speculation Centers On A Republican Former Page (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Likable and popular with female pages, a committed Republican who even as a teenager knew how to parlay chance meetings into political friendships, Jordan Edmund has emerged as a key figure in the Foley page scandal.

The former House page has been targeted by conservative blogs as the young man on the receiving end of former representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit online instant messages, which have engulfed the GOP in a scandal that could affect the outcome of the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Edmund has hired a lawyer, Stephen Jones, who will not acknowledge whether his client was the one who corresponded extensively with Foley for nearly a year. Jones said he is going public with his client's name to help Edmund fend off conservative attacks and a barrage of media inquiries. He said he will represent Edmund when he is interviewed early next week by the FBI.

"I did not discuss the messages with him," Jones said. "I'm not saying they're his. At this time I don't know."

Jones declined to discuss his client's involvement in disclosing the instant messages to the news media.

"To me that's a side issue," he said. "The issue is whether Congressman Foley or anyone else violated the law, not whether Jordan had good judgment or not."

A student at the University of California at Berkeley, Edmund has taken time off this year to serve as deputy campaign manager on Rep. Ernest J. Istook Jr.'s campaign for Oklahoma governor. Edmund contacted Jones, a well-known Oklahoma City trial lawyer and Republican Party member who was appointed to represent Timothy McVeigh after the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. Jones said he believed fellow Republicans referred Edmund to him.

DOJ_NMG_0078500

The message transcripts show a humorous, sometimes self-conscious high school student who showed an easy familiarity with Foley. Engaged in a typical round of teen dances and lacrosse games, he at one point asked the congressman for help getting into a fundraiser for Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.).

Cunningham, who resigned from the House last year after pleading guilty to taking bribes, was Edmund's sponsor in the 2002 page program.

Edmund's MySpace entry, where he goes by "EDMO!," also mentions lacrosse and dancing among his interests. But chiefly, he wrote, "Politics is my passion; I love the game . . . I grew up all over the place but I call San Diego home."

In the instant messages, Foley mentions a San Diego meeting with the former page to whom he is writing.

In the section headed "Who I'd like to meet," Edmund says: "I don't know, but I do know who I don't want to meet. Stupid people, people who don't like politics (politicians make your [expletive] laws)."

Edmund's allegiance to the GOP, say some, raises one of the biggest questions about him: Why would a young man with seemingly such a bright future in the Republican Party save messages so potentially damaging to it?

"He's a very personable guy and . . . certainly a rising star," said one page who served with Edmund in 2002 and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The page said Edmund was known among some fellow pages that year for boasting of his friendship with Foley.

In recent days, some blogs have published reports that the exchanges were a prank and that the teen in the messages, who seems uncertain about his sexual orientation, was actually trying to solicit sexually suggestive messages from Foley.

In daily online exchanges with fellow former pages over the last week, the former page who served with Edmund said, "Someone commented that if it was indeed a prank then it's very upsetting and disappointing that Jordan would do that. It would have been insensitive to Foley's sexual orientation."

Jones, Edmund's lawyer, said: "It was not a prank, not a practical joke, that pages played on a congressman."

Edmund "demonstrated integrity" by agreeing to cooperate in the investigation, Jones said. "I don't think Jordan intended for any of this to become public.

"I think he'd like to have his privacy respected. I told him I thought he was a victim."

GOP Prods Democrats Over Foley Scandal (CNN)

CNN – GOP Dem Foley, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Faced with fending off the backlash from the Mark Foley scandal, House Republicans took the offensive Friday, asking Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and other Democrats to testify about whether they engaged in partisan trickery by releasing Foley's messages weeks before the midterm elections.

Top GOP leaders -- including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, of Illinois, and Majority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio -- have accused the Democrats of knowing about Foley's correspondences with teen pages, and waiting to release them until it was politically advantageous.

Foley, a Republican who represented a Florida district for six terms, resigned abruptly September 29 as allegations surfaced that he exchanged inappropriate e-mails and lurid text messages with underage pages. Democratic candidates are using the scandal as fodder in their campaign ads. Candidate Baron Hill, of Indiana, criticized Rep. Mike Sodrel, R-Indiana, for refusing to return contributions "from the House leadership who knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley." (Full story)

Foley's attorney said this week that his client acknowledges inappropriate exchanges with teen pages, but he "never, ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life."

Candidate Patty Wetterling, of Minnesota, who is in a tight race against Republican Michelle Bachmann, also focused on an alleged cover-up, according to a radio address she released.

Suspicion of a cover-up is common across the nation. In a Time magazine poll of 1,002 voting-age adults this week, 80 percent were aware of the scandal. Of those, two-thirds suspected a cover-up by GOP leaders, and only 16 percent approved of how Republicans handled the scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0078501

In a letter to Pelosi, which also was sent to Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean, Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Georgia, asked them to disclose whether Democrats played a role in publicizing Foley's correspondences.

"Just as it must be determined whether any Republican members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal Mr. Foley's activities, it must also be determined whether any Democrat members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal these same activities," Kingston wrote in a letter signed by 10 other GOP lawmakers.

Hastert has been on the front line of the fallout since he and other top Republicans were accused of knowing before 2005 about an "overly friendly" e-mail Foley sent to a teenage page. A conservative Washington newspaper even called for the speaker's resignation, a demand Hastert, of Illinois, rebuffed.

In a speech Thursday in Batavia, Illinois, Hastert denied the accusation, said he had "done nothing wrong" and refused to step down. He also suggested the timing of the release of the messages was a Democratic ploy to get the upper hand in November elections.

"Our friends on the other side of the aisle really don't have a story to tell, and maybe they're resolving to another way, to another political tactic," he said.

Hastert has asked the FBI to investigate, and the House Ethics Committee launched its own probe Thursday and authorized four dozen subpoenas. (Watch how the Foley scandal has changed the political landscape -- 2:10)

Top GOP leaders, including Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt, of Missouri, have rushed to Hastert's defense. Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, wrote a letter supporting Hastert, saying it was inappropriate to ask for the speaker's resignation when similar scandals in the 1980s prompted a "dramatically different standard."

Barton was referring to Democratic Reps. Gerry Studds of Massachusetts and Dan Crane of Illinois, both of whom were censured after having sexual relationships with 17-year-old pages. Crane lost his re-election bid, while Studds survived the scandal.

"No Democrat demanded prescience from Speaker Tip O'Neill, and no Democrat shouted for his resignation. Neither did any Republican," Barton wrote. "The focus was on the members who created the problem, as it should have been and as it should be now."

In a statement accompanying his letter to Pelosi, Kingston wrote that the Foley matter "should not be a partisan issue."

"All members of the House, our staff, and members of the public regardless of political party should come forward and provide whatever information they know," he wrote.

Pressure On Republicans Won't Ease (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As House Republicans struggle to contain the fallout from the Mark Foley page scandal, two coming court dates will push long-lingering lobbying misdeeds back into the headlines just before Election Day.

Next Friday, Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney is scheduled to enter guilty pleas to accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of trips, meals and other gifts in exchange for taking official action on behalf of clients of former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

On Oct. 27 -- less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 election -- David H. Safavian, a former White House official and Abramoff ally, is scheduled to be sentenced for his conviction, earlier this spring, on lying and obstruction-of-justice charges. Those also flowed from the Abramoff investigation.

The successive sentencings, combined with the continuing investigations of Mr. Foley -- and how House leaders handled his behavior -- provide "a clothesline" that Democrats can use to drive the scandal issue through the final days of the campaign, says David Gergen, an adviser to Republican and Democratic White Houses, who now teaches at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, dismisses that notion. "I still don't know of any member of Congress who has lost because of what another member did or didn't do," he said. "We believe congressional races are more about local and pocketbook issues."

The blending of the sex and lobbying scandals in the final weeks of the campaign will make it harder for Republican candidates to dismiss them as isolated incidents involving a few bad characters, says Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University. "When you have two or three big scandals going on at the same time, it becomes about the party," he says. "This is now about a broader theme of Republicans misusing their power. That's the link between Abramoff and Foley."

Some Republicans fear that congressional leaders may have made the issue more difficult politically, because they failed to take action on ethics legislation before adjourning this year.

When Mr. Abramoff in January pleaded guilty to attempting to bribe lawmakers with expensive trips, meals and sporting-event tickets, House Speaker Dennis Hastert vowed to pass tough ethics-reform legislation. A succession of guilty pleas in the Abramoff probe by high-level congressional aides seemed to provide some momentum for the push.

But after heavy lobbying from the business community, and a shift in media attention to other issues, the House leadership backed away. House Majority Leader John Boehner called a lobbyist travel ban "childish." That drained energy in April from any significant ethics legislation, including a ban on lobbyist-paid travel, and the creation of an independent Office of Professional Integrity. That office could have been charged with investigating allegations like those that swirled around former Florida Rep. Foley, whose sexually explicit messages to teenage pages set off the current firestorm.

Instead, House leaders threw their weight behind a less-restrictive bill that required greater disclosure of lobbyist gifts but didn't ban them. The legislation didn't match a bill passed by the Senate, and it never became law. "They made a farce out of the whole thing when they should have tightened down and clamped down," said Ed Rollins, a Republican strategist.

In private meetings, House leaders said they didn't feel pressed to pass a tougher measure because the issue didn't show up on public polls as a concern to voters, several lawmakers and aides said.

But in the wake of the Foley scandal, that could be changing. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll conducted in the past week found that about half of likely voters said scandal will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote. And by nearly 2-1, the respondents said they trust Democrats more than Republicans to clean up Congress.

"It was reckless," says Connecticut Republican Rep. Christopher Shays, a key sponsor of the ethics legislation, who is now locked in a fierce re-election campaign. "We were on the edge of a cliff, and they [House leaders] said, 'We're not over the cliff.' The Foley thing has pushed a lot of us over the cliff," he added.

Just months after House leaders took ethics legislation off the agenda, the Abramoff scandal captured its first elected official: Ohio's Mr. Ney. Last month, the Department of Justice announced a plea agreement with Mr. Ney: He will plead guilty to one count of conspiracy and one count of making false statements. He could face 10 years for the charges, but prosecutors are expected to seek a sentence of 27 months.

According to the agreement, Mr. Ney has admitted accepting from Mr. Abramoff free international and domestic trips -- including a golfing trip to Scotland. In exchange, Mr. Ney attached amendments to a bill to help an Abramoff client, and inserted statements beneficial to the lobbyist in the Congressional Record, Mr. Ney admitted.

Mr. Ney dropped his re-election bid in August shortly before the plea deal was announced, but he has not resigned from Congress, and House Republican leaders have refused calls to insist that he do so.

The Scotland trip featured in the Ney plea agreement was also highlighted in the obstruction trial of Mr. Safavian, the former top procurement officer for the White House. Prosecutors charged that Mr. Abramoff floated most of the costs of the golfing trip for Mr. Safavian, and provided other benefits such as free meals and box seats at sporting events. Mr. Safavian was convicted of helping, in exchange, Mr. Abramoff and his clients who were seeking government property. Mr. Safavian, 38 years old, faces as much as 20 years in prison and about $1 million in fines.

Troubled Ethics Panel Tackles Scandal (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

The committee looking at the handling of the Foley case has been under fire for months.

WASHINGTON — The House Ethics Committee has had little to say as one scandal after another has rocked Capitol Hill since early 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0078503

Now, can a panel that has been derided as a symbol of congressional dysfunction take up a tough, politically sensitive case a month before an election and produce results within weeks, as promised?

Skeptics abound.

"We don't have a lot of confidence in the Ethics Committee," said James Benton of the public watchdog group Common Cause.

The committee launched an investigation Thursday into the House GOP leadership's handling of a scandal involving sexually explicit communications that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to teenage pages. It has prepared nearly four dozen subpoenas for records and testimony, and its leaders are promising to go wherever the evidence takes them.

But the investigation follows months of attacks on the committee by those who say it failed to aggressively investigate the dealings of lobbyist Jack Abramoff and other scandals.

The committee's last major action — admonishing then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) — was two years ago. Afterward, the Ethics Committee chairman was booted from the panel.

"The last time the committee did its job … it had its head chopped off," Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer, a longtime champion of ethics reform, said Friday, calling it "not exactly a good sign" for the job ahead. He has called for the committee to appoint an outside counsel to investigate.

While the DeLay case was considered politically sensitive, this one could be tougher. It involves looking into what House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other lawmakers knew about Foley's activities, when, and how they responded.

The investigation also is being conducted in the heat of a partisan fight for control of Congress. On Friday, New Jersey Republican Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. called for Hastert to resign as speaker. And Democrats plan to discuss the scandal in their radio address today.

Most of Hastert's House GOP colleagues appear to be standing by him. Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas) sent a letter Friday urging fellow Republicans to wait for the results of the investigations. "Then we can judge everyone's actions for ourselves, based on facts instead of frenzy or ambition," he wrote.

The investigation comes as a new AP-Ipsos poll, conducted after the sex scandal broke, found that about half of likely voters polled thought that recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress would be very or extremely important to their vote in the November elections.

A new poll by the Pew Research Center, however, found that the scandal had not significantly affected the midterm race. In interviews before the scandal broke, the poll found Democrats were favored over Republicans for Congress, 51% to 38%, among registered voters. That was essentially unchanged in the days after Foley resigned.

The congressional probe also comes as the FBI conducts a separate criminal investigation that could affect the willingness of witnesses to cooperate with the Ethics Committee.

On Friday, the lawyer for a former Hill page from California identified as having traded messages with Foley said his client would be willing to answer questions from the ethics panel and the FBI. "Clearly, he wishes he had never been a House page," attorney Stephen Jones told CNN. "Nevertheless, his name has been brought into it. He wants to cooperate with the investigation. Whatever he is asked he will testify under oath truthfully to what he knows. It is up to others to know if it is relevant."

Given the committee's recent track record, few expect results soon. Hardly anyone expects a report before the November election.

"One of the problems is that the Ethics Committee has been somewhat dormant for a while," said Larry Noble, a Washington lawyer who specializes in ethics issues. "So it's hard to have a real sense of what it's capable of doing."

But Rep. Howard L. Berman of Valley Village, the committee's top Democrat, said in an interview Friday that since he rejoined the panel in the spring, "there is a lot more going on" within the committee than people realize, but that he couldn't publicly discuss it. And despite the committee's paralysis for much of 2005, Berman said, "As slow and as torturous as the process appears to be, the fact is if you look at the last 20 years, a number of careers have been ended by virtue of committee actions."

DOJ_NMG_0078504

The panel, known officially as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, operates largely in secret. On Friday, committee officials declined any comment, including on whom they planned to summon to the committee's meeting room in the Capitol Hill basement, though it is expected to interview House GOP leaders and perhaps Foley and former pages.

The investigative subcommittee will be made up of committee Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.), Berman and Reps. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.) and Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio). Anyone summoned before the committee may be represented by an attorney and invoke the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

The committee, the only one in the House evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, was paralyzed for more than a year. Rep. Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia stepped down earlier this year as the top Democrat after his conduct came under scrutiny, and ethics watchdogs had new hope for the committee after Berman was named as his replacement.

It was an "honor I could have done without," Berman quipped at the time.

The committee in May launched investigations into the activities of Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.), and into whether other House members were involved in the dealings of now-imprisoned former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe). None of those probes have yet resulted in public reports.

Victim Advocates, Fla. Diocese Urge Foley To Name Alleged Abuser (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

The Roman Catholic diocese of Palm Beach, Fla., and national advocacy groups for victims of sexual abuse called yesterday for former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to give police the name of the clergyman who allegedly abused him as a teenager.

"He should absolutely report the perpetrator, living or dead," said David Clohessy, national director of the 7,000-member Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests. "He should do it now, not when his civil lawyer says it is convenient. Every day that a molester walks free is a day when he can hurt other kids."

Foley's attorney, David Roth, told reporters Tuesday that the former congressman, who was raised as a Catholic, was molested by a clergyman when he was 13 to 15 years old. But Roth did not name the clergyman, and Palm Beach police said they have not received any report of the abuse.

Alexis Walkenstein, a spokeswoman for the Palm Beach diocese, said Foley has not reported the abuse to local Catholic Church officials, either.

"It would be inappropriate to comment, because at this time we've only heard a vague allegation. If Mr. Foley was abused within the Catholic Church, we would encourage him to report it to law enforcement," she said.

Foley, 52, abruptly resigned his House seat a week ago and checked into an alcohol treatment center after lewd electronic messages that he sent to teenage former congressional pages were made public.

Clohessy said Foley "has the same responsibility that every citizen has to report crimes." He said that police and prosecutors have become more aggressive and successful at prosecuting older cases of sexual abuse and that Foley is "in no position to determine whether prosecution is possible."

"Every single day, we tell victims: Tell the police, tell the police. Because every so often, someone provides that extra bit of information that allows a prosecutor to make a case," Clohessy said. "Even if the perpetrator is dead, those who enabled or covered up the crimes might be prosecuted."

William J. Brooks, a Palm Beach Town Council member who is a former Catholic priest and a friend of Foley's, said it was "outrageous" that Roth pinpointed the years of the abuse without naming the abuser. In 1969 and 1970, Foley attended Cardinal Newman High School, a parochial school where Brooks was on the faculty.

"Get the name out there and let the legal process unfold. And clear the names of the other clergy people back in the early 1970s," Brooks said.

Theresa LePore, the former Palm Beach County elections supervisor who designed the "butterfly ballot" that stirred national controversy in the 2000 presidential election, is now director of development at Cardinal Newman High. She was also a classmate of Foley's.

DOJ_NMG_0078505

She said she does not remember him and never heard of any molestation cases when she was a student at the school, which at the time was run by a religious order, the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate.

Amid Growing Scandal, Former Pages Defend Program (MCT)

By Kevin Diaz And Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - Andy Brehm's job as a congressional page got him into President Clinton's dramatic 1998 State of the Union speech, at the start of the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal.

Gina Schilmoeller, another former page from Minnesota, went to a party on Randy "Duke" Cunningham's infamous yacht, the "Duke Stir," years before it became a top exhibit in the bribery case that put the congressman in prison.

Lauren Farrelly and Ashley Foster, former pages from Texas, have their own lasting recollections. Farrelly, who served as a House page this summer, shook hands with the Iraqi prime minister. Foster, a House page in 1999-2000, stood elbow to elbow with political celebrities most Americans see only on TV.

For them and for generations of other pages, the experience was a once-in-a-lifetime chance to get a sneak peek at the backstage of history, sometimes before it was made.

Most regard their service as a life-shaping experience. And they're eager to defend the program in a growing scandal evolving around sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages that disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley exchanged with House pages.

"I just hate that the page program is getting bad press," Foster said. "I don't think there is one member of my page class that would tell you anything negative about the program."

James Kotecki, of Raleigh, N.C., a page from January to June 2003, said that when he heard of the scandal with Foley last week, he was shocked. Then he began to fear what might happen to the program.

"I don't want this to be shining a negative light on this program," said Kotecki, who's now a senior at Georgetown University in Washington. "I felt very, very safe. I was never aware of any inappropriate interaction with members and pages."

Citing concerns over the well-being of the approximately 100 high school pages who work in Washington, some House members have suggested putting the 150-year-old program on hold.

The House Clerk's Office, which runs the program, says it's looking for ways to better protect the pages, who serve as congressional gofers and live in a dorm-style environment near the U.S. Capitol.

"We're going to ... step back and re-examine the program as it stands and decide if they need to make changes," spokeswoman Salley Collins said.

Rep. Betty McCollum, D-Minn., who sponsored a page last year, said new safeguards needed to be put in place: "Parents, before they send their children to Washington, should know that Congress is going to take measures to protect them."

Sex abuse victims' groups question whether congressional leaders in either party, who've been embroiled in a bitter fight for political advantage, are in the best position to propose reforms.

"What leaps out at me is that the oversight body consists of the very officials most apt to abuse and cover it up," said David Clohessy, the national director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, one of the nation's leading sex abuse-victims advocacy groups. "For starters, the ongoing Catholic abuse crisis has taught us yet again that no institution can police itself."

Teenage pages are part of daily life in the Capitol, scurrying along hallways with papers and messages for their bosses, easily identifiable by their neatly pressed white shirts and navy blazers. Nominated by home-state lawmakers, they're often chosen because of outstanding grades or community service.

Dozens of politicians got their start as pages, including Colorado Gov. Bill Owens, Sens. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn. and Mark Pryor, D-Ark., and Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich. Microsoft founder Bill Gates was a 15-year-old House page in 1972 and has described the experience as "an exciting opportunity."

Virtually all ex-pages have stories about their brushes with history, but for sheer drama few can match that of Altho A. Allen, who's now a 71-year-old retiree in San Antonio. He was on the House floor in 1954 when four Puerto Rican nationalists stood up in the gallery and sprayed gunfire into a chamber milling with lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0078506

Allen, recalling the incident in a telephone interview, said he heard "some popping noises" and saw a congressman fall, one of five who were wounded in the attack. Allen said he then helped House Speaker Joe Martin and the parliamentarian flee the chamber.

Living in triple rooms, pages occupy the very bottom of the political food chain in Washington and generally appreciate any direct interaction with members of Congress, who are the city's rock stars.

"We really didn't have that much unsupervised contact with House members," said Brehm, a University of Minnesota law school student and former press secretary for Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "What little time you spent with them was usually on the House floor."

The daily routine, which includes chaperones, monitored government computers, a buddy system and 10 p.m. weekday curfews, reflects the scandals of a previous generation in Congress.

One involved Rep. Dan Crane, R-Ill., who admitted to sexual relations with a 17-year-old female page. Another ensnared Rep. Gerry Studds, D-Mass., who acknowledged a sexual relationship with a 17-year-old male page.

Beginning with the 6:45 a.m. start of page school, five days a week, and ending with the adjournment of Congress, sometimes late at night, a page's life can be a long grind of schoolwork, running errands and delivering documents.

"You didn't have enough time to get homesick," Farrelly said.

Even with the restrictions and sometimes menial duties, the rewards of working in the Capitol and watching the nation's political machinery offer once-in-a lifetime advantages, said Foster, who's now a graduate student at George Washington University in Washington.

"I learned what you can't learn from a textbook," she said. "It opened the door to the rest of my life."

Debate Turns To Future Of Page Program (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And Moises Mendoza

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Some call for its end, saying lawmakers can't be trusted. Others, including past pages, defend what has long been a Hill institution.

WASHINGTON — When Republican representatives hooked up for a conference call this week to discuss the political crisis over former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to former pages, the most heated discussion was not over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the matter, but over the future of the congressional page program.

"They all supported the speaker," said one participant in the call. "It got tense over whether the entire page program should be abolished."

A few lawmakers, notably Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), have suggested that the program be scrapped. "Send the pages home," he said, noting at one point that it's "pretty obvious" lawmakers can't be trusted around them.

But after Congress scrubs off the latest tarnish, the venerable program is likely to persevere. For senators and representatives, it's a much-cherished perk that they can bestow on the children of constituents. For former pages, who ardently defend the program, it's an inspirational opportunity to see politicians at work in the cloakrooms of power.

"For every page failed by a congressman, there is a page who turned out to be a congressman," Kevin O'Connor, a Republican page in the summer of 2003, wrote in an e-mail. "I left the page program with a broadened perspective, a wildly diverse array of friends and no regrets."

There are currently 63 House pages and 30 Senate pages, mostly 16-year-olds. They attend high school starting at 6 a.m. and then run errands for Congress — answering phones, taking messages, delivering documents — often late into the night, when they return to secured dorms to finish their homework.

Foley's sexually explicit messages have recalled the program's lowest point, in 1983, when two House members were censured for sexual relationships with pages. A six-member board made up of lawmakers and staffers was then set up to oversee the program. But in this case, only one of the three congressional members was told about Foley's messages.

Hastert has rebuffed calls to suspend or end the program. Instead, he said Thursday that he was looking "for a person of high caliber to advise us." He also set up a tip line to report inappropriate behavior toward pages.

The patronage program has a long history, starting with a 9-year-old appointed by Sen. Daniel Webster of Massachusetts in 1829. It's a favorite of the Capitol's 535 politicians because it allows them to reward promising students — and sometimes the scions of powerful political allies.

For years, Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, visited Gordon Tech High School in Chicago to select two pages to join him in Washington for the school year. On the Senate side, Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), who served the longest in the upper chamber, brought new pages to his office from South Carolina every month.

These days, the page program is more regulated and has strict merit requirements — students can't be appointed unless they have 3.0 grade-point averages and letters of recommendation from community leaders.

But the families of some pages are politically well-connected.

Robert Rose, a Senate page in 2002 and now a senior at Georgetown University, said his mother's cousin was a political memorabilia expert who became friends with an aide to Thurmond, who nominated Rose. "This sort of thing is very typical," he said. "I only knew of one or two people in my page class who did not have some sort of prior connection to somebody in office."

But Shyanna Hughes of Los Angeles said just a few in her class arrived through connections. "It was kind of obvious: 'OK, they have a lot of money. OK, her dad is the governor of a state,' " said Hughes, who was a page in 1997. "You could definitely tell there were some there, but I would say it was a very low percentage."

Most of the pages during the 1992-93 school year had no ties to politicians, said Naomi Wallace, who was appointed by Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles). "I had one roommate from Michigan who competed against 3,000 applicants and another from West Virginia whose family income was $20,000 a year," said Wallace, who is shopping around a book about her year in Washington.

Mindful of the political calendar, Wallace, now a theater arts student in London, dismissed talk of scrapping the program as rhetoric timed for the midterm elections. "In my opinion, 16-year-olds should not be punished because the Republicans are afraid of losing their majority in the House," she said.

Wallace said pages were warned to be wary. "Sexwise, we were constantly reminded about the scandal from a few years prior," she said.

James Kotecki, of Raleigh, N.C., remembers that the pages at his orientation in 2003 were told to address lawmakers formally. But he said the informal conversations the politicians initiated were among the most rewarding experiences. "They just made us love politics even more, to see it at an up-close level," said Kotecki, now at Georgetown University. "If they feel they can't have informal contact with us, the pages would lose a very valuable experience."

The rules on fraternization are so strict that one page said even his mother had to prove who she was to see him.

"When my mom came, she had to sign me out, show ID and talk to my proctor before she could take me out," said Richard Frohlichstein, who served as a page from Missouri. "When someone asks me about the program, I can never think of a negative thing."

The idea that one congressman's lewd behavior toward male pages could jeopardize the existence of the program has alarmed its graduates.

Zack Hall, a University of Texas sophomore who was a House page in 2004, has launched "Save the Congressional Page Program" on the networking site Facebook.com.

"I think getting rid of the page program would be avoiding the problem," he said. "The problem is, members of Congress are powerful people and we need to protect pages, not just get rid of it."

This view is shared by some powerful ex-pages — members of Congress.

"It's just as good a program now as it was for me in 1938," said Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), a former page who was first elected in 1955 and is now the most senior member of Congress. "Asking if we should suspend the page program is the wrong question. We should be asking what has happened to Congress that would bring us to even consider ending this terrific opportunity for talented teenagers."

nicole.gaouette@latimes.com

moises.mendoza@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0078508

Times staff writers Sandy Banks in Los Angeles and Janet Hook, Johanna Neuman and Maura Reynolds in Washington and researcher Vicki Gallay in Los Angeles contributed to this report.

The Foley Fires (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

We hope that when the Mark Foley story expires, the Washington political community will step back to reflect. It is generally argued that stories such as this gain prominence because the news is slow. But the news cycle is not slow. Russia is imposing trade and travel restrictions on an independent nation (see the editorial on Georgia nearby1). It was possible as we went to press yesterday that North Korea this weekend would carry out an underground nuclear-weapon test; and if it does, how should the U.S. respond? This story was deep inside the major newspapers yesterday, while the Foley flap covered their front pages.

Mr. Foley's activities with congressional pages, described so far as exchanges of sexually explicit emails and instant messages, were vile. The Republicans should have notified the Democrat on the Page Board. Mr. Foley should have been barred from contact with pages. He has resigned. He is being criminally investigated. If, however, the modern media forces in play over the Foley affair can conspire to submerge all other political life, then batten down the hatches for the 2008 presidential election. The 2004 election will look like toy boats on the water.

Sexually Explicit Communications Rock Congress3

Most likely, the Foley fire will burn on. The House Ethics Committee has issued some four dozen subpoenas. They will learn something about who knew what when. This gasoline will be leaked. And given the volatility of the subject, the fire could burn well beyond the Speaker's office.

One useful lesson may be we'll find that the House "system" that should have caught this problem is in fact a bloated bureaucracy of staffs for committees upon subcommittees created to oversee every nook in the federal empire. It is not beyond imagining that the private life of Mark Foley could slip through. Would it be reprehensible if true? Yes. Shocking?

Speaker Hastert should not resign before the election. It would be a disservice to send voters to the polls in five weeks amid tumult over Mark Foley. Those for whom this is a deciding issue should certainly vote on it. Our view is that the country would be better served with a clearer sense of the electorate's sentiment on dealing with the global threat and domestic well-being. Those are fit subjects of a serious national election.

My Poppy, Mr. President (NSWK)

By Jessica Bennett, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 7, 2006

Doro Bush Koch talks about her new book—and growing up in a presidential family. WEB EXCLUSIVE

As president, George H.W. Bush faced a starkly changing world: the Berlin Wall came down and the cold war ended after 40 tense years. He overthrew the corrupt regime of Panama's Manuel Noriega and invaded Iraq (without ousting Saddam Hussein) to protect Kuwait in a 100-hour war. As a father and younger man, he dealt with the daily challenges of raising five young children, as well as the tragic death of his daughter from leukemia at age 4. Now at 82, a new book—written by the former president's only living daughter—highlights Bush's life beyond his political career.

"My Father, My President" (Warner) takes an inside look at the personal stories, family memories and intimate challenges that remained largely out of the public eye during Bush's presidential years. Dorothy (Doro) Bush Koch, spoke with NEWSWEEK's Jessica Bennett about her father's legacy. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: What does this book tell us about your father than we may not have known?

Doro Bush Koch: My dad reached the highest pinnacle of his career when he became president, but he also had some low points, such as the death of a daughter. We have a firsthand account of when my dad was shot down on Sept. 2, 1944, which I think is very fascinating. But I hope people will learn how he coped not only with the good times but with the bad times with sort of dignity and grace.

What were your family dynamics growing up—did you ever think your father or brother would be president?

I never really thought that—it just sort of evolved and happened. But we have a very close-knit family, my brothers all played Little League, so we didn't ever dream really that anything like that would happen. But when it did happen it wasn't a surprise.

DOJ_NMG_0078509

I know your sister died before you were born, but what kind of an impact did her death have on your family.

The thing about Robin, it was obviously very, very sad for my parents. But on the other hand, looking back, they only have happy memories of Robin. Her life has really inspired my parents to do so much for cancer research, so her life has really been a blessing in a way. Many families break apart over the death of a child, but my parents grew stronger and were able to make good out of her short little life.

What does the book say about the relationship between your mother and father?

There's one story in the book that I really love. After he became president, my dad was knighted by Queen Elizabeth. And, my dad said to my mom one day, "What's it like to live with a real live knight?" And my mom turned to him and said, "Make the coffee, Sir George." That's sort of typical of their rapport.

Is there any childhood story you remember that really gives a sense of the type of father George H.W. Bush was?

When I moved to Washington [at age 8] and my dad was entering the House of Representatives, school was starting and my dad brought my two brothers and I to Washington to start school. I was very worried because in Houston, the girls wore short socks, and I wasn't sure if they wore knee socks in the Northeast or short socks. My dad went across the street to the neighbors and rang the doorbell, because he'd heard a little girl there was going to be in my class, and he asked the neighbors if the girls were wearing short or long socks. I love that story because it's just kind of sweet.

Why hasn't your father written his own memoirs?

He has such a full life and he's constantly out there doing things for other people, you've seen him with President Clinton, doing all his work for the tsunami and Katrina [victims], he really doesn't put aside much time for writing a book.

Describe your father's relationship with Bill Clinton, his onetime rival.

A friend of mine told me once, "If your father invites Bill Clinton to Kennebunkport then I'll know he's really lost it." And then sure enough the very next weekend, he got invited up to Kennebunkport, and he's been twice already. They have a genuinely warm friendship based on the bond of both being former presidents and both wanting to get out in the world and do something good. President Clinton is very respectful of my dad. When they traveled [together after] the tsunami, my dad's chief of staff told me that if there were rough roads they were walking on, President Clinton would take my dad's arm and [be] very tender in making sure he was taken care of. That says a lot to me, and I think that's very sweet.

What has it been like, on a personal level, seeing your father and brother picked apart by critics over the years?

It's hard in both cases, as you can imagine, because politics—for someone who's related to a president—is very personal. It's hard, and I talk a lot about that in the book. You know, sometimes the media has a narrative about something, and they decide that someone's going to be out of touch or something like that and they find stories to fill that narrative, and then it becomes sort of a false history.

Was it kind of crazy growing up in such a political family?

It's kind of amazing when I think about it. I don't think about it very much, I have four children, I'm very busy. I've been able to see history from the front row in many cases, which has been a real thrill for me. I feel very lucky.

Do you call your brother George or Mr. President?

I call him Mr. President, with affection though. He doesn't ask me to, but I do just out of respect for the office, something my dad had taught me early on. He has great respect for the presidency. So it's Mr. President, but with affection.

Was there ever a time when you flatly disagreed with one of your dad's or brother's policies?

Probably.

Was that something you'd raise with them or keep to yourself?

Yeah, sure, we'd talk about all kinds of things. But I don't want to make it news reported in NEWSWEEK.

Your husband is a Democrat. Has that caused political debates over the years?

It's been fine. A lot of Democrats marry Republicans and it works out just fine.

Your father was president, your brother is president, another brother is a governor, and your parents' late dog wrote a best seller. Is that a lot to live up to?

No, not at all. One of the things that I love about my dad is that he loves you if you're a governor, he loves you if you're a mom, he loves you if you're a banker, whatever you are. He really was a father first, so there wasn't any pressure in any way.

DOJ_NMG_0078510

What's the one thing you hope people can take away from your father's life?

There's a chapter in the book called "Master of the Small Gesture," that no matter who you are and what you do in life you can always take the time to call someone who's down and out or write a note to cheer someone up. It's the little things in life that make the enormous difference, and that's something my father's very, very good at.

Mrs. Clinton Hits Road To Support The Party (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — Underscoring her national ambitions and the weakness of her opposition in New York as she runs for a second term, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is mounting a major push for Democratic Congressional candidates across the nation during the final weeks of the fiercely contested midterm elections, her aides said on Friday.

Mrs. Clinton, who has been occasionally criticized by liberal bloggers for not using enough of her bulging campaign coffers to help her party, is shipping $1.5 million to two Democratic Congressional campaign committees based in Washington, as well as to the financially strained New York State Democratic Party, her advisers said.

Mrs. Clinton is giving $1.1 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which comes on top of the $1 million that she gave the committee last month. In addition, the senator is donating $250,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and $150,000 to the New York State Democratic Party.

At the same time, Mrs. Clinton also plans to campaign for nearly 20 candidates in about a dozen states, occupying time she could have otherwise used to campaign for herself in New York, where she faces a little known and poorly financed Republican challenger, John Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers.

Among the places where Mrs. Clinton plans to appear are Ohio and Pennsylvania, two important presidential battleground states, where she will campaign for House and Senate Democratic candidates. Mrs. Clinton alsowill be in Virginia, New Jersey, Florida, Nevada, Rhode Island and Minnesota.

But Mrs. Clinton will also be touching her bases in New York, where she will be campaigning and fund-raising on behalf of House candidates in the Albany region, the Finger Lakes region and the Utica region. Mrs. Clinton will also hold a $200,000 fund-raiser for the State Democratic Party in New York City next week.

Her advisers say that Mrs. Clinton is motivated by her desire to bolster her party's political prospects this November. "She is committed to winning back the House and the Senate," said Patti Solis Doyle, the executive director of Friends of Hillary, the senator's political committee.

But for Mrs. Clinton, a possible 2008 presidential candidate, there is an obvious benefit to playing such a prominent role nationally: an opportunity to curry favor with Democratic candidates around the country who can, in turn, be helpful to her in a national campaign. In the case of the Senate Democratic committee for example, Mrs. Clinton has given far more money than any other Democrat who is considering running for the presidency.

Mr. Spencer, who is far behind Mrs. Clinton in public opinion polls and fund-raising, wasted little time in trying to use her efforts on the national stage against her.

Robert Ryan, a spokesman for the Spencer campaign, said Mrs. Clinton had an obligation to level with New Yorkers about the prospect that she might have to cut her second term in the Senate short to leave for the presidency.

"It's obvious Hillary Clinton is running for president," he said. "She needs to tell New Yorkers if she will serve out her term if she is re-elected. It's a simple yes or no. And voters deserve to know."

The more than $2 million that Mrs. Clinton is donating from her own campaign war chest is on top of the roughly $18 million that Mrs. Clinton's advisers say she has helped individual candidates and party committees raise in the 2005-6 election cycle.

Still, Mrs. Clinton, who has about $22 million in her own campaign account, has been the target of criticism from some liberals who have said she should do more to help the party since her own race is not competitive.

DOJ_NMG_0078511

The new round of donations from Mrs. Clinton comes at a time when some national Democratic leaders are openly worried that the huge fund-raising edge that Republicans enjoy could cloud the otherwise favorable political environment that Democrats are facing as Election Day approaches.

In an interview, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is heading the Democrats' effort to win the Senate, said he recently sat down with Mrs. Clinton, his junior colleague from New York, and made a personal appeal for help. "She said, 'I am not going to let you down,' and she sure didn't," Mr. Schumer said. "The money makes a big difference to us and could not come at a better time."

Mrs. Clinton's campaign also reported on Friday that she and her husband raised $2.5 million during a fund-raiser this week that the couple played host to at Whitehaven, their home here in Washington on Whitehaven Street near Embassy Row. The money was for the Democrats' Senate and House committees.

General Endorses Lamont, Faulting Lieberman On Iraq (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

STORRS, Conn., Oct. 6 — Gen. Wesley K. Clark criticized Senator Joseph I. Lieberman on Friday, accusing him of having "rubber-stamped" the Bush administration's Iraq policies, and he questioned Mr. Lieberman's understanding of military issues, during campaign appearances with Ned Lamont, the Democratic nominee for United States Senate.

During a rally at the University of Connecticut, General Clark offered a strong endorsement of Mr. Lamont, saying that he would be "the key to changing the course in this country." General Clark, who is retired from the Army, is one of several potential candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 who has campaigned for Mr. Lamont.

"We're not winning the war on terror," General Clark said during the rally. "George Bush says stay the course; how can you stay the course when you're in a ditch? Joe Lieberman — he's been a part of that ditch. The truth is, he didn't exactly control the steering wheel, but he was sort of supporting the elbow of the guy who drove us into the ditch."

About 300 people turned out for the campus rally, a few waving handmade signs saying "Ned for Change." A few dozen Lieberman supporters also attended, and workers for his campaign passed out large hats in the shape of a light bulb that read "Ned Lamont has no idea."

Mr. Lieberman spent the day in the New Haven area, continuing his efforts to appeal to middle-class voters. He proposed increasing college tuition tax credits, and he promoted two proposals he has introduced in the Senate, which would triple tax deductions for college tuition and more than double the maximum federal Pell Grant award.

Mr. Lieberman said the increases could be paid for by rolling back Bush administration tax cuts.

Earlier in the day, General Clark, who ran against Mr. Lieberman in the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries, spoke to veterans at a McDonald's in Derby. Many of them said they supported Mr. Lamont, but others said they respected Mr. Lieberman's experience.

General Clark recalled that when he was the supreme commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the 1990's, he briefed Mr. Lieberman and other members of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I thought he understood, but he didn't understand," General Clark said of Mr. Lieberman. "All that experience, he still rubber-stamped the Bush administration going into Iraq. I like Joe, but I am very disappointed."

Mr. Lieberman called that characterization "just wrong," saying that he had criticized the Bush administration's handling of the Iraq insurgency since the 2003 invasion.

During the rally, Mr. Lamont cited a recent National Intelligence Estimate that suggested that the war in Iraq was inflaming terrorists.

"They told us this war is weakening America; they told us this war is making us less secure," Mr. Lamont said of the federal report, asserting that the Bush administration has been ignoring growing criticism of the war from military experts.

"Every course must have an end," Mr. Lamont told the crowd, adding: "Only the Iraqis can solve this for themselves. We can't impose this peace in a barrel of a gun. Our troops have done everything you can humanly ask them to do."

DOJ_NMG_0078512

Mr. Lamont has said he would support a deadline or a timeline for withdrawing most troops from Iraq, though he says some troops should stay for "humanitarian efforts."

Mr. Lieberman said he respected General Clark, adding: "We disagree on some things, we agree on some things. Endorsements come and go in politics." But he questioned whether the general supported Mr. Lamont's proposal to begin withdrawing front-line combat troops.

Speaking to reporters after the rally, General Clark did not make clear whether he would support a timeline or a deadline, saying there "may be a place for a timeline." He said that it would not be possible to win militarily in Iraq and that the United States should negotiate with all countries in the Middle East.

Mr. Lieberman opposes implementing a timeline for troop withdrawal, saying that to do so would embolden insurgents. He has said the United States should do more to train Iraqi troops to help bring American troops home more quickly.

Steele's Ad Seemingly At Odds With Fundraising (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

In a recent commercial advertising his bid for U.S. Senate, Maryland Republican Michael S. Steele tells voters that his opponent, Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, has been tainted by contributions from pharmaceutical companies and special interests.

"Congressman Cardin took money from drug companies," Steele says. "I want to ban gifts from special interests."

The ad does not mention that less than a week before the commercial began airing, a top drug company executive and an industry lobbyist hosted a $1,000-a-person fundraiser for Steele at a K Street steakhouse in Washington.

The invitation to the fundraiser, obtained by The Washington Post, says the Sept. 20 lunch reception was to be hosted by Sally Walsh, a director of federal government relations at GlaxoSmithKline, and Michael Carozza, a lobbyist for Bristol-Myers Squibb.

It advises donors to send contributions to lobbyist Frederick T. Dombo III, who identifies himself on his Web site as a Steele campaign volunteer. Federal records show that Dombo represents AmerisourceBergen Specialty Group, one of the largest pharmaceutical services companies in the country.

"I think, charitably, you'd have assume people will look at this and say this guy is being hypocritical," said Donald Norris, a political science professor at the University of Maryland Baltimore County. "How can he slam the other guy if he's doing the same thing?"

Neither Dombo nor Walsh returned calls to their offices. Carozza would not comment.

The Steele campaign rejects suggestions that it was hypocritical, pointing to a line in the ad that draws a key distinction between the candidates. "I support cheaper medicine from Canada," Steele says in the ad. Cardin took the money "and voted against cheaper medicine."

"One of these two candidates does not dance to the tune of Washington special interests, and it's Michael Steele," said Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye.

The reimportation issue is significant to drug industry lobbyists, who vehemently oppose allowing U.S. citizens to purchase drugs from Canada. Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s administration has voiced safety concerns about reimportation. One of the lobbyists who attended the Steele fundraiser expressed surprise that Steele would run an ad supporting the policy.

The lobbyist said he and others had considerable concern about having donated to Steele, only to learn days later of his position. The lobbyist spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid angering Steele.

The lobbyist said Steele's campaign reassured him that his position was consistent with existing law. But Heye said that's not the case.

"He supports the safe reimportation of prescription drugs to reduce the cost," Heye said. "The key word there is 'reduce.' Current law doesn't do that. In his ad, he makes it very clear. If lobbyists or special interests are upset because of that position, so be it."

DOJ_NMG_0078513

Cardin spokesman Oren Shur said: "Michael Steele made promises to his special interest friends and pocketed their money. Six days later he told Maryland families something different. Whose side is Michael Steele on?"

The Steele commercial, which aired Sept. 26, marked the first negative turn in his advertising campaign, coming in response to a spot by national Democrats that painted the Republican candidate as being in President Bush's hip pocket.

But the line of attack against Cardin was not new. In news releases and interviews, state Republican Party officials have been criticizing Cardin's financial ties to the drug companies. They gave him heat for asserting in a television ad that he has "taken on the drug companies, the oil companies, the insurance companies."

Records showed Cardin had accepted checks from political action committees representing six large pharmaceutical companies, 22 oil and energy outfits, 27 insurance firms and industry associations, and eight HMOs.

At last report, Cardin's accounts contained more than $874,826 from political action committees, many of them pushing the interests of large corporations, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which compiles such data. Steele's contributions included $613,578 from PACs.

Attention to the role of special interests escalated yesterday when the state Republican Party issued a news release accusing Cardin of letting lobbyists write key portions of pension legislation he sponsored.

"It is the height of hypocrisy for Congressman Cardin to say he will stand up to special interests -- and claim to oppose special interests' writing legislation -- when his own legislation was handwritten by corporate lobbyists," said GOP Chairman John Kane.

Norris said the conflict between Steele's assertions in the commercial and his fundraising presents a more potent political issue because it compounds a problem that has dogged Steele the entire campaign -- whether he can square his portrayal of himself as a Washington outsider with his long-standing ties to big name Washington insiders.

Although Steele rarely mentions his party affiliation in public, he served as state GOP chairman, spoke at the Republican National Convention in 2004 and campaigned across the country for Bush. Bush, Vice President Cheney, aide Karl Rove and others helped enlist Steele to run and raised more than $1 million for his campaign.

Dean Laments Lack Of Diversity (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday said that Maryland's Democratic ticket should have had a black or other minority at the top, but added that the national party isn't to blame for the lack of diversity.

"I do think there should be more diversity on this ticket," Mr. Dean said during a visit to the Maryland Democratic Party's campaign headquarters in Hyattsville.

However, Mr. Dean said that the national party bears no responsibility for Maryland's Democratic ticket, which offers four white men for the state's top offices -- the U.S. Senate, governor, attorney general and comptroller.

"We don't interfere in primaries," he said of the DNC.

The Washington Times yesterday reported that black business owners and religious leaders have expressed discontent with the Maryland Democratic Party's lack of black statewide candidates and said it will encourage support for Republicans -- especially Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's run for the U.S. Senate.

In addition, the Baltimore Sun reported Thursday that Maryland's 10 black state senators met last week with U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee for the Senate, and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor, to complain about the lack of diversity at the top of the statewide ticket.

State Sen. Ulysses Currie, a black Democrat from Prince George's County, blamed a lack of discipline by the national party for the lack of diversity among the top nominees on Maryland's Democratic ticket.

"The Republican Party made the decision at the national level that they wanted Michael Steele to run for the U.S. Senate," said Mr. Currie, who supported Mr. Cardin over Kweisi Mfume, a past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in last month's primary.

DOJ_NMG_0078514

Mr. Cardin beat Mr. Mfume in the statewide contest, but Mr. Mfume trounced the 10-term congressman in the majority-black districts of Prince George's County and Baltimore.

In next month's general election, Mr. Cardin squares off against Mr. Steele, who is the first black to win a statewide office in Maryland.

What's more, the Republican Party offers two women in other top contests -- Anne McCarthy for comptroller and Disabilities Secretary Kristen Cox for lieutenant governor.

Mr. O'Malley's running mate for lieutenant governor -- Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, who is black -- is the only minority at the top of the Democratic ticket.

Mr. Dean, a former Vermont governor whose presidential campaign fell apart in 2004, took issue with charges that Maryland Democrats lack diversity, noting Mr. Brown's candidacy.

"We don't have a lack of diversity. We just don't have as much as I would like," he said. "But we do have some, and Brown is a fantastic candidate, and he's got a great future in Maryland politics.

"Yes, we need more diversity. I'm pushing that very hard. I know [state party Chairman] Terry Lierman's pushing that very hard," Mr. Dean said. "But on the other hand, we've got four weeks left until this election. We need to do what's right for America, and what's right for America is to make sure we get rid of this rubber-stamp Congress."

Mr. Dean toured the basement office, where about 20 Democratic volunteers and staffers were working phone banks and conducting surveys.

He took questions from the volunteers, and a few expressed anxiety about the upcoming election.

One said many people she had called "don't seem to know a lot about the Democratic Party" and asked if there would be a "concerted effort to get the party message out before the election."

"That's really up to the individual candidates to do that, and I think they will," Mr. Dean said. "It's hard to do it, frankly, with all the scandal stuff that's coming out of Washington. It's hard for anybody to get their message out."

He pointed to a monthlong voter-turnout effort that the Democratic Party is kicking off today, saying that activists plan to knock on 3 million doors.

Mr. Dean's strategy to invest money and resources in all 50 states has angered other national Democratic leaders who say the party needs to focus on states with close races.

Webb Shifts Debate To Iraq, Urging Diplomacy To End War (WP)

By Tim Craig And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate James Webb said yesterday that it is time for the United States to seek an end to the fighting in Iraq through diplomacy, citing a new and dire assessment of the war effort by Virginia's senior senator, John W. Warner (R).

Webb sought to capitalize on Warner's appraisal of the war to highlight what Webb called the failure of his GOP opponent, Sen. George Allen, to face reality about the worsening situation in Iraq. Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Thursday that the United States should reconsider its approach if the violence does not subside soon.

"They have a victory quite frankly in military terms," Webb said of soldiers in Iraq. "What we have to do is to move this into the political, diplomatic environment. All I've heard from Senator Allen is that we need a victory in Iraq, whatever that is."

Allen, who is battling Webb for a second term, shot back that Webb's comments at a news conference yesterday in Richmond were turning Iraq "into some sort of political game." Allen's campaign quickly organized a conference call for reporters with Warner as a show of Republican unity.

"The bottom-line goal that Senator Warner and I share is that we cannot leave Iraq as a central haven for terrorists," Allen said.

The exchange was the first substantive argument between the two on Iraq policy since they clashed Sept. 17 on NBC's "Meet the Press." And it comes as they prepare for their final scheduled televised debate Monday night.

Warner, who returned this week from Iraq, said parts of the country have "taken steps backwards." Webb, an early critic of the war, seized on Warner's comments as proof that Allen has failed to offer a clear plan for ending the war.

DOJ_NMG_0078515

In his stump speech, Allen says the United States cannot "cut and run" and must continue to fight in Iraq because "there is no substitute for victory." Webb said he wants the United States to start talking to Iraq's neighbors to develop plans to shift troops to other Arab nations.

"It's pretty hard to even see what Senator Allen's position is," Webb said. "The only things he has been saying is basically the three- or four-word phrase that matches what the administration has been saying."

In the conference call, Allen warned that Iraq would escalate into chaos and become a haven for terrorists if troops leave before the country's government and police force are stable.

"These terrorist threats we face are real. This is not some political game we are in. . . . We need to remain vigilant in it rather than turn it into some political game, as my opponent wishes to do," Allen said.

Warner declined to criticize Webb, but the senator predicted horrific consequences if "those [oil] fields would fall into the hands of terrorists." But he added that "bold decisions" will be needed if the violence does not subside soon.

Webb said that if elected he would offer "a different set of eyes on the problem."

The return to the Iraq discussion marked a change for a campaign that has been dominated by personal issues, including Allen's alleged use of racial slurs in college and a 1979 article by Webb that some women have called demeaning.

In a two-minute commercial Monday, Allen asked for an end to personal attacks. "The negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve."

But Allen yesterday unveiled two television ads, one attacking Webb on taxes and the other focused on Webb's attitude toward women 30 years ago.

The tax ad shows a rotating cube with the pictures of Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). "There are some people in Washington who think you don't pay enough taxes. And they all support Jim Webb," an announcer says.

The ad then accuses Webb of wanting to raise taxes on families by $2,000 a year and says he supports other tax hikes. Webb aides called the ad "another gross misrepresentation of Jim's positions."

The other Allen ad features a Naval Academy graduate who claims Webb made up her quotes after he interviewed her for the 1979 magazine article. The quotes did not appear in the article.

"I looked at him and said, 'I never said any of those things; they're all lies,' " said Janice Buxbaum of Springfield. "And he said, 'Too bad.' He's a bright man; he's just not an honest man. I don't want him in my party, and I don't want him in my Senate."

In an interview, Buxbaum said that she could not recall the exact quotes Webb had proposed to use and that the quotes were removed after she refused to sign a release. She said Webb had showed her statements he planned to attribute to her about "sexual activities and exploits" of female midshipmen.

"It didn't happen, so I never said it, and he was ascribing them to me," she said.

Webb accused Allen of conducting a "Karl Rove era" campaign, referring to President Bush's chief political adviser. "This woman isn't even in the article," Webb said.

Shear reported from Richmond.

Allen Foes Cite Sister's Book (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Sen. George Allen's political opponents have cited his sister's memoir to portray him as a bully, but an attentive read of her recollections of growing up with football-minded men provides deep insight into the Virginia Republican's past now at issue in his re-election campaign. "Fifth Quarter: The Scrimmage of a Football Coach's Daughter" by Jennifer Allen includes some eyebrow-raising passages such as a young George Allen dragging his sister by her hair or hitting her boyfriend with a pool cue, incidents that are often noted by Mr. Allen's Democratic foes. But his critics don't use excerpts noting that the senator was a star student or how he set out a chair in honor of his late father, famed NFL coach George H. Allen, at his 1994 gubernatorial inauguration. "He got straight A's, even when he acted like a hick," Miss Allen writes in the book, published in 2000 just before George, the oldest of her three brothers, was elected to the Senate. Mr. Allen's youth, particularly his stint as a second-string quarterback for the University of Virginia, has become a campaign issue since some former teammates have accused him of racism and uttering racial slurs while there. If young George had any racist tendencies, Miss Allen kept them out of "Fifth Quarter," which casts the family with an international understanding and Coach Allen as a man who was colorblind on the field. In reading the book, it is easy to understand why the senator equates almost everything with football -- his family lived, breathed and died by the game. The coach's career with the Los Angeles Rams and the Washington Redskins (during which he never had a losing season) taught the children about loyalty, the power of the press and appreciation of physical strength. "George never cried; I didn't think he even knew how," is one revealing passage from the book, which opens with 8-year-old Jennifer's observations of the 1968 football season. "I saw George get blindsided by a car, roll over its hood and land shoulder-first onto the pavement to make a diving catch without shedding a tear," she remembers of her brother, nine years her senior. Mr. Allen often invokes his father's favorite phrase, "The future is now," especially when asked about his 2008 presidential ambitions. The phrase is pertinent today, as he is nearly tied with Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr., a Vietnam veteran and Navy secretary under President Reagan. "Fifth Quarter" also provides an understanding of Henrietta "Etty" Allen, the family's brash matriarch. Raised in French Tunisia, Mrs. Allen frequently cursed at reporters, fans of opposing football teams and her children. "Fifth Quarter" depicts a dysfunctional family obsessed with football. One night soon after a Rams loss, Coach Allen and middle son Gregory argued after the boy failed to pour him a glass of milk. "Dad lifted Gregory up by the shirt collar. ... Dad picked up a plate and George stood up. It was the first time I had seen anyone take a stand against Dad. George said, 'If you're going to hit him, you'll have to hit me first.' " Jennifer, who ran from the room and hid in her closet, didn't spell out what happened next between her father and George, but Gregory ended up with a broken nose. The book sometimes portrays young George as a violent teen who called his sister "ugly," but Miss Allen also says she wanted her brothers to "turn me upside down, rough me up, because I thought I was in training to be the NFL's first girl quarterback." Some choice quotes include "George hoped someday to become a dentist ...a perfect profession -- getting paid to make people suffer," and "Ever since my brother George held me over the railing at Niagara Falls, I've had a fear of heights." Attempts by The Washington Times to reach the author, now Jennifer Richard, were unsuccessful, but she told the Associated Press in May that the pool cue incident wasn't violent -- her brother was testing her boyfriend's reflexes. Calling "Fifth Quarter" a "novelization of the past," Mrs. Richard told the AP that when George walked her down her wedding aisle in the absence of their late father, "He was crying more than anybody." The author notes in the acknowledgments that she consulted with her family while writing the memoir: "My brother George sat with me for hours by the pool one day, measuring out parcels of his past, all the while reminding me to remain faithful to the facts."

DOJ_NMG_0078516

Battling Power Of Incumbency, And Feeling Left To Fight Alone (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

BRIGHTON, Mich. — Implausible pursuits can be humbling. Jim Marcinkowski, a Democrat, discovers this every day in his bid to dislodge Representative Mike Rogers, a three-term Republican, from the United States Congress.

“Hi, Jim Marcinkowski,” he says to an elderly man in a recent visit to a senior center.

“What?” The man is having trouble hearing over the accordion.

“I’m Jim, running for Congress.”

“Oh.”

The candidate pivots, approaches an elderly woman.

“Hi, Jim Marcinkowski.”

“Who?”

“Jim Marcinkowski.”

“Sounds Polish.”

“It is Polish.” He has a little Polish flag on his lapel.

“I’m German,” says the woman, Lieselotta Olsen. She thinks she has heard of him, or maybe not. She knows of his opponent, Mr. Rogers, who clearly holds a big advantage in name recognition.

DOJ_NMG_0078517

And money, organization, experience, knowledge of the district, and everything else that make incumbency such a near-invincible force in Congressional elections. It is easy to overlook this in an environment that many predict will be hostile to sitting members of Congress, especially Republicans. But 98 percent of incumbents have been re-elected in House contests since 1998, and even when Republicans took control of Congress in 1994 in a seismic realignment, 91 percent of incumbents still won.

Mr. Marcinkowski, 51, personifies the thankless underdog. He is a probable loser (some say surefire) who is unknown to most voters in this district northwest of Detroit and irrelevant to the national party officials who recruited him — and, in his telling, then abandoned him — as they focused on 50 or so "battleground" contests. The news media ignore him, too. When told Mr. Marcinkowski was a candidate, Chuck Todd, editor of Hotline, the online political tip-sheet, asked whether he was "that guy who played quarterback for the Atlanta Falcons in the 1980's." (No, that was Steve Bartkowski.)

Jim Marcinkowski is the deputy city attorney for Royal Oak, Mich. He has three teenage children whom he used to see after work, and a Hobie Cat sailboat he used to float around on, on weekends.

Mr. Marcinkowski, a crisply groomed former C.I.A. operations officer, could represent a tougher-than-usual test for Mr. Rogers, who was re-elected by a margin of 37 percentage points in 2002 and 24 percentage points in 2004. A former Republican, Mr. Marcinkowski has a tough-guy résumé — Navy, C.I.A., teamster — and the silvery-haired presence of a Famous Guy you would swear you had seen before, maybe on television.

He drew national attention in 2003 and 2005 when he testified before Congress about his friend and former C.I.A. classmate Valerie Wilson. The story of Ms. Wilson, the agent whose identity was leaked by Bush administration officials, sealed Mr. Marcinkowski's divorce from the Republicans. He had been active in the party from the time he organized the Michigan State University campus for Ronald Reagan's presidential campaign in 1980 but had gradually become disenchanted, particularly during the George W. Bush years.

His story — former C.I.A. officer, disaffected Republican — had great appeal to Democratic bigwigs seeking Congressional candidates. He talked to Representatives Nancy Pelosi, the House Democratic leader; Steny Hoyer, the Democratic whip; and Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. All urged him to run, especially Mr. Emanuel, who called several times, and even shipped him a thank-you cheesecake after he had agreed to run.

Mr. Marcinkowski says everyone promised their full support.

"That and a buck-seventy will get you a nice cup of coffee at Starbucks," he said, adding that if he could do it again, he would have sought assurances that the campaign committee would devote ample "resources" — also known as money — to his race.

He says many of the Democrats who enticed him to run abandoned him after his fund-raising lagged and they deemed other races to be more winnable. "Sometimes I feel like the marine who they sent charging up a hill," he said. "Then the marine looks back over his shoulder and wonders, 'Hey, where'd everyone go?' "

This is a recurring lament among challengers. "You hear a lot of long-shot candidates around this time who will feel used by their committees," said Nathan Gonzales, political editor for Rothenberg Political Report.

Mr. Marcinkowski said he spent virtually all his campaign time on fund-raising earlier this year. He devoted every weekend, lunch hour and weeknight to calling lists of past Democratic donors. He has used up six weeks of vacation time, burned through two cellphones and made about 15,000 calls, nearly all to raise money.

Mr. Emanuel's deputies from his committee phoned him relentlessly, he said, asking "how many calls I made, how many people I contacted, whether I'd hit up all my relatives, neighbors, friends from high school."

He raised more than $130,000 in the first quarter of 2006. Not bad, except that Mr. Rogers had about $1 million in the bank from past campaigns. Mr. Marcinkowski hired a small staff, recruited volunteers and bought local television, cable and radio advertisements. In June, Congressional Quarterly even moved Michigan's Eighth Congressional District to the Republican Favored category from Safe Republican.

But eventually, Mr. Marcinkowski said, the calls reaped less and less money. His donors focused on higher-profile races. The calls from the Congressional committee's officials pretty much stopped. "I fell off way their radar," he said, adding that he "really misses those phone calls."

DOJ_NMG_0078518

The sudden silence left him “scarred,” he said, and added that no one at the committee even sent him flowers to say goodbye. He suggested that his story could be called “The Spy Left Out in the Cold.”

When did he last hear from Rahm Emanuel?

“Rahm who?”

A spokeswoman for Mr. Emanuel and the Congressional committee declined to comment.

For all his disappointment, Mr. Marcinkowski said he has no regrets about running and keeps thinking of the strangers who have encouraged him. He carries in his wallet a laminated copy of a $10 donation from a 92-year-old man. He said he loved meeting voters, “getting out in front of people.” That can include polka dancing with elderly strangers before noon, as he did on that recent day at the Brighton Senior Center.

Mr. Marcinkowski calls himself a sleeper on the national map, saying he operates beyond the purview of the party apparatus and the narrow definitions of what constitutes “in play.” He believes the dynamics in Michigan — the depth of voter agitation, concern about job losses and opposition to the Iraq war — have been underestimated outside the state.

“I don’t think the people who read the political tea leaves are reading the real tea leaves,” Mr. Marcinkowski said. He added that he has a prediction for how much he will win by on Election Day, but does not want to jinx anything by sharing it.

A Political Opportunity For Women (WP)

By Anushka Asthana

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Geraldine A. Ferraro made history in 1984 as the first woman to run for vice president on a major-party ticket. Twenty-two years later, she wishes she was no longer in a club of one.

"I thought it would have happened by now," Ferraro said with a sad note in her voice as she looked down at a room packed with more than 600 people, young and old, at the University of Virginia last month.

The glass ceiling in presidential politics will not be broken in her lifetime, she predicted to reporters before taking the stage. But she was there to persuade a new generation of women to continue the fight.

"We have to keep reminding them what it was like before, so they recognize that the only way they are going to make it better for the future -- for their future and their children's future -- is by becoming involved politically," she said.

The Democrat's appearance that night was part of a drive by U-Va.'s Center for Politics to inspire young women to get involved in politics. Its director, Larry J. Sabato, described Ferraro as a "trailblazer for the United States of America" and said she would be introduced by a "trailblazer in Virginia."

Mary Sue Terry, who in 1985 was elected Virginia's first female attorney general before losing the governor's race to now-Sen. George Allen (R) in 1993, said that there are many obstacles to women's advancement in politics but that she has hope. "It is not going to be easy, but it is not impossible," she said.

In fact, this year may prove to be a major breakthrough for women in Congress, according to experts at the university. Sabato's Crystal Ball, a Web page that provides analysis of House and Senate races around the country, is predicting that 2006 could be the best year for women in 14 years.

In a conservative scenario, according to the Crystal Ball, female candidates would gain nine seats in the House -- the largest rise since the Year of the Woman in 1992, when the number of women in Congress jumped from 32 to 54.

"There is going to be a net gain in the House for women," agreed Dennis Simon, a professor at Southern Methodist University and co-author of "Breaking the Political Glass Ceiling." But there is still a "gender gap in running for office," he said.

With co-author Barbara Palmer, of the Women & Politics Institute at American University, Simon looked at which jurisdictions tend to be most and least friendly to women. Topping the list of those most likely to vote for female candidates are New York City, San Francisco and Los Angeles. At the other end are Gadsden, Ala., and Paducah and Bowling Green, Ky.

Districts that elect women, according to Simon, tend to be "upscale -- more degrees, more professionals, urban." Those less likely, he added, are "more rural, lower-income and more traditional."

DOJ_NMG_0078519

Simon said female candidates are often seen as more liberal than they actually are -- as in the case of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). But her possible presidential candidacy, and the speculation that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice might be a presidential candidate in 2008 or later, has shifted perceptions about the plausibility of a female president.

Having Rice and former secretary of state Madeleine Albright in top national security jobs "made it normal to see women as leaders," said Marie Wilson, president and founder of the White House Project, which aims to advance female leadership and is training hundreds of women to run for office. "It we have three or four women in '08, it would have to be agenda," rather than sex, that separates them, she added.

Wilson said the United States has fallen through the rankings in women's political representation -- to 68th -- as other countries such as South Africa and Great Britain and Scandinavian nations climbed the list. Some countries used quotas to address the imbalance.

The recent U-Va. conference used persuasion. "New blood is needed," Ferraro told the audience. "If ever there was a time when the world and our nation needed new voices, new values, new approaches and sensitivities, this is it. Politics gives us the power to make a difference."

Women, she argued, would ensure that the concerns of half the population were listened to. In the same way that John McCain, as a former prisoner of war, pushed hard for legislation to ban torture, so women would shout loudest on behalf of day care, flexible work hours, prenatal health care, immunization, the aging population and more, she argued.

The challenge, she added, is to get enough women into the candidate pool. "The American electorate is accustomed to expect certain types of experience from candidates for national office," she said. "It doesn't hurt to be a governor of a large state, to be vice president or a senator of long experience."

Help For Congressman (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 6 (AP) — Mayor C. Ray Nagin says he is enthusiastically supporting the re-election of Representative William J. Jefferson, an eight-term Democrat who is the target of a federal bribery investigation.

“I’ve told the congressman that since he supported me during the mayor’s race, that I would reciprocate,” Mr. Nagin said Thursday.

According to government affidavits, Mr. Jefferson is accused of taking bribes to help promote a cable television and Internet business in Nigeria and Ghana. An F.B.I. affidavit said that he was videotaped accepting a briefcase with $100,000 in $100 bills on July 30, 2005, and that all but $10,000 of the cash was found four days later in his freezer.

Mr. Jefferson denies the accusations and has not been charged.

The congressman has 12 opponents on the fall ballot.

Schwarzenegger And Rival Spar But Step Lightly (LAT)

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Most of the rhetoric on immigration has been voiced at partisan events. The candidates are not far apart on key issues, political analysts say.

The national immigration debate is reverberating in California's gubernatorial campaign, with the two major-party candidates trading verbal jabs but treading carefully on the volatile issue.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who has talked tough in the past on border-related issues — praising Minuteman-style private border patrols and supporting the anti-illegal immigrant Proposition 187 — now plays up his immigrant roots, calling for a comprehensive and compassionate border policy that bolsters security without mistreating illegal immigrants.

The softened public stance hasn't stopped Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides from portraying Schwarzenegger as an anti-immigrant extremist who has harmed relations with Mexico.

"He's talked about closing the border. He sent the National Guard to the border instead of demanding that George Bush do his job. He sent the wrong signal to Mexico, our ally," Angelides said in a speech last month to Latino leaders in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0078520

Schwarzenegger has labeled Angelides weak on national security for not supporting the deployment of 1,000 National Guard troops to the border. He also has criticized him for supporting driver's licenses for illegal immigrants.

The dispute continued this week, when Angelides supporters criticized Schwarzenegger for saying Mexican immigrants should "immerse yourself and assimilate into the American culture."

State Democratic Party chief Art Torres said the remark was "a calculated political insult to all immigrants." Schwarzenegger, defending his comments Friday, said they were not meant as an insult. "This is not against Latinos; it's not against anybody," he said at a campaign event in Los Angeles.

That disagreement aside, most of the rhetoric on immigration has been voiced at partisan events. It has also been muted compared with the fireworks of past campaigns when immigration-related issues polarized voters and generated flurries of negative television advertising.

Part of the reason, political analysts say, is that the candidates' positions are not far apart on key issues, including their support for a guest worker policy and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants.

The other reason is political: Neither wants to risk losing support from core constituencies if he strays too far from the carefully crafted views that both have staked out.

Republican Schwarzenegger has already angered conservatives with his moves to the center in recent months. And Democrat Angelides, analysts say, could lose moderate Democrats' votes if he is perceived as being too liberal on immigration issues.

"It's such a hot-button issue that maybe both are afraid to push the button. There's a loss potential on either side," said Harry Pachon, president of the Tomas Rivera Policy Institute at USC.

Illegal immigration along the California-Mexico border has slowed significantly since increased enforcement in the 1990s pushed migration flows east to Arizona. From October 2005 to mid-September, 190,000 illegal immigrants were apprehended in California, compared with 500,000 in Arizona.

Still, immigration reform groups say, the continuing migration adds to California's estimated population of 2.6 million illegal immigrants and costs the state more than $10 billion a year in health, education and law enforcement funds.

Migrant rights group say the state's economy would break down without the labor of illegal immigrants, who provide much of the workforce in key industries such as construction, service and agriculture.

Immigration remains an important topic for voters. A Los Angeles Times poll in September showed that 34% of likely voters consider immigration issues to be the biggest problem facing the state — making it the top mention.

That presents something of a dilemma for state officials. Though governors of border states have historically struggled to make good on campaign promises of increased border funding, it is the federal government that is responsible for everything from patrolling the state's 150-mile frontier to inspecting the millions of vehicles that enter California from Mexico each year.

In the race for governor, both candidates have promised to pressure Washington to improve conditions along the border and to reimburse costs associated with illegal immigration. But, experts say, the winner probably will follow a long line of governors who failed at the task.

"It's a completely quixotic exercise," said Wayne Cornelius, director of the Center for Comparative Immigration Studies at UC San Diego. "The reality is that neither one is going to have much leverage in this area."

That's not to say that governors can't try.

"In Washington, any time that a well-known governor — let alone a superstar — comes to testify on a political issue, they attract attention, not just from the news media, but from lawmakers," said Adam Segal, director of the Hispanic Voter Project at Johns Hopkins University. "Certainly, there have been governors from various states that have used their stature to advance issues."

Last year, the Democratic governors of New Mexico and Arizona, Bill Richardson and Janet Napolitano respectively, intensified the national debate on illegal immigration when they declared states of emergency.

Schwarzenegger declined to follow their lead but has acted in other ways. He has written op-ed articles, sent letters to congressional leaders and spoken to President Bush on border issues.

DOJ_NMG_0078521

The efforts have yielded mixed results. Congress did appropriate $80 million more in funding this year — for a total of about $200 million — for the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program, which reimburses states for incarcerating illegal immigrants. California spends more than $750 million a year for the incarceration of criminal illegal immigrants.

But at the same time, the number of Border Patrol agents in California has dipped, from 2,500 in 2003 to 2,300 this year, though there are plans to add more. The cuts were caused by redeployments to Arizona and other border areas.

Angelides, in a telephone interview, said that Schwarzenegger hasn't "lifted a finger" on border issues and that if he were governor, he would work more closely with California's representatives in Washington to pressure the White House.

"This governor … went to Ohio to campaign for Bush. Certainly, he can pick up the phone to implore the Bush/Cheney White House to meet its border commitments," Angelides said.

He said the governor's views on immigration issues have been divisive, and he criticized Schwarzenegger for, at one time, backing the Minuteman freelance group.

"If I'm governor, you won't see me going on right-wing radio and praising the Minutemen, or making statements about closing the border, or using this issue to divide Californians," Angelides said.

He said he would push for comprehensive immigration reform and would urge the federal government to increase the number of Border Patrol agents and high-technology tools along the border. He said he opposed the deployment of the National Guard because California's contingent is already overextended and the troops send the wrong signal to Mexico.

Schwarzenegger's campaign criticized the challenger's position.

"Phil Angelides would take California's border security backward by removing National Guard troops," said Julie Soderlund, a spokesperson for the governor. (Schwarzenegger initially balked at the president's request to send the Guard to the border, and later refused Bush's request for more troops.)

Last year, he said illegal immigration could be choked off by closing the border. He corrected himself later, saying he meant "secure" the border.

Schwarzenegger's views on some border issues have moderated. This year, he came out against the congressional plan for a 700-mile border fence, saying it would be ineffective and amount to going back to the "Stone Age."

The governor also said this summer that he had made mistakes in praising Minuteman-style groups, and he repeated his earlier comment that Proposition 187 was "the wrong decision."

Schwarzenegger also supports immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the U.S. — a stance shared by Bush and criticized by some conservatives.

"It impressed many in the Latino community that he took a moderate stance at a time when the tide was seeming to go the other way," said Pachon of USC.

Skeptics remain, however, saying Schwarzenegger's move to the center is politically motivated to boost support among Latinos. A recent Los Angeles Times poll showed that 65% of likely Latino voters disapprove of the governor's job performance.

"We always have to remember that he's an actor and … without a doubt he is putting on an Academy Award-winning performance that he cares about the Latino community, when we know he does not," said Enrique Morones, president of the Border Angels, a San Diego-based immigrant rights group.

But others consider Schwarzenegger's positions in line with those of most voters, including many Latinos.

"On immigration issues, the governor probably pretty much reflects the views of most Californians," said Allan Hoffenblum, a longtime Republican strategist who publishes the California Target Book, a nonpartisan election guide.

richard.marosi@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Debate broadcasts

The sole debate between Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and his Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, will be held tonight. Several Southern California media outlets plan to broadcast the one-hour session, according to the sponsor, the California Broadcasters Assn., and station officials.

DOJ_NMG_0078522

Broadcasting the event live at 6 p.m. will be KCBS-TV Channel 2, KCET-TV Channel 28, KWHY-TV Channel 22 and cable station C-SPAN. KABC-TV Channel 7, which will be airing college football during the debate, will delay its broadcast until 11 a.m. Sunday.

The association said the debate will also be broadcast on radio stations KABC-AM (790) and KNX-AM (1070).

Los Angeles Times

After Son's Death And Battle With Breast Cancer, Elizabeth Edwards Trying To Inspire (MCT)

By Jeri Krentz

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

CHARLOTTE, N.C. - In the days since her book was published, Elizabeth Edwards has gone from one interview to the next, from Oprah Winfrey to Diane Rehm to Charlie Rose, talking about the pain of losing her son and her battle with breast cancer.

She's answered questions about her son's life, relived his car accident in 1996 and shared stories about grief and healing.

Sometimes, she said, she feels the tears coming, and hopes the interview is almost over.

"Honestly, even though it's necessary to tell my story of grief, I don't want it to be about me," she said on her way to another airport. "I want it to be a larger message about how we need one another. If I break down, I don't think I become as good a messenger."

Edwards' book, "Saving Graces: Finding Solace and Strength From Friends and Strangers" (Broadway Books; $24.95), is a frank memoir about loss and accepting support.

Edwards, 57, and her husband, former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., rarely spoke of their son's death during her husband's 2004 run for president or during his bid for vice president as Sen. John Kerry's running mate. In her book, she describes the tragedy in detail.

Wade, 16, had been on his way to meet his family at the beach for spring break. A gust of wind blew his car from the road; it fishtailed, then flipped.

"If I make myself think back on that night and on the next days, I can see everyone, I can bring everyone back," Edwards wrote. "But it is so hard to do it without also bringing back that pain. The heat of it. The chill of it. What's important and what's not? People came, that's what's important. They were there."

Edwards found support through an Internet group for the bereaved. Some days, she shared her sorrow. "I have no strength to face his death," she wrote in a post three weeks after what would have been Wade's 17th birthday. "Even comfort about his death brings me to the floor. I cannot look it in the eye. ... I don't know how many days without him I have left inside me."

Other days, she vented:

"I used to think that the greatest gift you could give a child was the sense that anything was possible. Now that gift has a horrid twist: Anything is possible."

She visited her son's grave daily, talking to him, reading letters to him, taking his SAT score when it came in the mail. When what would've been Wade's last year of high school began, she read aloud every book on the senior reading list.

"I went every day to Wade's grave," she wrote, "... because that was what felt right to me."

At age 46, she decided to undergo fertility treatments and have two more children. Emma Claire was born in 1998. Jack came two years later, when the Edwardses' oldest daughter, Cate, was a high school senior.

Politics is part of Edwards' story, too.

She describes meeting with Secret Service agents to learn what to expect. She tells how her friends helped fix up Cate's bedroom in Raleigh, thinking the Kerrys might spend the night. (They didn't. "But now Cate has nice new bed linens," she wrote.)

Two weeks before Election Day in 2004, she discovered a lump while taking a shower in a hotel room in Kenosha, Wis. After John Kerry delivered his concession speech, Elizabeth and John Edwards left for the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute in Boston.

Though she feared cancer, Edwards wrote that she'd "already been through the worst," that nothing will ever be as bad as losing a child. "The worst day of my life had already come."

She went through chemotherapy, then surgery followed by radiation.

DOJ_NMG_0078523

At times, she wrote, "there was no part of me that did not feel beaten."

Other times, facing bruising and bleeding, hair loss, nausea and mouth sores: "I could not wait to get started. I wanted to be a warrior."

By that March, the number of e-mails from strangers and friends had reached 65,000.

The book's message is simple: Family is all around us, in strangers and friends, a "sea of support," nourishment to help in the next storm.

"I hope (readers) will take that away from the story," Edwards said. "Start including people in your lives that otherwise would be invisible and find out how rewarding that is. ... It sounds naive, but it's 57 not-always-easy years that have been made easier because I was good to people. And when I needed it, they were good back."

Explaining her faith, Edwards said, was the part of the book she "fiddled with" the most.

She believes in a God who lets human actions and nature take their course.

"The other option - that he set up the world so that he could intervene when he wanted to - that God is a very hard God to accept if your child dies."

Edwards admitted that she felt worried before "Saving Graces" reached stores last week. Reporters who traveled with her during the presidential campaign often described her as honest and down to earth. In the book, that openness sometimes makes her words difficult to read.

"I wanted it to seem like a conversation with people," she said. "But right before it came out, it was very scary. I don't know any other way to be, but you don't know how this candor will be received. I don't want to tell you all the adjectives that I didn't want to hear."

In the book, Edwards wrote that "life has found its cadence again." Her cancer appears to be gone. Her oldest daughter has started law school. Her younger children are busy with school and sports. John Edwards seems to be a probable 2008 presidential candidate. And the family has moved into a new home in Orange County, N.C.

At first, Elizabeth Edwards said, she worried about emptying Wade's room in their old house. But a hole in a washing machine hose started a flood and she had to rush to save his belongings.

"In order to save his stuff, I had to get it out," she said. "Where I thought it was going to be so hard, I was relieved to get it out of his room."

Still, grief is unpredictable. Ten years away from her son's death, there are days when she's "just a puddle."

"Something will trigger it, and you have no idea what it's going to be. You can walk right through the obvious thing - and then a pile of shirts at Abercrombie & Fitch will do you in."

Gore And Murdoch Join Forces In TV Deal (FT)

By Emiko Terazono, Media Correspondent

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

Al Gore, the former US vice-president, is bringing his user-generated content television channel to the UK, courtesy of James Murdoch's British Sky Broadcasting.

Mr Gore launched Current TV, the US channel made of clips created by viewers and producers, in August last year, and said that the channel was "democratising television."

Mr Murdoch, who has claimed that BSkyB was the first media company in the world to go carbon neutral, and Mr Gore share their passion for the environment. Mr Murdoch invited Mr Gore to the gathering of News Corp's executives at Pebble Beach, California, this summer.

At Pebble Beach Rupert Murdoch, News Corp chief executive, urged News Corp officials to follow his son James' lead and to try and tackle climate change issues.

The pair have now come together to promote user generated content in the UK and Ireland. Current TV's agreement for the channel to be carried on BSkyB's satellite platform is its first international move outside the US.

Mr Gore said that the channel was one of the few on the cable network to break even in the first year and was looking to make profits in the second year. He rejected suggestions that viewer created clips was about gaining cheap content.

DOJ_NMG_0078524

The deal with BSkyB brings Current TV to some 8m households. In the US, it is available in nearly 30m homes through cable and satellite television. With Current TV, viewers and producers upload their clips on to the channel's website, where content which gets the most votes is broadcast on its television channel.

Mr Gore compared Current TV to the introduction of the printing press in the 15th century, which led to enlightenment. He said: "The television medium for 50 years has had the depressing effect on the conversation of democracy by excluding individuals. But the new affordable digital tools of both cameras and digital video cameras and laptop editing systems now make it completely feasible for individuals with accessible training to participate in the conversation."

Mr Murdoch said that Mr Gore's channel TV was "an elegant way" to marry user-generated content on the web to the broadcast medium. He said: "Current TV is bringing the web's sense of empowerment to television for the first time."

Listen to audio excerpts from Emiko Terazono's interview with Al Gore and James Murdoch

Six Powers Agree To Take Next Step On Iran (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 6 -- The United States and five other major powers agreed Friday to take the next step toward imposing sanctions on Iran for failing to comply with a U.N. resolution to prevent it from subverting its nuclear energy program to develop a nuclear weapon, according to U.S. and European officials.

But in response to Russian and Chinese wariness about the impact and effectiveness of sanctions, the group also agreed to keep the door open to diplomacy, the officials said. The chief negotiator will remain available for talks if Iran chooses to come to the table and suspend its uranium enrichment program. As soon as Iran suspends enrichment, any U.N. sanctions would also be suspended, they said.

The package of economic, technological, scientific and diplomatic incentives already offered to Iran to surrender control over its fuel cycle -- but not its peaceful energy program -- will still be on offer if the Islamic republic changes its position, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said.

The agreement came at the conclusion of talks hosted by Britain and attended by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and top diplomats from France, Russia, China and Germany. But after a dramatic buildup all week to a possible turning point following the collapse of European negotiations with Iran, the tone and scope of the agreement appeared significantly milder than anticipated.

The timing of the talks and the wording of the agreement were affected by mechanical problems delaying Rice's arrival in London from Iraq. The military plane ferrying Rice got stuck in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, the last stop on her five-day Middle East tour, and she attended only the last 45 minutes of the six-nation talks that she had pressed the hardest to hold.

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy described the new international goal as "proportionate and reversible sanctions." U.S. officials said they viewed the agreement on sanctions as a tactic to try to force Iran to return to negotiations.

En route to London, Rice said sanctions would be aimed at convincing Iran that returning to the table was "the best strategy here. Nobody wants to have [sanctions] just to have them. The hope would be that the Iranians recognize that increasing isolation from the international system is not good for Iran or for the people of Iran."

The general agreement comes after years of controversial diplomacy, including a period when Iran suspended enrichment of uranium, only to resume after hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was inaugurated in August 2005. Since then, Iran has missed at least two deadlines, including one set for Aug. 31 by the United Nations, to comply with demands that it halt enrichment.

"The extra innings are over. We're on to a new phase," Burns said. "We have no alternative but to proceed" and raise the cost for Iran's "irresponsible attitude."

Iran, he added, is missing a "major opportunity" in rejecting the package of incentives, particularly the opportunity for the first formal talks with the United States since relations were broken in 1980.

DOJ_NMG_0078525

The administration has been pressing hard over the past six weeks to get the six major powers to agree to sanctions. A senior State Department official said Friday's agreement is likely to come as a surprise to Iran, which has calculated that it could continue to divide the international community.

In announcing the agreement, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said the six powers were "deeply disappointed" that the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, had to report Iran's failure to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities, as required by U.N. Resolution 1696.

"We said there are two paths ahead," Beckett said. "We regret that Iran has not yet taken the positive one."

Discussions on which sanctions to invoke against Iran, drawn from a two-page list assembled last summer, will begin next Tuesday or Wednesday in videoconference talks among specialists, U.S. officials said.

Burns predicted that the behind-the-scenes diplomacy would be "spirited" and possibly lengthy. A European envoy involved in the talks Friday said it would be a "struggle" to come up with details to follow through on what is now a joint strategy.

The agreement reached Friday also does not close the deep gap between the United States and Russia over strategy toward Iran. Rice acknowledged the split.

"It's long been the view of particularly Russia that sanctions may not have the intended effect," she said, adding that Moscow had an obligation to act since it had voted for Resolution 1696 in July.

Rice began the day in Iraq, where she met with Massoud Barzani, president of the regional government in the Kurdish-populated north. Rice urged Barzani to cooperate with the national government's reconciliation efforts, and Barzani said the three northern Kurdish provinces would remain part of Iraq despite growing support for independence.

"Kurds, like any other nation, have the right to self-determination," he said. "This is a natural right. But a parliament in Kurdistan has been adopted within the framework of a democratic Iraq, a federal system."

Regional officials said privately, however, that there is growing sentiment for independence as violence increases in the rest of Iraq.

U.S. Says It Has Deal With Other U.N. Members To Penalize Iran For Nuclear Drive (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 6 — The United States said it had won agreement on Friday from the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council and Germany to seek sanctions against Iran over its refusal to shut down a nuclear enrichment program that could be used to build bombs.

While the State Department praised the agreement, which was reached at a one-day meeting here of senior officials from the six nations, American diplomats conceded that there could still be long and difficult negotiations over what penalties to impose and their timing.

Indeed, none of the other nations here — Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia — issued such an explicit statement after the meeting. In the past, China and Russia have both said they would be wary of sanctions against Iran, despite its defiance of international demands to end nuclear enrichment.

R. Nicholas Burns, the American under secretary of state for political affairs, said after the meeting that whatever the other nations' diplomatic language, "What we've got is an agreement to go to the Security Council" to punish Iran.

In essence, Mr. Burns said, the six nations "concluded that Iran is not prepared to negotiate with us" based on conditions set last spring, and that "we'll go forward with sanctions."

But he admitted the issue was far from decided. "I think there's going to be a spirited debate about what kind of sanctions should be agreed to."

Mr. Burns was the senior American negotiator at the talks for the most of the day because Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who traveled here from Iraq, was delayed when her military jet — and its replacement — developed mechanical problems, stranding her in the northern Iraqi city of Erbil for about two hours.

DOJ_NMG_0078526

The German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who attended the London meeting, may have come closest to the American statement when he told ZDF television on Friday that "if there is no new decision from inside the Iranian leadership, there is at present no alternative to having the Security Council deal with this conflict."

Agence France-Presse quoted the French foreign minister, Philippe Douste-Blazy, as saying that the six nations have "decided, in a unified manner, to work together in the next few days to speak about proportionate and reversible sanctions."

The debate over Iran's nuclear program is being conducted while the United States weighs a broad list of new sanctions to bring against North Korea, if it follows through on its threat to carry out a nuclear test.

Like his North Korean counterparts, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran has said he will not be intimidated by the possibility of economic and military sanctions. "This nation will not be frightened by the threats," Iran's state-run television quoted him as saying Thursday.

Iran says its nuclear program is for peaceful uses, but the United States says it is a cover for making nuclear weapons.

A senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Friday that as a result of the London meeting, senior diplomats from the six countries would talk next week by video conference to begin debating the list of sanctions on Iran.

The official said that the United States and other nations would work from a two-page "menu" of potential penalties that was drawn up earlier this year, and that the sanctions would be ordered in stages.

"The agreement we have is that we will begin a series of graduated sanction measures against Iran, and that we'll start with sanctions directed at Iran's nuclear industry," like limits on the import of so-called dual-use technology and on the travel of scientists and bureaucrats involved in the Iranian nuclear program.

The London meeting was called after the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, acting on behalf of the six nations, reported this week that he had reached a stalemate in negotiations with the Iranians over curtailing their nuclear program.

The British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, praised Mr. Solana and said there were "two paths ahead" — a negotiated end to Iran's enrichment program, or sanctions — and "we regret that Iran has not yet taken the positive one."

While Ms. Rice's transportation troubles in Iraq meant that she had little chance to participate in Friday's negotiations in London, she said she would be actively involved next week in talks over the next step with the Iranians.

"When the diplomatic course is not going to produce an outcome, then the other path has to be pursued," she said. "I think we're getting pretty close to that time."

"The United States has always said that this can't go on endlessly, and we are already more than a month past the deadline," she added, referring to Iran's failure to abide by the Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations for suspension of the enrichment program.

Talks Planned On Sanctions Against Iran (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

A senior U.S. official says getting a U.N. agreement on penalties will be difficult.

LONDON — The United States and five other world powers said Friday that they were "deeply disappointed" by Iran's refusal to halt its nuclear enrichment program and that they would begin discussing sanctions against Tehran at the United Nations.

The countries, which have jointly pursued a diplomatic solution to the standoff for 18 months, said after a meeting of foreign ministers here that they continued to hold out hope that the Iranian government would relent, suspend nuclear enrichment and accept a package of economic incentives they offered June 1.

A senior U.S. official described the decision to discuss sanctions as "a little bit of progress" but acknowledged that agreeing on penalties against Iran would be difficult. Yet the Americans, who have pressed for sanctions, insisted that it was significant that the six nations have held together.

In addition to the United States, the six are Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany. All but Germany are veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0078527

The United States and Britain have been most eager for sanctions, and Russia and China most hesitant.

The statement approved at the meeting here refers only to possible economic sanctions and excludes military action.

R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of State for policy, said that with the failure of the latest round of talks between Iranian officials and Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief, "there's no question we have to proceed with sanctions."

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, talking to ZDF television after the meeting, said, "We have also agreed that if there is no new decision from inside the Iranian leadership, there is at present no alternative to having the Security Council deal with this conflict over the Iranian nuclear program."

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, told reporters that the group made the decision to discuss sanctions because "further pressure is required."

The sanctions, if approved, would be graduated, and would begin with restrictions aimed at Iran's nuclear industry. Crafting such sanctions would be complex and take some time in the best of circumstances, the senior U.S. official said. He said representatives of the group would be in touch Tuesday or Wednesday and take the issue to the U.N. on Thursday.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking to reporters, said world leaders had threatened so long to move to sanctions that to back away now would undermine their credibility.

"You can't extend deadline after deadline after deadline, because nobody will take the international system seriously," she said.

Rice recalled that the Security Council adopted a resolution in the summer signaling its intention to consider sanctions if Iran didn't suspend its nuclear enrichment.

"When you adopt U.N. Security Council resolutions, they're supposed to mean something," she said.

Rice almost missed the meeting because the military C-17 cargo plane on which she was traveling had an engine malfunction during a visit to Irbil, in northern Iraq's Kurdish region.

Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, said the plane, which had carried Rice from Baghdad for a visit with Kurdistan regional President Massoud Barzani, had developed a crack in a turbine. Officials summoned another plane, but it took longer to arrive than hoped, and U.S. officials waited in an airport visitor's terminal.

It wasn't the only travel snag on the trip. On Thursday, the C-17 ferrying Rice was forced to circle the Baghdad airport for about 45 minutes, delaying meetings with top Iraqi officials, because of mortar or rocket fire nearby.

U.S., Partners Seek Tough Stance On North Korea, Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

The U.S. and its major partners sought to deliver strong messages to both North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs, but divisions persist over how hard to push either country within the United Nations.

North Korea's threat to conduct a first-ever nuclear test and Iran's refusal to suspend its uranium-enrichment program are posing twin challenges to the international system. Prolonged attempts to negotiate an end to both countries' nuclear programs appear to have fallen apart, leaving little consensus about what steps to take next.

In New York, the U.N. Security Council Friday approved a strongly worded statement that "deplored" North Korea's assertion that it was planning a nuclear test. A test, the statement said, would "represent a clear threat to international peace and security." In U.N. parlance, that implies that a nuclear test would trigger international sanctions, but it is unclear how far China, in particular, would agree to push the volatile government in Pyongyang.

The U.N. move came amid rising concern that North Korea could conduct a nuclear test as early as this weekend, the ninth anniversary of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Worker's Party. Pyongyang's official media said Mr. Kim met with his top military commanders Friday.

North Korea claims that it has nuclear weapons, but it isn't known to have tested one before. For more than a year, it has declined to join six-country talks aimed at persuading it to give up its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

The U.S., France, Britain, Russia, China and Germany have reached a similar impasse with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, which it claims are purely for peaceful, civilian purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0078528

Meeting in London Friday, the five permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany said they were "deeply disappointed" that talks between Iran and European Union foreign-policy chief Javier Solana had shown no real results.

The countries said they plan next week to begin talks within the Security Council over a package of sanctions aimed at pressuring Iran to return to talks to curb any efforts by Tehran to develop nuclear weapons. China and Russia reiterated Friday that they won't support threats or coercion.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said en route to London from Iraq Friday that the credibility of the international community is at stake in both the North Korea and Iran cases. "We can't continue to extend deadline after deadline after deadline, or nobody will take the international system seriously," she said.

Powers Agree To Consult UN On Measures Against Tehran (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

World powers meeting on Iran on Friday agreed to consult on possible UN sanctions after Tehran refused to heed international calls for a halt to the most sensitive parts of its controversial nuclear programme.

But after two hours of talks in London, no agreement was reached on the details of potential measures and it was far from clear that differences between the US and Europe on one hand, and Russia and China on the other, had been overcome.

The meeting of foreign ministers from the US, UK, France, Germany, Russia and China was complicated by the late arrival of Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, due to travel delays, and by the departure of Sergey Lavrov, her Russian counterpart, before a planned dinner, because of prior engagements.

It came as Alexander Alekseyev, Russian deputy foreign minister, declared that serving Iran with ultimatums would be "counterproductive".

Speaking on behalf of the participants, Margaret Beckett, UK foreign secretary, said the six nations were 'deeply disappointed' that Iran was not prepared to suspend its uranium enrichment activities after extensive talks with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief.

Stopping short of declaring Mr Solana's talks a failure, she said the six nations would now 'consult on measures under Article 41 of Chapter Seven of the UN charter,' as agreed in a July UN Security Council resolution. The UN decision effectively authorised commercial and diplomatic sanctions but ruled out the use of force.

The UK expects discussions on sanctions to begin at the UN next week. But Russia and China still appear reluctant to impose punishing measures. Mr Lavrov declared on Thursday that sanctions would be 'extreme' until all 'diplomatic possibilities have been exhausted.'

UK officials, however, say sanctions envisioned would be gradual, targeted and reversible, and would start with a tightening of restrictions on procurement for Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

Mr Solana's talks with Iranian officials were designed to persuade Tehran to heed UN calls for a stop in atomic work, a condition for starting negotiations on a longer term solution to Iran's nuclear dispute.

The six governments have been hoping that, once negotiations start, they might persuade Tehran to abandon all enrichment in return for a package of economic and political incentives.

In Tehran, regime insiders told the FT this week that the leadership was now ruling out any prospect of suspending uranium enrichment.

A few weeks ago, Iran had floated the idea that it could be ready to stop the nuclear activities for three months, during which negotiations on the six-nation package would begin.

But it conditioned this on the other side accepting that, at the end of the negotiations, Iran would keep a small-scale uranium enrichment facility.

European diplomats say these terms would have pre-judged the outcome of the negotiations and indeed rendered them meaningless.

Regime insiders in Tehran also say that prospects of even a limited suspension had met with growing opposition at home.

DOJ_NMG_0078529

"Iran is not unduly worried about sanctions, especially as we think Russia and China aren't in favour," says one insider, adding that Tehran's fears of US military actions were also receding given the accumulation of crises in the Middle East, from Iraq, to Lebanon, and Afghanistan.

"They are very wrong if they think they can gain through negotiations what they failed to gain through pressure," President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad told a crowd this week in Hashtgerd, a new town near Tehran, in reference to western governments. In a separate speech at a graduation ceremony for police cadets, he said Iran was not isolated because two-thirds of the countries in the world supported its right "to pursue peaceful nuclear energy".

Nations To Pursue Sanctions Against Iran (AP)

By Beth Gardiner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Six world powers agreed Friday to pursue possible U.N. sanctions against Iran over its nuclear program, but left crucial questions about the scope and timing of any measures unresolved.

Top diplomats from the United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia said in a joint statement after talks in London that they were "deeply disappointed" by Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, a key step toward making nuclear weapons.

Apparently divided about how quickly to move, the envoys stopped short of explicitly declaring European negotiations with Iran a failure, as some had expected them to do.

Their statement also shied away from demanding Tehran be punished by the U.N. Security Council, but said they would discuss sanctions in talks at the U.N.

U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns went further.

"The decision has been made that we'll go for sanctions, the question is what the sanctions will be," he said after the meeting. "In the view of the United States, we have to move for sanctions to raise the stakes for Iran."

Reading the diplomats' joint statement, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Iran had two choices when the United Nations demanded it halt enrichment activities.

"We regret that Iran has not yet taken the positive one," she said.

Beckett said the six powers "will now consult on measures under Article 41 of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter." Article 41 authorizes the Security Council to impose nonmilitary sanctions such as completely or partially severing diplomatic and economic relations, transportation and communications links.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said the discussions on how to win Iranian compliance would take place at the Security Council, Russian news agencies reported. German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told ZDF television the powers would begin drafting a resolution.

Burns said political directors of the six nations' foreign ministries would hold a videoconference Tuesday or Wednesday, and their U.N. ambassadors would then meet, probably the following day.

Britain's U.N. ambassador said Thursday that he expected "the Iran dossier" to return to the Security Council in the next week, but Beckett set no timeframe for action.

Iran insists its enrichment of uranium is purely for peaceful purposes to be used for nuclear energy. But the United States and many European nations believe Iran is seeking to produce nuclear weapons.

The U.S. and Britain are leading the push for sanctions against Tehran. To avoid alienating the Russians and the Chinese — both major commercial partners of Iran — any measures are likely to be relatively mild, including embargoes on missile and nuclear technology, and possible travel bans and other penalties on Iranian officials involved in their country's nuclear program.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was delayed leaving Iraq on Friday because of mechanical difficulties with her plane, meaning the diplomats had little time to reach a consensus. But even before the logistical problems arose, it was clear there were significant differences among the participants, with Russia voicing reluctance to move toward sanctions and Rice suggesting it was "getting pretty close" to the time to take Iran to the Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0078530

"There is an issue of the credibility of the Security Council and the international system and you simply can't just keep talking with no outcome," she told reporters on her way to London.

Lavrov, who said Thursday that sanctions now would be "extreme," hinted Friday that Moscow might accept some action. "We do not rule out additional measures" the Interfax news agency quoted him as saying in London.

But his deputy, Alexander Alexeyev, warned that it would be "counterproductive" to speak to Iran "in the language of threats and ultimatums."

Beckett denied suggestions the five permanent U.N. Security Council members and Germany had been unable to agree on a course of action. She told The Associated Press that the international community was united in wanting to negotiate with Iran and urging it to suspend enrichment.

"None of us want to get involved in sanctions, but at the present time, Iran is not responding to probably the most generous offer that has ever been made by the international community," she told the AP.

She said the package of technological and political incentives the six countries offered Iran in June was still on the table if it commits to freezing enrichment, which it has refused to do.

The European-Iranian negotiations had been seen as a final attempt to avoid a full-blown confrontation between Tehran and the Security Council after it ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend uranium enrichment or face punishment.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was defiant Thursday, saying his country would not be intimidated into giving up its nuclear program.

Associated Press Writers Thomas Wagner and Anne Gearan in London, Stephen Graham in Berlin and Steve Gutterman in Moscow contributed to this report.

U.N. Council Presses North Korea To Drop Plans For Nuclear Test (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 6 — The Security Council urged North Korea Friday not to carry out a planned test of a nuclear weapon, saying it would endanger regional stability and provoke worldwide denunciation.

Taking action three days after North Korea said it was preparing for an underground test, the Council said such action would "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond."

The statement, agreed to by all 15 members, was issued amid speculation that the test could come as soon as Sunday, the anniversary of the appointment of the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il, as head of the Communist Party. It urged Pyongyang to return to six-party talks on its nuclear program that include North and South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

North Korea left the talks last year and claims it will return only if the United States lifts sanctions aimed at stopping counterfeiting and other illegal economic activities.

"At an absolute minimum, North Korea must come back to the six-party talks which it has boycotted for 13 consecutive months and shows no inclination to come back to," said John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations.

The statement made no mention of possible United Nations sanctions or punishment other than to note that the Council would act "consistent with" its obligations if Pyongyang followed through with its threat.

In July, the Security Council passed a resolution condemning recent missile launchings by North Korea, urging abandonment of its nuclear program and a return to the six-party talks but not imposing any penalties.

At that time, Japan and the United States, the principal sponsors of the original resolution draft, obtained unanimous backing only by dropping language citing the part of the United Nations Charter that makes actions enforceable by armed action.

Mr. Bolton said Friday, "We think the main point is that North Korea should understand how strongly the United States and other council members feel that they should not test this nuclear device." He warned, "And if they do test it, it will be a very different world a day after the test."

DOJ_NMG_0078531

Kenzo Oshima, the ambassador from Japan, who is this month's president of the Council, said he had hoped for adoption of the statement before a planned visit by the country's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, to Beijing and Seoul this weekend to discuss ways to ease regional tensions.

A North Korea expert in China told [a news organization] that the threats of a nuclear test were tied to the economic sanctions that Washington imposed earlier this year.

If the United States removes the sanctions, said the expert, Li Dunqiu, of China's State Council Development Research Center, "then tensions can be eased." He added, "Otherwise, launching a nuclear test is unavoidable for North Korea."

U.N. Council Urges N. Korea Not To Conduct Nuclear Test (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 6 -- The U.N. Security Council issued a statement Friday expressing "deep concern" about North Korea's threat to conduct its first test of a nuclear explosive, saying it would "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond."

The action came as U.S. officials look toward Sunday as a possible date for North Korea to carry out the test. Oct. 8 is the ninth anniversary of Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Korean Workers' Party, and is only a day before South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon will face a vote on his bid to become the next secretary general of the United Nations.

The 15-nation council urged North Korea to resume multiparty talks over its nuclear program, warning that a nuclear test "would bring universal condemnation." The council also issued a veiled threat to weigh tougher action, including the possibility of sanctions, against Pyongyang it if proceeds with the test.

The nonbinding statement capped three days of intensive negotiation after North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it plans to test a nuclear device to strengthen its defenses against the United States.

The Bush administration expressed frustration that the council was not prepared to adopt an even tougher response spelling out the punitive actions to be imposed on North Korea if it conducts a test. "At this point, no, I don't think there's a strategy of preventive diplomacy in place," said John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Still, Bolton and Kenzo Oshima, Japan's ambassador, said the statement will be helpful to Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who is expected to advocate a tougher response to North Korea's nuclear program in visits to Beijing on Sunday and Seoul on Monday.

China and Russia have urged the United States and other members of the council to pursue only diplomatic means to end the nuclear standoff with North Korea. Russia's ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said he spoke with Bolton on Friday about the need for the United States to engage in direct talks with North Korea.

But Churkin said Bolton insisted that the United States would sit down with North Korean officials only if they resumed multiparty talks on the nuclear program. "We think that bilateral contacts between the United States and North Korea could be useful in resolving the situation," Churkin said.

In an effort to persuade Pyongyang to back down, Bush administration officials have issued a number of stern warnings that the United States will not accept a nuclear-armed North Korea. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said on Friday that the United States has also encouraged China and others "that have influence on North Korea to use it to convince them to turn away from this."

"I'd leave it up to the Chinese as to what the best way for them to exert their influence on the North Korean government is -- but, certainly, we want to see them and everyone else do whatever they can to prevent this from happening," he added.

U.S. officials suspect North Korea has acquired enough plutonium to produce as many as 11 nuclear bombs. In February, Pyongyang announced that it had succeeded in building a nuclear device, but analysts estimate that it could be years before North Korea is able to launch it.

U.N. Warns N. Korea On Nuclear Test (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078532

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Security Council warned North Korea yesterday not to conduct a nuclear test, telling the isolated communist state it would face unspecified consequences under the U.N. charter if it did so.

"The Security Council deems that should [North Korea] carry out its threat of a nuclear-weapon test, it would jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond," said Japanese Ambassador Kenzo Oshima, who presides over the council this month.

Mr. Oshima's remarks, approved unanimously by the 15-nation council, also warned, "should [North Korea] ignore calls of the international community, the Security Council will act consistent with its responsibility under the charter of the United Nations."

The vote came amid speculation that North Korea could conduct a nuclear test as early as this weekend.

The council's "presidential statement," which does not carry the weight of a formal Security Council resolution, also urged Pyongyang to return to six-nation talks and to abandon its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Japan and China drafted the statement, which the United States supported.

"We think the main point that North Korea should understand is how strongly the United States and many other council members feel that they should not test this nuclear device, and that if they do test it, it will be a very different world the day after the test," U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton told reporters.

The United States maintains a force of about 30,000 troops in South Korea, a legacy of the 1950-53 Korean War.

The council was in broad agreement on yesterday's statement, putting aside sniping earlier this week to craft an unambiguous response.

"It was a very good statement," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said. "We are pleased that it has been adopted."

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, who is scheduled to become U.N. secretary-general when Kofi Annan's term expires this year, has offered to travel to Pyongyang to press international opposition to the North's nuclear-weapons program.

Mr. Bolton declined to endorse the proposed trip, but said yesterday that Washington is looking forward to having fresh ideas at the United Nations.

In North Korea, television images of the nation's leader, Kim Jong-il, showed him meeting soldiers at an undisclosed location.

The meeting marked Mr. Kim's first reported public appearance since Tuesday's announcement that North Korea would set off an atomic explosion.

Earlier, Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shotaro Yachi told Japanese television after meeting with U.S. officials: "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend."

North Koreans are fond of anniversaries and a weekend test would coincide with Mr. Kim's 1997 appointment as leader of the ruling Korean Workers' Party.

The United States, along with South Korea, Japan, China and Russia, have been trying to persuade Pyongyang to give up its nuclear programs in exchange for fuel and security guarantees.

North Korea has boycotted the talks for nearly a year.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe is to meet with his Chinese and South Korean counterparts this weekend to discuss the crisis.

North Korean Nuclear Test Would Be 'Incendiary': White House (AFP)

AFP, October 7, 2006

The White House warned that a North Korean nuclear test would be an "incendiary" event threatening Pyongyang's neighbors, but it refused to comment on the possible timing of the test.

"I'm not going to comment on any of our intelligence," White House deputy spokeswoman Dana Perino told reporters.

Japan said North Korea could test a nuclear device as early as this weekend.

"The international community has joined us in sending a clear signal to the North Koreans that any such test of a nuclear device would be unacceptable," Perino said.

"And this hostile act would be most incendiary and threatening to North Korea's immediate neighbors," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0078533

"It would be destabilizing to the region and could lead to further escalation of tensions. And a test, by its very nature, could advance the North Koreans' capabilities," the spokeswoman added.

White House chief spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday that a US diplomat's warning that a nuclear-armed North Korea would be "unacceptable" was "not a lethal threat" against the Stalinist regime.

U.N. Tells N. Korea Not To Test A Device (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council unanimously urged North Korea on Friday to scrap plans for a nuclear test and return to six-party talks — or face unspecified consequences.

Newly elected Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Friday that the test could come as early as this weekend. U.S. spy satellites have detected sustained activity at a suspected underground test site in North Korea. Abe will travel to Beijing on Sunday and Seoul on Monday to press for support in corralling North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

North Korea has in the past timed its military exercises to coincide with significant dates: It launched missiles on July 4, despite international warnings. Monday is Workers' Party Day in North Korea and Columbus Day in the United States.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry had announced Oct. 3 that the nation was preparing for a nuclear test to ensure its security in the face of what the government in Pyongyang described as threats from the United States.

The U.S. levied financial sanctions against North Korea last year and has encouraged banks around the world to cut off business dealings because of Pyongyang's suspected money laundering and counterfeiting. The North Koreans want the U.S. to lift the sanctions and engage in direct talks, and the threat to test a nuclear device is seen by diplomats and analysts as a way to heighten pressure.

The Security Council statement said that a test would not bring Pyongyang closer to its goals. Rather it would "bring universal condemnation by the international community," the statement said. "The Security Council urges the DPRK not to undertake such a test and to refrain from any action that might aggravate tension," the statement added, using the initials for the country's official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton said the Security Council took the threat seriously and that the United States was prepared to push for international economic sanctions. "If they do test it, it will be a very different world the day after," he said before the meeting. "There would be another nuclear power. This would be proof positive of North Korea having a weapon."

China and Russia had objected to earlier drafts of the statement that threatened an arms embargo, economic penalties or military force for failing to comply. The two nations rejected wording to "demand" that North Korea halt its plans, settling instead for a statement that would "urge" it to do so. But Russian diplomats said they were "very concerned" about the possibility of a test.

"We very clearly and strongly believe that to threaten conducting nuclear tests, or even worse, to conduct such tests … would not help anybody, including North Korea," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said. "This message is very clearly conveyed in the useful presidential statement which we today adopted.

"Let's hope that things will cool off and that everybody will return to six-party talks," he said, referring to the on-and-off negotiations that have involved China, Russia, the U.S., South Korea and Japan along with North Korea.

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said that North Korea was ultimately seeking direct talks with the U.S., and that the key to containing Pyongyang might be negotiations. "I don't know if that is possible right at this moment, but at some point it is necessary," he said.

To Bush administration officials, offering one-on-one talks with the North Koreans is tantamount to rewarding them for bad behavior. When asked previously if the U.S. would consider direct talks, Bolton answered curtly, "No. Next question." Instead, he said Friday, the Security Council should now move toward a "broad strategic approach."

The U.S. is contemplating punitive measures even if the council won't back them. One possible response, a U.S. diplomat said, would be a naval blockade to prevent nuclear-related materials from entering or leaving the country.

North Korea Urged To Cancel Nuclear Test (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0078534

AP, October 7, 2006

With speculation mounting of a North Korean nuclear test as early as this weekend, a unanimous U.N. Security Council urged the secretive, communist nation Friday to abandon all atomic weapons as it promised last year and cancel plans to detonate a device. Japan hinted the North could face sanctions or possible military action.

A statement adopted by the council expresses "deep concern" over North Korea's announcement that it planned a test — which would confirm strong suspicions it is a nuclear power — and warns Pyongyang of unspecified consequences if it carries through. The message also urges the North to return to six-party talks on scrapping its nuclear weapons program.

With tensions rising, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il met hundreds of his top military commanders and urged them to bolster the nation's defenses, as officers cheered, "Fight at the cost of our lives!" the North's official Korean Central News Agency reported earlier Friday.

A North Korea expert in China, the North's closest ally, said only the removal of American economic sanctions against Pyongyang could dissuade the country from carrying out a nuclear test.

"North Korea has already made a decision to carry out a test," said Li Dunqiu, of China's State Council Development Research Center, a Cabinet-level think tank. But "if the U.S. removes sanctions ... then tensions can be eased. Otherwise launching a nuclear test is unavoidable for North Korea."

The United States imposed economic sanctions on North Korea last year to punish it for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering. For the last 13 months, North Korea has boycotted six-nation talks aimed at persuading it to abandon its nuclear ambitions.

North Korea said Tuesday it decided to act in the face of what it claimed was "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war," but gave no date for the test. Washington has repeatedly said it has no intention of invading North Korea.

Both China and Russia have urged the United States and North Korea to hold talks, which Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said Friday "could be useful in resolving the situation." But he said U.S. Ambassador John Bolton informed the council that there would be no North Korean-U.S. talks except in the margins of resumed six-party talks.

Bolton said the Security Council needs to adopt a long-term strategy to deal with North Korea but the top U.S. priority now is to stop a nuclear test.

"We take the threat by North Korea seriously. We don't think this is an attention-getting device of people waving their arm to say `see me, see me.' We think this would be consistent with the unfortunate logic that North Korea has been following," he said.

"North Korea should understand how strongly the United States and many other council members feel that they should not test this nuclear device," Bolton said. "And that if they do test it, it would be a very different world the day after the test ... because there would be another nuclear power."

Russia's Churkin said threatening or conducting a nuclear test "would not help anybody including North Korea."

"This message is very clearly conveyed in the useful presidential statement which we today adopted," he said. "Let's hope that things will cool off and that everybody will return to six-party talks."

South Korea's Foreign Ministry also urged its communist neighbor to return to talks and applauded the council's warning.

"North Korea should be held responsible for any consequences that could be caused by a test," the ministry said Saturday.

The warning was read at a formal meeting by the council president, Ambassador Kenzo Oshima of Japan. The Japanese Foreign Ministry issued a statement later saying if North Korea defies international concerns about a test, "the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures."

Japan, which would be in close proximity to any North Korean nuclear test, proposed the initial text of the statement, which becomes part of the council record. Oshima had pressed to have it adopted before Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe travels to China on Sunday and South Korea on Monday with a message that the North should stop testing.

"It's good that the council has come up with a very clear, strongly worded message warning against a nuclear test" before the "very important" Japan-China summit meeting, Oshima said.

The statement says a nuclear test would not help Pyongyang address its concerns, especially strengthening its security.

It warns that a nuclear test would bring "universal condemnation," lead to further unspecified council action, and "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond."

DOJ_NMG_0078535

The council said it "deplores" the pursuit of nuclear weapons by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, known as the DPRK.

"The Security Council will be monitoring the situation closely," the statement said. "The Security Council stresses that a nuclear test, if carried out by the DPRK, would represent a clear threat to international peace and security and that should the DPRK ignore calls of the international community, the Security Council will act consistent with its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations."

Oshima indicated that the North could face sanctions or possible military action under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter if it detonates a nuclear device. Chapter 7 outlines actions the council can take to deal with threats to international peace. He stressed that the statement says a nuclear test would constitute such a threat, which "is clear enough."

"I think the terms in which this statement was prepared clearly indicate what will be the consequences of their action if they, in fact, resort to a nuclear test," Oshima said.

The statement also urges North Korea to return immediately to the six-party talks and work toward implementation of a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The six parties to the talks are the two Koreas, China, Japan, the United States and Russia.

The council acted amid speculation that a nuclear test could come on Sunday, the anniversary of Kim's appointment as head of the Communist party in 1997. Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shotaro Yachi, currently in Washington, told the Japan's TV Asahi: "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend."

The dispatch by North Korea's news agency did not mention a nuclear test.

North Korean state television showed still photos of Kim, with his distinctive bouffant-hair, waving to an assembled crowd of about 500 olive-suited officers in dress caps. Kim later posed for a group photo with his commanders in front of Pyongyang's sprawling mausoleum for his father and national founder, Kim Il Sung.

The meeting was the reclusive leader's first reported appearance in three weeks and the first since Tuesday, when his government shocked the world by announcing plans to test a nuclear device on its way to building an atomic arsenal.

It was unclear when the rally took place, or how many attended, but it could show that Kim is trying to polish his credentials with the military at a time when international pressure is mounting on Pyongyang.

Associated Press writers Hans Greimel and Bo-Mi Lim in Seoul, South Korea, Kana Inagaki and Mari Yamaguchi in Tokyo, and Foster Klug in Washington contributed to this report.

UN Warns N Korea On Nuclear Test (FT)

By Mark Turner And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

The United Nations Security Council has agreed a unanimous statement, warning North Korea to refrain from testing a nuclear weapon, or face unspecified action.

Details of the statement were expected to be read by Kenzo Oshima, the council president and Japan's UN ambassador, at a formal open meeting of the council later in on Friday, said Vitaly Churkin, Russia's UN ambassador.

Should North Korea ignore the UN's calls, according to an earlier draft statement, "the Security Council will act consistent with its responsibility under the charter of the United Nations", language that could lead to sanctions or tougher measures.

The negotiations came amid warnings from Japan that the reclusive state could conduct a test as soon as this weekend. "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend,'' Shotaro Yachi, the Japanese vice-foreign minister, told Japanese broadcaster TV Asahi.

According to the draft UN statement: "The members of the Security Council deem that should the DPRK [North Korea] carry out its threat of a nuclear weapon test, it would jeopardise peace, stability and security in the region and beyond. Such a test would bring universal condemnation," it said, and called for an early resumption of the six-party talks aimed at achieving "the verifiable denuclearisation of the Korean Peninsula".

John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, said before the meeting: "If they do test it, it will be a very different world the day after. There would be another nuclear power. This would be proof positive of North Korea having a weapon."

DOJ_NMG_0078536

Mr Churkin warned: “Non-proliferation is very important internationally, for the region and for North Korea.

“It would be in everyone’s interest for them to refrain from this action. We think that bilateral contacts between the US and North Korea could be useful in resolving the situation,” he said. But he had heard no proposals for a broader strategy

China has clashed with the US over the precise strategy, resulting in a harsh exchange of words in a closed-door session earlier this week.

The US is reportedly looking at possible sanctions against North Korea. Chris Hill, US assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled six-party talks, said on Wednesday: “We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea. We are not going to accept it.”

The US would “have no choice but to act resolutely”, he told the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University in Washington.

He refused to say precisely what the US would do in the event of a nuclear test, but indicated the response could be some kind of blockade, saying the top US priority was to prevent proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Fuad Al-Siniora The Accidental Prime Minister (WSJ)

By Michael Young

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

BEIRUT -- There was a time, not so long ago, when Fuad al-Siniora was the most vilified man in Lebanon. As the person in charge of the nation's finances under the late prime minister, Rafiq Hariri, he was regarded by the Lebanese as the abominable taxman. On the evening of Hariri's assassination on Feb. 14, 2005, it was another Mr. Siniora I recall seeing among a gathering of anti-Syrian opposition figures at the Hariri mansion -- a proper technocrat, seemingly misplaced amid the promenading politicians. Yet when the opposition elected a majority to parliament later in the year, Mr. Siniora emerged, almost naturally, as the successor to his onetime boss. For now, despite efforts by an array of forces to bring his government down, Mr. Siniora remains firmly in place.

There is an urban Sunni merchant's litheness in that metamorphosis from staid number-cruncher to persuasive prime minister. A native of the southern port city of Sidon who started his career as a Citibank executive, Mr. Siniora is velvety and unflappable, as befits a maven of the Levantine marketplace. He avoids hard angles in favor of nods, winks and baroque compromises -- qualities essential for herding the fat cats that make up Lebanese government.

Mr. Siniora receives me in his cavernous office in the Grand Sérail, an Ottoman barracks that after World War I housed the French Mandatory authorities. The vast structure, built in 1853, was destroyed during Lebanon's civil war, before Hariri rebuilt it as a headquarters for the prime minister. Mr. Siniora now works as well as lives there, with his family. These days, like most of Syria's Lebanese foes, he spends much time indoors, to avoid assassination. * * *

During the summer war between Hezbollah and Israel, Mr. Siniora walked a tightrope. A seven-point plan he devised was instrumental in creating a framework for an exit from the conflict and the extension of Lebanese state authority to the southern border. But this little endeared him to Hezbollah, which controlled an autonomous area in the south from which the Lebanese Army had been excluded. As Israel began bombing after the abduction of two of its soldiers on July 12, the prime minister had to balance conflicting interests: to use the violence as leverage to loosen Hezbollah's hold over the south, but without appearing to betray the party, which controls two ministers in his cabinet.

The highwire act is continuing. That's why Mr. Siniora will admit that "it's definitely difficult now for Hezbollah to conduct any military operation south of the Litani River" -- but he won't gloat. On the contrary, he insists, "We managed to stop Israel from winning, for the second time since the October 1973 Arab-Israeli war. This is important in the conscience of the Arabs." When I point out he is being disingenuous, that he and his allies in the parliamentary majority were never keen to see Hezbollah make gains, let alone endorse its claim of having scored a "victory" against Israel, Mr. Siniora says: "There were heroic efforts by [Hezbollah] combatants and by Lebanese who received the displaced. But I don't claim we won a victory. We could have sent the army south without this war, and we've now done so for the first time in 35 years. But here were the negatives: My country was reoccupied; it was destroyed; Israel took us back 10 years [economically]; and we must comply with international resolutions that affect Lebanese sovereignty."

DOJ_NMG_0078537

I bring up a prickly moment two weeks ago when Hezbollah's secretary-general, Hassan Nasrallah, speaking at a rally in Beirut's southern suburbs, mocked Mr. Siniora. Last August, during an Arab League foreign ministers' summit in Beirut at the height of the fighting, the prime minister dissolved into tears in the midst of a speech defending Lebanon's Arab bona fides. In his address, Mr. Nasrallah affirmed: "Tears don't liberate [land]." What did Mr. Siniora think of the statement? "I don't react to every word I hear. I take it easy. I have a high degree of serenity. . . . Yet the impact of those tears on all the Arab world was greater than a thousand rockets [Hezbollah] fired on Israel."

There was a less obvious subtext to the exchange. The Arab summit was very much an effort by the predominantly Sunni Arab states to contain Shiite Iran and Hezbollah in Lebanon. Their way of doing so was to support the Siniora plan, which sought to remove excuses for new wars in the south. This succeeded: Aspects of the seven-point plan, including Lebanon's declaring a desire to return to the 1949 Armistice Agreement with Israel, were integrated into the U.N. resolution that ended the fighting, and Hezbollah agreed to them, albeit reluctantly. Mr. Nasrallah, in ridiculing Mr. Siniora, was expressing antipathy for his attachment to a Sunni Arab order that Hezbollah loathes.

As for a return to the armistice, I suggest to Mr. Siniora that this is easier said than done. Some experts argue the agreement is no longer valid, given its repeated violations; others say it needs to be updated. More importantly, Hezbollah and Iran don't like it. Mr. Siniora is dismissive: "It doesn't have to be updated or renegotiated. It was approved by the government, and will be implemented de facto." But going back to an armistice first requires a resolution of the disputed Shebaa Farms issue. The U.N. says the farms area, occupied by Israel, is Syrian; the Lebanese say it is part of Lebanon. Mr. Siniora wants to place it under U.N. auspices until this is decided, in effect forcing the Israelis out. His aim is to deny Hezbollah a reason to pursue armed resistance there. But the U.N. is not enthusiastic. Won't this only encourage Hezbollah to say Mr. Siniora's methods have failed, justifying the guns again? "What can armed resistance bring?" he retorts. "Israel recently reoccupied Lebanon. Only diplomacy made them withdraw."

Would Hezbollah play along, given its Iranian agenda? "I must assume that, and act as if Hezbollah has a Lebanese agenda," he answers. However, his government is not taking chances: "There are no restrictions on the Lebanese army's movements in the south. It has clear instructions to prohibit the appearance of weapons or uniforms, and to confiscate them." More worrying is that the U.N. force helping the Lebanese might be attacked by al Qaeda, or by Islamists supported by Syria. Does Mr. Siniora consider this likely? "I don't think so," he answers, adding, far less reassuringly, "but we should take our precautions." * * *

The prime minister tells me once again that he has "a high level of serenity," but he does seem unsettled by the increasing pressure from Hezbollah, Christian leader Michel Aoun, Syria and Iran for him and the parliamentary majority to accept a new "national unity" government. He even sounds mildly irritated: "Change is unwarranted. Our performance this summer was outstanding. We passed the seven-point plan, reworked the U.N. resolution on Lebanon in our favor, ended the hostilities, sent the army south, forced Israel out, and gained international support, including financial support. What more could be done?"

Some discern more sinister designs in the effort to bring the government down. A few days ago, on Wednesday, the influential Christian Maronite bishops issued a statement implying that the call for a broader cabinet was a furtive way of blocking progress in the Hariri investigation. In the coming weeks the government must consent to guidelines for a mixed tribunal to try those accused of involvement in the late prime minister's murder. Syria is the leading suspect, and Mr. Siniora's allies fear the push to change the government is meant to ensure there are enough pro-Syrian ministers to block any cabinet vote on the tribunal -- or impose a limper court.

The prime minister is sanguine. "This is a tempest in a teapot. My experience in this cabinet is that in a very limited number of cases did we resort to voting. The tribunal was agreed upon [in a national dialogue between Lebanese leaders], and it's in no one's interest to make an issue of it." But his last phase is plainly a warning to Hezbollah, one Mr. Siniora repeats: "If someone tries to stop the legal process, then we must make sure we don't go back on what was agreed." When I ask whether Syria is the Svengali behind the new government plan, he sidesteps only slightly: "The effort is being made by people who are pro-Syrian."

But Mr. Siniora's strongest argument against a cabinet change comes in an anodyne phrase: "Nabih Birri says it might be difficult to form a new government, and could take Lebanon into a crisis to no one's advantage." Mr. Birri is the parliament speaker, and a Shiite. By invoking him, Mr. Siniora is using one powerful Shiite to offset the demands of another, Mr. Nasrallah, in warning that a political vacuum might ensue.

DOJ_NMG_0078538

Politics are not the only thing the prime minister has to worry about. With a $40 billion debt, a GDP estimated at only $18 to $20 billion, and losses from the July-August conflict estimated by some U.N. agencies at over $10 billion, Lebanon is in dire financial straits. Mr. Siniora says the situation was already "unsustainable" before the "catastrophe," making reform imperative. What he outlines, however, is a dilemma.

Lebanon's credit rating is set to go down in the near future, and the government urgently needs revenue. However, Mr. Siniora is first to admit that, given the country's dark mood, "we cannot raise taxes, this would lead to a recession. We need alternative sources." He means privatization, particularly of the lucrative fixed and mobile telecommunications network.

Fair enough, except that unless the government shows tangible progress on financial reform soon, particularly on privatization, a long-anticipated international donor conference to help Lebanon out of its debt noose will not materialize. And like so much else, privatization remains vulnerable to political discord. So, when Mr. Siniora says the conference might happen "I hope before the end of the year," I have my doubts.

A government priority is compensating those whose homes were destroyed in the recent fighting. Hezbollah garnered publicity by handing money to victims out of suitcases, an approach it sought to contrast with the slowness of the state's reaction. Does Mr. Siniora see himself in competition with the party? "No. We have an obligation toward the people. It was not their mistake that they suffered." He accepts that "Hezbollah might politicize the relief effort against the government," and when I ask whether the party's distribution of funds had provoked problems in certain villages, Mr. Siniora probably sees an opportunity to get one back: "I've heard there are problems. Giving more aid to certain people and less to others creates a great deal of sensitivity."

As we wrap up, the inevitable question provokes an inevitable answer. I ask Mr. Siniora what it feels like being a marked man. "I'm a believer. I know that if anything must happen, it will happen. But I take my precautions. I'm afraid of God. My mother once said: 'Don't be afraid of whoever is afraid of God.'" Many of Mr. Siniora's enemies will readily admit, of course, to a fear of God. What he must worry about is that they will increasingly fear Fuad al-Siniora, the accidental prime minister who may have turned out to be more than they bargained for.

Mr. Young, a Lebanese national, is opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine.

'We Will Not Recognize Israel,' Palestinian Premier Affirms (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 6 — In a defiant speech delivered to a teeming crowd of Hamas supporters, the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, insisted on Friday that his Hamas movement would not recognize Israel despite the cutoff in Western aid that has strangled his government.

"I tell you with all honesty, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel," Mr. Haniya said to thunderous applause from tens of thousands of supporters, many waving green Hamas flags, at the Yarmouk soccer stadium in Gaza City.

Mr. Haniya's remarks appeared to be aimed at the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who met Wednesday in the West Bank. At that time, Mr. Abbas declared that talks between his secular Fatah movement and Hamas on a Palestinian unity government had broken down, and that the political stalemate could not go on indefinitely.

Mr. Abbas says there is a need for a new Palestinian government that will recognize Israel and deal with it. He also indicated that he was prepared to invoke his presidential powers and dismiss the current government, which is dominated by Hamas, the radical Islamic movement.

Less than a month ago, on Sept. 11, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya agreed in principle to form a unity government in an effort to find a way out of the worsening political and economic crisis facing the Palestinians. The goal was to bring Fatah and other political factions into the government. And the hope was that this would persuade Israel, the United States and the European Union to resume the flow of money that had been cut off when Hamas assumed power.

DOJ_NMG_0078539

Without that aid the Palestinian Authority has been unable to pay salaries, provide services or govern in any meaningful way.

But the blunt public remarks by Mr. Abbas on Wednesday and Mr. Haniya on Friday reflected what seems to be an increasingly bitter power struggle that could dim the prospects for a compromise.

Still, Mr. Haniya called on Mr. Abbas, who works in the West Bank city of Ramallah, to return to Gaza to resume talks on a broad-based government. “Come down to Gaza to protect our people and declare our commitment to a national unity government,” Mr. Haniya said.

But Mr. Abbas has given no indication that he plans to accept the invitation any time soon. Mr. Haniya and other senior Hamas officials are based in Gaza, and Israel does not permit them to travel to the West Bank.

During the lengthy speech on a sweltering afternoon, Mr. Haniya appeared on the verge of collapse at one point and could not continue his remarks. Bodyguards rushed to physically support him and whisked him off the stage. During the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, Mr. Haniya, like many Muslims, observes a dawn-to-dusk fast, which apparently caused his weakness.

He re-emerged about 10 minutes later and continued. “Our bodies may get tired, but our souls will not,” Mr. Haniya said as the crowd roared.

The United States and the European Union are demanding that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian accords.

In negotiations, Fatah and Hamas have sought a formula under which a new government would accept such positions, though Hamas as a political party would not be forced to endorse them. But Hamas has repeatedly rejected the Western demands, and Fatah leaders say they see no rationale for joining a unity government that will continue to be ostracized by the Western countries and much of the international community.

Israel, which is withholding more than $50 million a month in taxes and customs duties it collects for the Palestinians, refuses to deal with the Hamas government. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert says he is willing to meet with Mr. Abbas, but stresses that there is no prospect for progress until the Palestinians release an Israeli soldier seized by Palestinian militants and taken to Gaza on June 25.

Mr. Haniya, meanwhile, said that the Palestinians faced an “unethical and unjust siege led by the United States administration,” and that “many parties, internal and external, colluded in an attempt to force us to surrender.” He noted that even Arab governments had not invited him to visit, aside from Qatar.

The Fatah-Hamas friction boiled over into street fighting in Gaza on Sunday and Monday, leaving 10 Palestinians dead and more than 100 wounded in some of the worst internal fighting in recent years. The violence has subsided, but the tension remains.

Haniyeh: Hamas Won't Recognize Israel (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Hamas will not recognize Israel or give in to international pressure that has crippled the Palestinian government, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh told tens of thousands of banner-waving supporters at a rally Friday.

Haniyeh's fiery speech was interrupted when he fainted onstage, apparently overcome by the heat and two weeks of dawn-to-dusk fasting during the holy month of Ramadan. He resumed his speech after a few minutes.

"I tell you with all honesty, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel," Haniyeh declared to a roar of applause from the crowd. "We say we will be in every government, we will stay in the government."

The Hamas leader ruled out a proposal by members of his own Hamas movement to form a new government of technocrats as a way of winning international support and ending a seven-month aid freeze.

"There are new scenarios, such as an emergency government, a technocrat government, or early elections," Haniyeh told the crowd in a packed soccer stadium. "They all aim at one thing, getting Hamas out of the government."

DOJ_NMG_0078540

Moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who was elected separately, has the authority to dissolve the Hamas Cabinet and replace it with an emergency government, or could call early elections. However, Abbas aides say he's not considering either option at the moment, fearing such moves would not have popular support. An emergency government would also require approval of the parliament, which is controlled by Hamas.

Haniyeh said Hamas remains willing to invite other parties into a coalition, but that it would not soften its positions. In addition to recognizing Israel, the international community demands that Hamas renounce violence and accept existing peace agreements.

He accused the international community of trying to impose its will on the Palestinians. "They want a government with American and Israeli dimensions that implements external dictates, the so-called Quartet demands," he said, referring to the group of Mideast peacemakers — the U.S., the U.N., the European Union and Russia.

Haniyeh said his best offer to Israel was a temporary truce in return for establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with its capital in Jerusalem, over which Israel claims complete sovereignty. He also repeated demands for the release of thousands of Palestinians held in Israeli prisons

The 46-year-old leader's address had just got under way when, apparently weakened by fasting and the sweltering hot day, he began to slur his words, then slumped against aides surrounding him. He sat on a chair and resumed his address after a few minutes.

"Our bodies can get tired, but our soul will not, and we will not stop our steadfastness," he said of the incident.

The rally, with heavy security provided by armed Hamas militiamen, came at a time of increasing tension between the Islamic group and Abbas' Fatah Party.

The dispute between the two groups erupted into gunbattles last week, fueling concerns it could escalate into a full-fledged civil war.

Haniyeh called for Abbas to come to Gaza from his West Bank headquarters for talks to defuse the crisis. "Come here to Gaza to resume dialogue to protect the unity of our people," he said.

Hamas won a parliamentary election in January, bringing the party into direct confrontation with Abbas, who controls some of the security forces and backs peace talks with Israel.

In the West Bank on Friday, Israeli troops and Palestinians scuffled at a checkpoint south of Jerusalem when hundreds of Muslims tried to enter the Israeli-ruled city for Muslim prayers, witnesses said.

The Palestinians had arrived at the checkpoint, seeking to reach the Al Aqsa Mosque, Islam's third-holiest shrine. When some 300 people began pushing forward, paramilitary border police threw stun grenades to disperse the crowd.

A spokesman for the border police said nobody was injured in the incident.

During Ramadan, tens of thousands of Muslims attend prayers at the mosque. Citing security concerns, Israel bars Palestinian men under the age of 40 from reaching the site, in Jerusalem's walled Old City.

We Can't Go Home Again (NYT)

By Sam Bahour

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

Ramallah, West Bank

THIRTEEN years ago, I left a comfortable life in the United States for an uncertain future in the West Bank. Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization had just signed the Oslo Accords. Like many others, I saw an opportunity for Palestinians to finally build a society and economy that would lead to freedom — to a thriving Palestine alongside Israel.

As a Palestinian-American businessman, I was determined to do my part. So I moved to the West Bank city of El Bireh, where my family has lived for centuries. There I helped create a $100 million telecommunications company, which today employs more than 2,000 Palestinians. I earned an M.B.A. through Tel Aviv University. Then I developed a $10 million shopping center — the first of its kind in the Palestinian territories, employing more than 220 Palestinians. I married and had two beautiful daughters.

Now the Israeli authorities have decided that my life here has come to an end.

DOJ_NMG_0078541

Even after the Oslo Accords were signed and the Palestinian Authority established, Israel retained control of all borders and of the Palestinian Population Registry. Nothing or no one gets into or out of the West Bank and Gaza without Israeli permission. For a dozen years I have waited for Israel to approve my application for Palestinian residency.

American Jews, indeed Jews from anywhere in the world, can come to Israel and be granted automatic citizenship. Thousands of American Jews freely enter and exit Israel to live in illegal Israeli settlements in the middle of the West Bank. But Palestinians whose families have lived here continually for centuries do not enjoy the same right. I need a residency card from Israel to live with my Palestinian family in my grandfather's home in the Palestinian West Bank.

For 13 years, I've lived here by renewing my tourist visa every three months. Last month, an Israeli soldier stamped my American passport with a one-month visa and wrote "last permit" on it in Arabic, Hebrew and English. Now I am faced with a terrible choice. I can leave, uprooting my family and abandoning the businesses I've worked hard to build. I can leave alone and be separated from my wife and daughters. Or I can remain here "illegally," risking deportation at any time.

My situation is not unique. Thousands of Palestinians are in a similar limbo. Most have less desirable options than mine. My children are American citizens. We can return to the United States. But I came here with a vision, and I remain determined to play a role in developing an economy, nonviolently ending Israel's military occupation and building a Palestinian state.

Israeli policies effectively discourage people like me. According to the Israeli human rights group B'Tselem, it has been official Israeli policy since 1983 to "reduce, as much as possible, the approval of requests for family unification" of Palestinians. B'Tselem reports that in the last six years alone, more than 70,000 people have applied for permission to immigrate to the West Bank and Gaza to join family. Their applications have either been denied or, like mine, languish.

Each Palestinian who leaves lessens what Israelis openly call the "demographic threat" of a growing Palestinian population. But Israel needs to understand that the real threat comes not from demographics. It comes from controlling an entire population, breaking families apart and placing obstacles in the path of economic development.

Israelis and Palestinians are destined to be neighbors. One neighbor cannot ensure its security by condemning the other to hardship and despair. Many people like me — business owners, educators, artists and others — whom Israel is denying entry came to build bridges, not walls. We came to invest in a better life to follow this occupation — a bright, joint future for Palestinian and Israeli children alike.

Report Of Plot To Attack Jews Prompts Terror Alert In Prague (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 6 — A report that there was a plot to attack Jews in Prague has set off a terrorism alert there, a Prague newspaper reported Friday.

The Czech news media have been feverishly speculating on the nature of the threat since the government announced heightened security measures on Sept. 23, the first day of the Jewish New Year. The Czech interior minister, Ivan Langer, called the threat "unprecedented in the history of the Czech Republic."

The government has refused to characterize the threat further other than to say that information about it came from foreign intelligence services.

That has led some Czech news organizations to suggest that the terrorism alert was related to the arrest of three Norwegian men earlier in September on charges of plotting to bomb the United States and Israeli Embassies in Oslo. One of those men, a Norwegian of Pakistani origin named Arfan Qadeer Bhatti, had close contacts with a notorious ethnic Albanian gun and drug runner who operated for years out of Prague.

The news of possible terrorism threats in both Oslo and Prague raise the possibility that Islamist terrorist plots, having been foiled by vigilant antiterrorism efforts in capitals like Paris and London, are turning to "softer" targets elsewhere in Europe where security is more lax.

President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan alleges in his memoir, published in the United States last month, that in 2003 Al Qaeda planned to hijack planes from the national carriers of the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Croatia, Poland, Romania and Malta for use in a Sept.-11-style attack against Heathrow Airport near London "because security at these airports and in their aircraft was lax."

DOJ_NMG_0078542

The Czech newspaper Mlada Fronta Dnes reported Friday that an attack was supposed to coincide with Rosh Hashana, the Jewish New Year, during which many Israeli Jews visit the picturesque capital. The holiday was celebrated from sunset on Sept. 22 until nightfall on Sept. 26 this year.

According to the newspaper, which cited unidentified Czech intelligence officials, "Arab terrorists wanted to abduct dozens of people, hold them hostage, and, in the end, massacre all of them."

Government officials have declined to comment on the report. The newspaper quoted one unnamed minister as saying that an abduction plot was only an "extreme" possibility.

The heightened security alert was followed by several anonymous bomb threats, which interrupted service on a Prague subway and forced the evacuation of a hotel, but proved to be false.

Nonetheless, police officers bearing automatic weapons continue to patrol Prague's airport, train stations and the areas around the city's seven major synagogues, residents say.

China Reports Increase In Gauge Of Foreign Trade (WSJ)

By J.r. Wu

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

BEIJING -- China's current-account surplus in the first half of this year totaled $91.58 billion, widening from $67.26 billion in the same period a year earlier, the country's foreign-exchange regulator said Friday.

The current-account surplus in the January-June period was bolstered by a growing surplus in China's trade in goods, the State Administration of Foreign Exchange said in a statement on its Web site.

The latest data indicate China's current-account surplus is on track to exceed the $160.82 billion posted for full-year 2005. The current account is the broadest gauge of foreign trade and it measures trade in goods, services, tourism and investment.

"We expect China's current account in the second half of the year, especially trade in goods, to maintain a relatively large surplus," SAFE said in China's first-half 2006 balance-of-payments report.

As part of its aim of achieving equilibrium in the balance of payments, including moving toward yuan convertibility on the capital account, SAFE reiterated it will encourage outflows and control the use of foreign debt.

It said it will continue to expand channels for overseas financial investments made by banks, brokerages, and insurance institutions.

SAFE will also seek to control the use of foreign debt by domestic institutions and encourage the early repayment of medium- and long-term foreign debt.

An Iron Fist, Extended Harmoniously (LAT)

By Mark Magnier, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

As China's leadership prepares for a key meeting, President Hu is showing he means business when he calls for unity in the party.

BEIJING — In advance of a key Communist Party meeting this weekend, Chinese President Hu Jintao has worked overtime to burnish the image of harmony in the party, even if it's taken some bloodletting to drive the point home.

The purge late last month of Shanghai party boss Chen Liangyu on corruption charges, quickly followed by the fall of two prominent party officials in Henan province, sent shock waves through China's political establishment.

The incidents also served as a warning to those in lower party ranks that Hu means business, further consolidating his power and stressing his underdogoriented policies as he heads into the fourth year of an expected 10-year administration.

Hu has stressed the importance of harmony as a salve for growing tensions over China's rich-poor gap and endemic corruption — even as the party and the nation's wide-ranging security apparatus have backed up words with force, intimidation and censorship when appeals for calm are ignored by rioting farmers, the media or social activists.

DOJ_NMG_0078543

It comes as no surprise, then, that "harmonious society" will be the theme of this year's Central Committee meeting, which starts Sunday and runs through Wednesday. About 350 members of the party elite will attend.

Beyond the pageantry and long-winded speeches, the party conference serves an important function in the Chinese political world.

On a stage before China's 70 million party members and its vast nonparty population, Hu hopes to further demarcate his policies from those of predecessor Jiang Zemin, who placed greater emphasis on economic winners.

The meeting also aims to bind lower-tier state and party workers to the leadership after extensive promotions and government reshuffling. And it will emphasize anti-corruption themes, the environment and the building of a social safety net in a bid to reach out to an increasingly cynical public.

"Hu's policies will be endorsed more strongly than ever before," said Cheng Li, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and author of "China's Leaders: The New Generation." "Moving into his second term, you'll see more policy initiatives, although probably not much political reform."

Chinese presidents in recent decades have tended to spend their first five-year term consolidating power and their second making their policy mark. It's a laborious process, analogous to a U.S. president inheriting his predecessor's Cabinet and then spending years nudging out the old guard through attrition, transfers, intrigue and strategic use of scandals.

Hu's recent power plays are in line with this timetable. Chen, a fellow member of the "Shanghai gang," was an ally of Jiang who in recent years defied Beijing's call to discourage real estate speculation and stem other policies favoring the well-heeled.

Speculation is rife that other Politburo members with ties to Jiang — Jia Qinglin and Huang Ju have been mentioned — may be squeezed out in coming months or, at the least, forced to retire by the Party Congress next fall.

Governing China, with its vast size, complex problems and economic and social turmoil, would challenge any politician, and so far Hu has exceeded generally modest expectations. His identification with the poor and underprivileged plays well, particularly outside the big cities, as does his modesty.

He has avoided major mistakes. And his quiet competence is generally admired by a nation on the move.

Now that he has the power, many analysts are looking closely at what he does with it. Few expect many new ideas during his likely 2007-12 second term, given his relatively cautious, conservative style.

There is likely to be continued emphasis on rural education, welfare issues, unemployment funds and allocation of resources from the richer coastal region to poorer interior areas.

But some see potentially interesting shadow plays in the wings, including gradual moves to strengthen the rule of law and improve human rights. These reflect the concerns of a growing middle class and an awareness of China's checkered international reputation as it prepares to host the 2008 Olympics.

That contrasts with the dim chances for change in the way China is run, although there may be some tinkering with the relationship between the central and local governments.

"The regime's institutional changes have so far served to consolidate rather than weaken authoritarianism," said Andrew Nathan, a political science professor at Columbia University.

To date, attacks on corruption appear selective rather than systemic.

And despite the many problems and contradictions inherent in China's one-party political system, few analysts expect much progress toward multiparty elections, a robust media, empowered civic watchdogs, an independent court system or external checks on police abuses anytime soon.

If anything, the Communist leadership in recent years has become even more jealous of its monopoly, actively rooting out even the hint of a threat amid suggestions it is running scared.

"Beijing will try to find ways to enhance governability without major changes that it deems unsettling to the regime," said Xiaobo Lu, a professor of political science at Barnard College and Columbia University.

"By implementing socially and economically harmonious policies," he added, "the leaders hope to avoid more painful, possibly destabilizing, political changes."

Russia Deports Georgians And Increases Pressures On Businesses And Students (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0078544

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 6 — Russia deported 153 citizens of Georgia on Friday as a wave of punitive measures against Georgian migrants and businesses grew, prompting criticism that the government is carrying out an ethnically motivated campaign of harassment.

The deportations came at the end of a week of political and diplomatic conflict between Russia and Georgia that began with the arrests of four Russian military officers for espionage, and has shown little sign of easing despite the officers' release.

The police, who had already begun to shutter some businesses linked to Georgians, searched and closed still more on Friday, including two more casinos and two of Moscow's better-known Georgian restaurants, according to officials and news reports.

At least some schools in Moscow received requests from the police to list students with Georgian names, presumably to help in identifying illegal immigrants, prompting a complaint from an education official, Lyubov Kezina.

And one of the country's most famous writers, Grigory Chkhartishvili, a Georgian native who writes under the pseudonym Boris Akunin, told a radio station that tax inspectors questioned his publisher about his income from his hugely popular novels.

Yuri Dzhibladze, an ethnic Georgian and president of the Center for the Development of Democracy and Human Rights in Moscow, described the authorities' actions as an unjustified overreaction to political disputes with Georgia's president, Mikheil Saakashvili.

"It smacks of racism and xenophobia," he said in a telephone interview.

Russian officials have cited legal or procedural violations as justifications for their actions, accusing the casinos and restaurants of violating health or other regulatory standards and the deportees of breaking immigration laws. "Everything that is taking place today is exclusively within the framework of the law," the prosecutor general, Yuri Y. Chaika, said on Friday, according to Interfax.

Officials' remarks, however, have left little doubt that they have singled out Georgians for enforcement.

Mikhail L. Tyurkin, the head of the country's migration service, said on Thursday that all future work visas for Georgians would be eliminated. "Our analyses showed that today we do not need to attract Georgian citizens," he said.

In the wake of last week's arrests, which provoked an ominous war of words between the countries, Russia severed transportation links to Georgia, effective Tuesday, and has vowed to restrict postal service and money transfers.

The steps against Georgians in Russia have coincided with two new campaigns announced this week by President Vladimir V. Putin. On Wednesday, he proposed sweeping new restrictions on gambling. A day later, he called for new regulations of migrant workers, especially those in wholesale and retail markets, which he said were controlled by "semigangs, some of them ethnic."

Using some of the most strikingly nationalistic language of his presidency, Mr. Putin said that markets should be regulated "with a view to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population," according to the Kremlin's transcript of his remarks.

It is not clear exactly how many Georgian citizens live in Russia, though some estimates run as high as 1 million. Like many citizens of former Soviet republics, they come to Russia to work, often temporarily, sending money home to support their families.

The Georgians deported on Friday were detained over the last several days in what officials have described as a sweep of illegal migrants. Viktor P. Beltsov, a spokesman for the Emergency Services Ministry, said that 153 deportees were flown to Georgia's capital, Tbilisi, aboard a ministry airplane from an airfield outside of Moscow.

The campaign against Georgians has been echoed in television and newspaper reports that have indulged in stereotypes and lurid descriptions of Georgian mafias and criminality. At the same time, however, the authorities have come under unusually sharp criticism in other parts of the news media.

"Searches in restaurants, closed casinos, threats of deportations looming over hundreds of thousands of people," a commentator, Demis Polandov, wrote in the newspaper Gazeta on Friday. "If this is not an ethnic cleansing, then I do not have a word to name it."

DOJ_NMG_0078545

Kremlin Rules (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

The world needs to watch Russia's current pressure on Georgia. Its decision this week to ban trade, travel and postal links to neighboring Georgia isn't the first time Moscow has tangled with the former Soviet republic. But it is a fresh reminder of just how paranoid and bullying the Kremlin's foreign policy has become in the hands of President Vladimir Putin.

The current dispute involves Georgia's arrest last week of four Russian officers, whom the Tbilisi government of President Mikheil Saakashvili accuses of being spies. Mr. Saakashvili quickly handed over the four "hostages" -- as Mr. Putin's government calls them -- to the custody of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which promptly returned them to Moscow.

That should have been the end of it. Instead, Mr. Putin's rubber-stamp parliament -- which already bars the import of Georgian goods, including its famous wines -- now threatens to prevent the 300,000 or more Georgians living in Russia from wiring money home. Yesterday, Mr. Putin urged the international community not to "ignore the irresponsibility of the Georgian government." His foreign minister, Sergei Lavrov, alleges that the arrest of the officers is part of a Western plot apparently hatched in Washington: "The seizure of our officers immediately followed, I repeat, NATO's decision to grant Georgia an intense cooperation plan, intense dialogue," he said, noting Mr. Saakashvili's recent visit to the U.S. as part of the annual meeting of the U.N. General Assembly.

Maybe Comrade Lavrov really believes the Bush Administration wastes its time hatching two-bit schemes in the Caucasus to humiliate Mother Russia. What we are likelier witnessing is another fit of Russian pique at Mr. Saakashvili's courageous decision to yank Georgia out of Moscow's orbit -- where it had remained for a dozen dreary years after its nominal independence from the Soviet Union in 1991 -- and into the orbit of the West.

Since coming to office after the 2003 Rose Revolution, the U.S.-educated Mr. Saakashvili has moved aggressively to reform and deregulate the Georgian economy. Customs tariffs have been abolished, income taxes have been cut to a flat 12% rate, inflation has been brought below 10%, growth is in double-digits, the birthrate is again positive and the World Bank now cites Georgia as a global role model in the fight against corruption. Mr. Saakashvili has also sent 900 troops to Iraq and brought Georgia into NATO's Partnership for Peace program, a likely precursor to actual membership.

All this can serve as a model for other former Soviet republics such as Kyrgyzstan and Ukraine as they struggle to prosper. It could also serve as a model for Russia itself, which may be why Moscow has used every opportunity to bring Georgia and its leaders to heel. Mr. Putin continues to provide military and political support to the breakaway Georgian provinces of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Earlier this year, gas and electricity lines to Georgia were mysteriously disrupted in the dead of winter in what senior Georgian officials believe was an act of sabotage by Mr. Putin's secret services. Georgia has now switched to Azeri gas and expects to maintain supplies through this winter.

That doesn't preclude future acts of mischief by Mr. Putin's KGB government, in Georgia or anywhere else in the former U.S.S.R. that they consider properly their own. Which is one reason to feel grateful that President Bush, after placing too much faith in Mr. Putin in his first term, has given Mr. Saakashvili the support he deserves. "Nobody else would stand up for cases like Georgia except if you're idealistic," the Georgian told us during a recent visit to our offices in New York. "And Americans are the most idealistic people in the world."

Castro Is Reported To Have Cancer (TIME)

By Timothy J. BURGER AND SALLY B. DONNELLY

Time, October 7, 2006

Ever since President Fidel Castro was sidelined for what was said to be abdominal surgery last July, Cuban officials have maintained that the country's leader will return to his post. "We will again have him leading the revolution," said Foreign Minister Felipe Pérez Roque just two days ago, speaking at an outdoor rally to protest the U.S. trade embargo against Cuba, according to the Communist Party daily newspaper Granma.

But U.S. officials tell TIME that many in the U.S. government are now convinced that Castro, 80, has terminal cancer and will never return to power. "Certainly we have heard this, that this guy has terminal cancer," said one U.S. official.

DOJ_NMG_0078546

Of course, such intelligence reports could be wrong, and one official cautioned that definitive proof is nearly impossible for the U.S. to come by. Yet the fact that the Cuban government removed Castro from the public stage before his death could suggest that Castro and his would-be successors were aware of a terminal condition and wanted to gauge public reaction to his absence. "They got to see how people would react," says one U.S. official. "They have had a chance to see how things might work without out him functioning day-to-day."

The U.S. government has been preparing for Castro's departure for half a century. But this time, the Bush Administration has set up an interagency group to coordinate policy once the inevitable happens.

That doesn't mean that things will change much. Fidel's brother Raul, 75, has been acting president since Fidel went into the hospital and has given no indication that he will change the policies of the isolated Communist government that has tormented the U.S. since taking power in 1959. Though he has until recently kept a very low profile, Raul Castro — not Fidel — was feted as the host of the non-aligned nations' summit on Sept. 15. Then Raul called a high profile meeting of the country's local, provincial and national leadership at what he called "this historic moment in our country's history." In another sign of his increasing prominence, two weeks ago Raul delivered his first televised national speech at the close of a trade union federation congress.

Hungarian PM Wins Confidence Vote (FT)

By Christopher Condon

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

Lawmakers from Hungary's two coalition parties on Friday signalled their near unanimous support for Ferenc Gyurcsany, the prime minister, in a confidence vote.

Despite a withering attack from the opposition and the knowledge that hundreds of thousands of Hungarians were expected to mass outside parliament to demand the prime minister's resignation later in the day, MPs voted 207-165 in favour of Mr Gyurcsany. Only three coalition MPs failed to vote for the measure.

Before the vote, Mr Gyurcsany offered a qualified apology for admitting to lying about state finances in a speech he gave to his party in May, the publication of which sparked rioting and anti-government protests last month.

On Friday, Mr Gyurcsany said he was sorry for not having confronted the budget problem earlier. He vowed again to continue austerity measures and to introduce public sector reforms designed to reduce the budget deficit from the 10 per cent of gross domestic product projected for this year.

Mr Gyurcsany vowed to press on with crucial public sector reforms and apologised for not speaking honestly about Hungary's budget woes earlier. "I call on parliament not to give in to threats and street blackmail organised by the opposition," he said.

In connection to the speech he made behind closed doors in May to his party – the publication of which three weeks ago sparked riots and an ongoing political crisis – Mr Gyurcsany said he regretted not making the same message public.

The speech was an emotional and obscenity-laced appeal to his party to stop lying and confront Hungary's mounting budget deficit with budget reforms. In it, Mr Gyurcsany admitted his party lied about state finances to win April's parliamentary elections.

As the prime minister spoke, opposition supporters gathered in the square outside parliament for a demonstration expected to draw hundreds of thousands calling for the prime minister's resignation.

The events are unlikely to resolve the most perilous political stand-off in Hungary's 16 years of post-communist democracy, and one that threatens to paralyse the country's badly needed efforts at budget reforms.

Both the government and the opposition this week contributed increasingly heated rhetoric to the three-week-old crisis.

Lajos Kosa, the mayor of Debrecen and a vice-president of Fidesz, the largest opposition party, warned that Hungarians might overthrow parliamentary democracy unless the prime minister resigned.

Opposition frustration stems from the prime minister's majority in parliament, which means that only a split in his coalition could topple the government.

DOJ_NMG_0078547

Investors, particularly long-term bond holders, are relying heavily on the ability of Hungary's government to continue new austerity measures and deliver public sector reforms. Both are needed to reduce the country's dangerously high budget deficit, which is expected to reach 10 per cent of gross domestic product this year.

The forint weakened modestly against the euro this week, though yields on Hungarian government bonds rose sharply, signalling nervousness among investors. At a Wednesday auction of six-month treasury bills, demand was down and yields rose to 8.62 per cent, compared with Tuesday's benchmark fixing of 8.30 per cent.

On Thursday, Hungary sold Ft40bn-worth ($185m, €146m, £99m) of one-year government bonds. The average yield rose to 8.84 per cent, compared with Wednesday's benchmark of 8.7 per cent.

Hungary PM Wins Vote Of Confidence (AP)

By Pablo Gorondi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany, whose admission that he lied to the country about Hungary's economy led to huge street protests, won a vote of confidence in parliament Friday.

The motion in support of Gyurcsany passed 207-165. He needed 193 votes to win.

Even as parliament voted, however, tens of thousands of people gathered on Kossuth Square just outside the legislature and demanded Gyurcsany's dismissal.

The Fidesz party called on supporters to bring alarm clocks to the rally, a symbolic wake-up call for the ruling coalition to get rid of the prime minister.

Gyurcsany, whose coalition suffered large setbacks in Sunday's nationwide municipal elections, had requested the vote of confidence to reinforce political support for his austerity package and the transformation of the inefficient public sector.

Speaking ahead of Friday's vote, Gyurcsany insisted he did not consciously mislead the country.

"I must reject accusations that the first Gyurcsany government falsified data, that it knowingly misled or deceived the people," he said.

Hungarians have been protesting since Sept. 17, when Gyurcsany was heard, in a leaked recording, admitting that the government lied about the economy to win April's general elections.

Two nights of rioting two weeks ago, including an attack on state television headquarters, injured some 150 police and dozens of participants.

In a May speech to Socialist lawmakers, Gyurcsany said his first government — the first to win re-election in post-communist Hungary — "lied throughout the last year and a half, two years.

"It was totally clear that what we are saying is not true. ... And at the same time, we did nothing for four years. Nothing," Gyurcsany said at the closed meeting May 26. "Instead, we lied morning, evening and night. I don't want to do it anymore."

But on Friday, the prime minister said the lies he had been referring to were about unsustainable policies implemented by Hungary since 2001 that led to a false sense of security and created illusions about the stability of the economy.

"Maybe we have to apologize because we allowed appearances to be maintained; what is more, we ourselves sustained the illusion that higher, larger incomes could be accomplished without better achievement," Gyurcsany said.

"I did not have the courage to tell the voters to their eyes that everything I did, everything we did, everything that many, many people in Hungary did and believed in for the past years, was based partly on self-deception, partly on lack of valor," he said.

"Yes, in this sense we eluded the facts, we were timid and we tried to avoid the straightest, most simple answers," he said. "If there's anything to apologize for, this is it. Sorry."

In the last few months, Gyurcsany's government has started implementing austerity measures and some reforms aimed at lowering the state budget deficit, which at over 10 percent of gross domestic product is the largest in the European Union.

Gyurcsany said the austerity and reforms would have negative effects next year before leading to improvements.

Former premier Viktor Orban, who leads the Fidesz party, has proposed the formation of a government of experts — not politicians — to find a solution to the country's economic crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0078548

"The prime minister does not listen to the people, the people do not and will not listen the prime minister," Orban told the crowd, estimated at 80,000 by state news agency MTI. "The consequences are difficult to foresee."

Orban said his party was not seeking early elections but would continue its Kossuth Square protest until the coalition replaced Gyurcsany, claiming Hungary's economic crisis would continue to deepen as long as he was power.

"We will be here every day," Orban said, standing on the steps of the parliament building's main entrance. "We have to do this even though we know it may be difficult and take a long time."

Sudan Divestment Effort Gains Momentum At State Level (WP)

By Nora Boustany, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

House members are scattering to their home states this week with inconclusive results on the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of western Sudan, but momentum is growing at the state level for governments to divest public funds from companies, mostly foreign-based, doing business with Khartoum.

In a victory for business lobbyists on Capitol Hill, lawmakers approved a Sudan sanctions bill stripped of language that would have endorsed states' rights to pass divestment laws. The National Foreign Trade Council, representing more than 300 multinational companies, had lobbied aggressively against the provision on state investments inserted by the House during its consideration of the bill last year.

A divestment movement, however, appears to be gaining momentum across the country, with active campaigns on university campuses and at city and state levels. Six states have already passed divestment laws: Maine, Connecticut, Oregon, Illinois, New Jersey and California.

Although state legislatures will not be in session until January, lawmakers in many states are pushing for divestment bills, according to Adam Sterling, the executive director of the Sudan Divestment Task Force, a nonprofit organization dedicated to the issue.

Colorado, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Vermont, Virginia and Washington could consider some form of legislation early next year, according to the task force's Web site, which is tracking the initiatives and keeping a list of companies that warrant scrutiny.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's much-publicized signing of his state's divestment law -- standing alongside actor-activists Don Cheadle and George Clooney -- has helped spread popular awareness on the continuing violence in Darfur and given added momentum to the divestment drive, Sterling said.

The violence in Darfur began three years ago, when the Sudanese government, backed by a state-sponsored Arab militia called the Janjaweed, moved to crush African rebel movements in the fertile agricultural territory that has long resisted central government control of its resources. The conflict has left as many as 450,000 people dead and driven more than 2 million people from their homes.

Sudan has refused to allow a U.N. peacekeeping force into Darfur, and on Monday said it opposed an indefinite extension of an African Union peace mission there.

"At this point, we are approaching that critical mass where it is past symbolism," Sterling said. "We are already seeing a response from the Sudanese government. Last April, a press release from the Sudanese Embassy here urged institutions to stop divesting, and in a recent discussion with our campaign leader in Indiana, Beth Reilly, that was the only topic the Sudanese ambassador was interested in addressing."

The National Foreign Trade Council has argued that unilateral American sanctions will not alter the behavior of a government if other countries continue to do business with it. U.S. companies have been prohibited from conducting business in Sudan since 1997, when terrorism-related sanctions were imposed on the country, but some are exempt.

The Darfur Peace and Accountability Act (HR 3127), which passed last month with bipartisan support, urges President Bush to prohibit Sudanese oil tankers from entering U.S. ports and bans cargo ships that deliver goods to Sudan's armed forces. The bill also would deny visas to individuals implicated in the killing in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0078549

"The bill is not bad, it is just incomplete," Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.) said in a telephone interview from Boston last Tuesday. "I don't think that divestment will have the impact of shutting down the economy of the Sudan, but if it is just a penny it is worth doing -- you do what you think is right and you hope that it works."

"This issue can't wait any longer," Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) warned this week, vowing to push for an amendment he co-sponsored with Rep. Barbara T. Lee (D-Calif.) to restore the divestment language. "These are people who respond only to pressure, and one of our efforts is to push the Europeans who share our position on this to do more. It is unfathomable that . . . before our very eyes yet another genocide should unfold, specifically in Darfur. The Rwanda episode is still very much on people's minds."

The amendment calls for a halt to federal contracts going to international companies whose business in Sudan may directly or indirectly support the Sudanese government's military campaign in Darfur. Lee said similar measures against South Africa helped end apartheid.

While the sanctions campaign to end apartheid in South Africa took more than 20 years to show any effect, the Sudan divestment movement is only 18 months old. The effort grew out of an eight-month study group at UCLA and has quickly developed into a nationwide network.

Lee, who sits on the House International Relations Committee and serves on the Africa subcommittee, has been a leading voice in the divestment movement.

"So many people have died, we have to use every tool at our disposal," she said. "It is our duty to make sure pension funds don't have blood in their banks. It is the blood of genocide. We don't know how many companies are involved. We know there are $600 million in federal contracts, and this is just the tip of the iceberg. We have got to step up and do something."

There are no American companies that are directly involved, but at least two dozen multinational companies, mostly in the energy sector, have been targeted by divestment campaigners. Already, 3M and Xerox have restricted all operations in Sudan to humanitarian work, according to Sterling, and Royal Dutch Shell is engaging with human rights groups so as not to be perceived as complicit in atrocities.

State Rushes In Where Washington Fears To Tread (FT)

By Matthew Garrahan In Los Angeles And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

From laws that led to catalytic converters being fitted to new cars in the US, to the recent passing of far-reaching climate change legislation, California has never been afraid to make ambitious policy decisions.

But the progressive politics that drive the Golden State, the world's fifth largest economy, are beginning to take on an increasingly international dimension. This has left some businesses leaders and Washington policy makers uneasy.

Arnold Schwarzenegger, California's Republican governor, followed last month's landmark bill to cut greenhouse gas emissions with another first: passing a law that prohibits the state's pension funds from investing in companies with active business in Sudan.

The bill, prompted by the killings that have sparked a humanitarian crisis in Darfur, saw Mr Schwarzenegger cross party lines to find consensus on an issue that has galvanized California's liberal population.

His efforts were hailed by voters from across the political spectrum. But the Sudan divestment law, which follows the example of several other states this year, is troubling the Bush administration, as well as business lobby groups and some senators.

The National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), which represents big industries, is fighting the divestment campaign and has sued the state of Illinois. California is also in its sights. Bill Reinsch, its president, said there would be paralysis in foreign policy if the US did not speak with one voice.

California's action comes weeks after the US Senate blocked legislation that would have ratified divestment from the Sudan by US states.

In common with its action on climate change, California's determination to divest from Sudan signals its intent to pursue its own foreign policy agenda – with or without the explicit agreement of the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0078550

Mr Schwarzenegger followed the signing of the bill with a letter to George W. Bush this week urging the president to "confront this genocide with an equally clear and urgent national focus".

Aides to the governor said it was unlikely he would seek to curb California's independent spirit. "California is the world's fifth largest economy," said Margita Thompson, the governor's press secretary, saying the state almost "constitutes a country unto itself".

California played "a leadership role in anything it does," she added. "California has led on improving air quality and in signing the [Sudan divestment] bill, the governor has shown that Californians will stand against genocide."

Mr Schwarzenegger's relationship with state Democrats is an important factor in the boldness of his recent policy decisions. His willingness to act on causes more traditionally associated with the Democratic party – such as climate change – have won support from Democrat voters and helped him build a commanding lead over Phil Angelides, the governor's opponent in November's gubernatorial election.

Whereas President Bush has refused to commit the US to carbon limits, Mr Schwarzenegger has passed a law that will cap California's greenhouse gas emissions at 1990 levels, an effective cut of 25 per cent. The governor went so far as to chastise Mr Bush for his failure to take tougher action, saying: "California will not wait for our federal government to take strong action on global warming."

"I can imagine that California is going to ruffle feathers in Washington," says Mark Baldassare, director of research at the Public Policy Institute of California. "First of all, we have a Republican president and congress going in one direction on foreign policy. Then we have a Republican governor and a Democratic legislature [in California] going in another."

History shows that where California leads other US states and countries tend to follow. The implementation of clean air regulations in California in the mid-1970s, for example, led to a country-wide policy that saw catalytic converters fitted to all new cars, with other nations following suit.

With the new climate change legislation, Mr Schwarzenegger has already secured the support of international figures such as Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister. Britain and California have bypassed the Bush administration and agreed to work together to explore ways to fight global warming.

"It all gives Californians confidence that we are not going to be left holding the bag by ourselves," said Daniel Kammen, professor in the energy and resources group at the University of California, Berkeley. "A lot of states and countries are going to follow what California is doing."

The Murder Of Andrei Koslov (WSJ)

By Paul Volcker

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

On Sept. 14, the first deputy chairman of the Russian central bank was killed in Moscow. Andrei Koslov was a brave young man on a patriotic mission to restore a sense of integrity and confidence in Russian banking. He knew he was in danger as he attacked money laundering and other shady financial practices by strong men in government or out; his must have been a lonely effort, but he persisted. His murder is a dramatic reflection of the corrupt forces resisting governance reform in that one country. But plainly, those forces are not confined to Russia. In much of the emerging world, they undercut efforts to develop a strong competitive economy.

In that light, the murder of Andrei Koslov defines the battle lines for all of us. It's a battle that all those supporting economic development and the rule of law cannot afford to lose. And, appropriately, it is international institutions that are placed front and center in that battle.

I learned of Koslov's death as I traveled to the annual meetings of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund in Singapore, to speak at a panel on governance and corruption. My interest in the subject was sharpened by my recent experience investigating the U.N.'s Oil for Food program, which seems to me a prime example of good intentions being frustrated by failures in governance. Corruption not only limited the success of that particular program, but very real questions have been raised about the competence of the U.N. organization generally. And I would emphasize that it is difficult for any organization to maintain support and legitimacy unless it is perceived as competent.

DOJ_NMG_0078551

I think it is now generally recognized and accepted that corruption is an obstacle -- and in some countries the major obstacle -- to effective economic development. That simple fact has been increasingly recognized by the World Bank. It was the central message of my fellow panelists in Singapore who at personal risk are fighting corruption on the front lines in Africa and elsewhere.

It is fatuous to suggest that a serious attack on corruption in borrowing countries -- including in the last analysis a threat or the actuality of denying loans -- is somehow inconsistent with supporting the development goals of the World Bank. The contrary is much more likely. Failure to deal with corruption undercuts development. It will limit, and likely will more than offset, any value added in new lending.

Of course, that's easy to say. Much more difficult is what can be effectively done in combating corruption. The key to dealing with corruption is leadership -- leadership at the multilateral institutions, but also in lending countries, in borrowing countries, in private companies and in nongovernmental organizations. A consistent message really needs to come from the top. It has to infuse the culture of all the organizations concerned, public and private.

A reasonable starting point might be to take a leaf from Nancy Reagan, with her old anti-drug slogan: "Just Say No." After all, corruption is a kind of addictive drug. I know that some companies endorse and successfully enforce that approach, but I also know that isolated efforts and slogans aren't enough. Private companies, public institutions, NGOs -- all can do more by making that kind of pledge publicly and jointly. They should have a common approach toward conflicts of interest, financial reporting, ethical standards and transparency.

But still, I am not so naïve as to think that a plea for voluntary cooperation by itself is going to do the job. It seems to me entirely legitimate, with respect to individual loans, that the World Bank and other development institutions be assured that really effective independent oversight and auditing arrangements of the projects they finance are in place. That has been the intent in the past, but my sense is that the approach may need to be toughened up, especially when experience with a particular country suggests the need for stronger World Bank oversight.

I think it also implies a strong internal inspection function. This has to be thought of not as an unwanted addendum to the bank, but as an integral part of it, right up there with the lending function itself. It will be intrusive, but it is not a question of national sovereignty. These are voluntary lending programs, with a willing borrower and lender. If corruption is found, and remedial action falls short, then suspension is not only justified but mandatory. The more difficult case is when the concern is not confined to a particular loan but when the country and its government are broadly and deeply corrupted, the corruption embedded in long-standing traditions and practice. Then a different approach is initially required. Consultation and step-by-step criteria for change may be the best course.

Those are very general statements. The policies need to be made more concrete and specific. It would be very helpful if they were spelled out in program guidelines at the World Bank. And it should be done in consultation and partnership with private parties and NGOs as well as interested governments. But let me make a simple declaration: The greatest threat to development and, ultimately, to the World Bank Group itself, would be to sit back passively in the face of this challenge. To take the view that its job is simply to lend freely whenever a perception of marginal benefit seems to justify it, and without concern for entrenched corruption, will inevitably erode support for the institution and undercut the effectiveness of its work to help the world's poor have a chance for a better life.

My impression is that the corruption problem may be getting worse. Whether or not that is the case, it plainly needs priority attention. The implications go far beyond any one institution. But I know of no institution, by its leadership, by its professional staff, by its standing in the world, that is better equipped to take on that challenge than the World Bank.

Mr. Volcker was chairman of the Federal Reserve from 1979-1987.

Good News From Northern Ireland (NYT)

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

The transformation of militant Irish Republicanism from terrorism to democratic politics over the past decade has been little short of remarkable — a welcome success story in troubled times.

DOJ_NMG_0078552

This week's highly positive report by an official monitoring commission confirmed the good news. It declared that the Irish Republican Army has fully renounced terrorism, dissociated itself from organized criminal activity and committed itself to following an exclusively political path, the very steps its critics have demanded for years.

That calls for a similarly remarkable response from the harshest of those critics, the Democratic Unionist Party led by the Rev. Ian Paisley.

It is time for the D.U.P. to acknowledge that the conditions it has long set out for entering into a power-sharing government with the I.R.A.'s political arm, Sinn Fein, have been achieved. If that happens within the next month or so, Northern Ireland can complete its transformation from sectarian terror to democratic self-government.

Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, and his Irish counterpart, Bertie Ahern, have set a Nov. 24 deadline for Northern Ireland's parties to agree on a new power-sharing government. If they fail to do so, Britain will cease its efforts to revive power-sharing and will rule the province from London.

The I.R.A.'s gradual shift from violence to politics was a matter of hardheaded calculation about what could and could not succeed. Even before 9/11, terrorism had become repellent to Northern Ireland's people and a blight on their neighborhoods and economic prospects. Those circumstances made it possible to coax Sinn Fein into a purely peaceful, electoral role.

An impressive array of political leaders — Irish, British, Roman Catholic and Protestant — have helped Northern Ireland get this far. These include Mr. Blair and Mr. Ahern, who did much of the coaxing, and Gerry Adams, the Sinn Fein leader, who persuaded the I.R.A. to give up its arms, its terror and its organized criminal activities.

The Rev. Paisley now needs to join these other leaders in completing the job. With the threat of renewed I.R.A. terror at last put to rest, Northern Ireland should be moving forward toward a self-governing future.

DOJ_NMG_0078553

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Pentagon To Probe Gitmo Beatings Claim (AP) 3
Description Of Prisoner Abuse At Guantánamo (NYT) 3
At Guantanamo: Hard Time And A View Of What Could Have Been (LAT)..... 4
Produce The Body (WSJ) 5
USA Denies Any Wrongdoing In Computer Terrorism Lawsuit (AP) 6
Harper Protests US Deportation Of Canadian To Syria (AFP)..... 7
Germany's Denials On Detainees Challenged (WP)..... 7
The American Way Of Secrecy (NYT)..... 8

Homeland Response:

US And Europe Reach Draft Air Data Deal (FT) 9
U.S. Reaches Deal With EU To Obtain Data From Airlines (WSJ) 10
E.U. Agrees To Ease U.S. Access To Data On Passengers (WP)..... 11
Report Cites Watch List Errors (NYT/AP)..... 12
Probe Of Anthrax Attacks Casts Shadow On Brothers (WP)..... 12
Bush Balks At Criteria For FEMA Director (WP) 13
New Orleans Population Is Reduced Nearly 60% (NYT) 14

War News:

Warner's Iraq Remarks Surprise White House (NYT)..... 15
Senator Warner Has Grim View Of Iraq (WT/UPI)..... 16
Rice Urges Kurds To Work For Peaceful, Unified Iraq (AFP) 16
Rice Appeals To Oil-rich Kurdish North (AP)..... 17
Kurds Show Signs Of Seceding From Iraq (AP)..... 18
Rice Tells Kurds That Unity Is Key (LAT) 19
Afghanistan: Five Years Later (WP) 20
Rumsfeld Cites Progress In Afghanistan (AP)..... 21
Taliban Revived In Southern Afghanistan (AP) 21
U.S. General Says 4,000 Iraqi Policemen Have Died In 2 Years (NYT) 22
4,000 Iraq Police Killed In Past 2 Years (AP) 23
4,000 Iraqi Police Killed In 2 Years, U.S. Official Says (WP) 24
Deaths Across Iraq Show It Is A Nation Of Many Wars, With U.S. In The Middle (LAT)..... 25
Unit Due For 3rd Iraq Tour As Troops' Burden Deepens (AJC).. 27
Medic Testifies That Marines Shot Iraqi Civilian (MSN) 29
Sailor Details Killing Of Iraqi Civilian (WP)..... 30
Corpsman Who Failed To Halt Killing Of Iraqi Receives Prison Sentence (NYT) 31
Sailor Testifies About Killing Of Iraqi (AP-Y)..... 32
Navy Man Admits Kidnapping Iraqi (WT/UPI) 33
Sailor Sentenced To One Year In Iraqi's Slaying (LAT) 33
For Recruiter, Saying 'Go Army' Is A Hard Job (NYT) 34
Picking Up The Pieces Of Slain Troops' Lives (WP) 38

DOJ:

Sharon Potter Sworn In As Local U.S. Attorney (WHI)..... 40

Corporate Scandals:

Farmer Mac Plans To Restate Results From Three Years (WP/BLOOM)..... 40
Suit Over Sale Of MySpace Dismissed (BLOOM) 41

Criminal Law:

Rove Aide Linked To Abramoff Resigns (WP) 41
Aide Who Linked Abramoff And Rove Resigns At White House (NYT) 42
White House Aide Ralston Quits After Abramoff Report (Update1) (BLOOM) 43
White House Aide To Rove Resigns (AP) 44
Top Rove Aide Resigns In Lobby Scandal (LAT) 44
Secret Papers Could Halt CIA Case (WP/AP)..... 46
Report On Possible Abuses By Former Member Of Intelligence Panel Is Held Up (NYT) 46
Cunningham's Wife To Pay U.S. $1.6 Million (WP/AP)..... 47
Spouse Of Lawmaker Agrees To Penalties (LAT)..... 47
Dialing For Dollars: A Lobbyist's New Twist (WSJ) 48

Civil Rights:

Disabled Can't Use Park's Restrooms (APP) 51
Justice Department May Investigate Case Against Sheriff's Office (DAYBNJ)..... 52
Feds Clear St. Landry Elections (BRADV) 53
Same-sex Rite Stalls Judge Nomination (AP) 54

Antitrust:

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Looking Sweeter (AJC) 55

Environment:

EPA Criticized For Not Toughening Soot Law (LAT)..... 55

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Indicts 56 On Drug, Laundering Charges (WT) 56

Immigration:

Bush Pushes Guest Worker Program (AP) 57
President Touts Alien Citizenship (WT) 57
Silencing Of A Speech Causes A Furor (NYT) 58

Congress-Administration:

Budget Deficit Drops To $250 Billion (AP) 60
Budget Deficit Progress Will Be Tough To Sustain (WSJ) 60
FDA Budget Malnourished (LAT) 61
President Bush To Honor His Father At Ship Christening (VAPILOT) 63
Mr. Fixit (NYT) 63
Kicked While Down (NYT) 64
The Kennedy Court? (WSJ) 65

Other News:

U.S. Job Numbers Remain Strong (WP) 66
US Labour Market Tighter Than Estimated (FT) 67
Job Growth Was Slack Last Month (NYT) 68
Sluggish Job Growth Could Affect Elections (LAT) 69
Jobs Report Shows A Mixed Picture (WSJ) 70
Unemployment Falls; Wages Up 4 Percent (WT) 72
Shares Rest After A Record Week (NYT/AP) 72
Wall Street Dips But Finishes Week Higher (FT) 73
Economy For Bellwether GE, A Big Report Card (WSJ) 74
Dow Set A Record In Height, But Weight Had A Lot To Do With That (NYT) 75
To Muted Cheers, The Dow Climbs Past A Record (NYT) 75
OPEC's Oil-Price Line In The Sand Cartel's Effort To Maintain $60-a-Barrel Seems Doable, But Only For The Near Term (WSJ) 76
Wetterling Goes National With Her Call For Foley Inquiry (MINNST) 78
In House Races, More G.O.P. Seats Are Seen At Risk (NYT) ... 78
Democrat Ads Attack GOP Over Scandal (AP-Y) 80
Democrat Christian Radio Ad Slams Foley (AP) 81
Standing Apart From His Party, Kean Calls For House Speaker To Step Down (NYT) 82
GOP Leaders Rally To House Speaker's Defense (WT) 82
Republicans Rally Round Hastert (FT) 83
Republicans Hope Hastert's Words And A Committee's Action Can Quell Uproar (NYT) 84
Staffer Cites Earlier Role By Hastert's Office (WP) 84
SPECIAL REPORT: SEX, LIES AND ELECTION DAY (NATJOUR) 86
For Shimkus, Stain From Foley Scandal Could Linger (MCT) 87
Speculation Centers On A Republican Former Page (WP) 88
GOP Prods Democrats Over Foley Scandal (CNN) 88
Pressure On Republicans Won't Ease (WSJ) 89
Troubled Ethics Panel Tackles Scandal (LAT) 90
Victim Advocates, Fla. Diocese Urge Foley To Name Alleged Abuser (WP) 92
Amid Growing Scandal, Former Pages Defend Program (MCT) 92
Debate Turns To Future Of Page Program (LAT) 94
The Foley Fires (WSJ) 95
My Poppy, Mr. President (NSWK) 96
Mrs. Clinton Hits Road To Support The Party (NYT) 97
General Endorses Lamont, Faulting Lieberman On Iraq (NYT) .. 98
Steele's Ad Seemingly At Odds With Fundraising (WP) 99
Dean Laments Lack Of Diversity (WT) 100
Webb Shifts Debate To Iraq, Urging Diplomacy To End War (WP) 101
Allen Foes Cite Sister's Book (WT) 102
Battling Power Of Incumbency, And Feeling Left To Fight Alone (NYT) 102
A Political Opportunity For Women (WP) 104
Help For Congressman (NYT/AP) 105
Schwarzenegger And Rival Spar But Step Lightly (LAT) 105
After Son's Death And Battle With Breast Cancer, Elizabeth Edwards Trying To Inspire (MCT) 107
Gore And Murdoch Join Forces In TV Deal (FT) 109
Six Powers Agree To Take Next Step On Iran (WP) 109
U.S. Says It Has Deal With Other U.N. Members To Penalize Iran For Nuclear Drive (NYT) 110
Talks Planned On Sanctions Against Iran (LAT) 111
U.S., Partners Seek Tough Stance On North Korea, Iran (WSJ)112
Powers Agree To Consult UN On Measures Against Tehran (FT) 113
Nations To Pursue Sanctions Against Iran (AP) 113
U.N. Council Presses North Korea To Drop Plans For Nuclear Test (NYT) 114
U.N. Council Urges N. Korea Not To Conduct Nuclear Test (WP)115
U.N. Warns N. Korea On Nuclear Test (WT) 116
North Korean Nuclear Test Would Be 'Incendiary': White House (AFP) 117
U.N. Tells N. Korea Not To Test A Device (LAT) 117
North Korea Urged To Cancel Nuclear Test (AP) 118
UN Warns N Korea On Nuclear Test (FT) 119
Fuad Al-Siniora The Accidental Prime Minister (WSJ) 120
'We Will Not Recognize Israel,' Palestinian Premier Affirms (NYT) 122
Haniyeh: Hamas Won't Recognize Israel (AP) 123
We Can't Go Home Again (NYT) 124
Report Of Plot To Attack Jews Prompts Terror Alert In Prague (NYT) 124
China Reports Increase In Gauge Of Foreign Trade (WSJ) 125
An Iron Fist, Extended Harmoniously (LAT) 125
Russia Deports Georgians And Increases Pressures On Businesses And Students (NYT) 126
Kremlin Rules (WSJ) 127
Castro Is Reported To Have Cancer (TIME) 128
Hungarian PM Wins Confidence Vote (FT) 128
Hungary PM Wins Vote Of Confidence (AP) 129
Sudan Divestment Effort Gains Momentum At State Level (WP)130
State Rushes In Where Washington Fears To Tread (FT) 131
The Murder Of Andrei Koslov (WSJ) 132
Good News From Northern Ireland (NYT) 133

DOJ_NMG_0078555

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon To Probe Gitmo Beatings Claim (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, October 7, 2006

The Pentagon said Friday that it will investigate a Marine's sworn statement that guards at Guantanamo Bay bragged about beating detainees and described it as a common practice.

The Marine, a paralegal who was at the U.S. Navy station in Cuba last month, alleges that several guards she talked to at the base club said they routinely hit detainees.

"From the whole conversation, I understood that striking detainees was a common practice," the sergeant wrote. "Everyone in the group laughed at the others' stories of beating detainees."

The woman's name was blacked out of a copy of a two-page affidavit provided to The Associated Press by a civilian defense attorney working with Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, the Marine Corps' defense coordinator for the Western United States and based at Camp Pendleton.

Vokey, who sent the statement Wednesday to the Inspector General at the Department of Defense, called for an investigation, saying the abuse alleged in the affidavit "is offensive and violates United States and international law."

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler said defense officials "are reviewing this affidavit and will investigate these allegations fully." A call to the inspector general's office was not immediately returned

Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, spokesman for the Joint Task Force that oversees detention facilities at Guantanamo, said the force "will participate fully with the inspector general to learn the facts of the matter and will take action where misconduct is discovered."

"Abuse or harassment of detainees in any form is not condoned or tolerated," Durand said.

Guantanamo Bay houses about 450 suspected members of al-Qaida and the Taliban. Human-rights groups have roundly criticized the Bush administration for detaining most without criminal charges, but U.S. officials have defended the detentions as necessary in the war on terrorism and say the detainees are treated humanely.

The Marine said in the sworn statement that she has been working at Marine Corps Base, Camp Pendleton in Southern California on a Guantanamo-related case, and was in Guantanamo from Sept. 20-27.

She said some Marines had invited her to the base club Sept. 23. She didn't see them but a group of at least 15 sailors invited her to join them. She said she spoke with the sailors for about an hour, during which she had one drink, and that the sailors did not appear drunk.

A 19-year-old sailor referred to only as Bo "told the other guards and me about him beating different detainees being held in the prison," the statement said.

"One such story Bo told involved him taking a detainee by the head and hitting the detainee's head into the cell door. Bo said that his actions were known by others," the statement said. The sailor said he was never punished.

Other guards "also told their own stories of abuse towards the detainees" that included hitting them, denying them water and "removing privileges for no reason."

"About 5 others in the group admitted hitting detainees" and that included "punching in the face," the affidavit said.

Guantanamo was internationally condemned shortly after it opened more than four years ago when pictures captured prisoners kneeling, shackled and being herded into wire cages. That was followed by reports of prisoner abuse, heavy-handed interrogations, hunger strikes and suicides.

Military investigators said in July 2005 they confirmed abusive and degrading treatment of a suspected terrorist at Guantanamo Bay that included forcing him to wear a bra, dance with another man and behave like a dog.

However, the chief investigator, Air Force Lt. Gen. Randall M. Schmidt, said "no torture occurred" during the interrogation of Mohamed al-Qahtani, a Saudi who was captured in December 2001 along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

Description Of Prisoner Abuse At Guantánamo (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078556

The Pentagon said it would investigate claims by a Marine Corps sergeant that guards at the United States military prison at Guantanámo Bay bragged about beating prisoners and denying them privileges to anger them. The accusations are in an affidavit by a sergeant that was made public after being sent to the Defense Department's inspector general for investigation by Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, a Marine Corps defense lawyer. The sergeant, a paralegal whose name was not released, said in the affidavit that she heard about the alleged abuse while talking to several guards at the Guantanámo Bay base club while she was visiting Cuba last month, Colonel Vokey said. "Examples of this abuse included hitting detainees, denying them water and removal of privileges for no reason," the sergeant said in the affidavit read to The New York Times by Colonel Vokey. A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler told the Associated Press that defense officials "are reviewing this affidavit and will investigate these allegations fully."

At Guantanamo: Hard Time And A View Of What Could Have Been (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Detainees at a new camp will see only a sliver of a common area; isolation has become the norm.

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba — The narrow windows in the 7-by-12 steel and concrete cells of Camp 6 will give detainees a view of a common room designed to bring them together as brothers in faith, language and customs.

But looking is all they will be able to do. The area will be off-limits.

When the Guantanamo prison complex's new camp was designed two years ago, the triangular communal area was intended to let detainees mingle over meals, games and conversation.

But virtually all time at Guantanamo has become hard time, and when prisoners begin arriving at the $38-million building in the next few weeks, they will be kept mostly in isolation.

A May riot in which dozens of detainees attacked U.S. soldiers, the suicide of three prisoners in June, and changes in the camp population — including the arrival of 14 "high value detainees" — have transformed Guantanamo into a largely maximum security facility.

The first new arrivals in two years — the group including the self-proclaimed Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and his alleged lieutenant Ramzi Binalshibh — were flown from secret CIA prisons abroad over Labor Day weekend. But dozens have left in recent months, too, having been cleared by annual review boards for release or transfer to their native countries. Negotiations also are underway between the State Department and foreign governments on the possible group repatriations of more than 300 Afghans, Saudis and Yemenis. Washington is trying to obtain assurances that the men will neither be tortured nor freed to potentially threaten U.S. or allied forces.

The 100 or so expected to remain after the transfers will be the detainees considered the most dangerous, those with little hope of release or reward for good behavior, according to military jailers. That population is unlikely to elicit much softening of the conditions.

Near the same time of the May and June incidents, officials discovered that prisoners with good behavior records had been dismantling their faucets to fashion weapons, officials said. That prompted jailers to reconsider whether prisoners should be allowed to interact and possibly plot resistance.

"We had to think about whether there is such a thing as a medium-security terrorist," said Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., commander of the prison and interrogation network that houses 460 war-on-terror suspects.

Col. Wade Dennis, who is effectively Guantanamo's warden, echoed Harris' concern that although most detainees cooperated with camp rules, the recent violence suggested some had been hiding their true nature.

"Detainees have already demonstrated they have the will and the thought processes to do self-harm and I facilitate that if I let them live in a communal-type environment," said Dennis.

Shortly after the suicides, the prison commanders decided to scrap the medium-security comforts, and will keep inmates isolated behind steel doors for all but an hour or two of daily exercise time.

"Meals will be served in their cells," said Naval Cmdr. Kris Winter, head of the force staffing the prisons.

Since the discovery of the vandalized faucets, Camp 1 has been emptied and its detainees moved to temporary metal-mesh cells pending repairs or relocation to Camp 6, which is expected to be fully populated by the end of the year.

Camp 4, which held about 175 prisoners before the riot, is a barracks-like compound where detainees slept 10 to a room, ate together and were free to congregate for as much as 14 hours daily. It has been cleared of all but about 30 Afghans who didn't take part in the uprising — the only detainees not confined to solitary cells.

Harris and Dennis say they will invoke tougher screening before any prisoners are allowed back into communal living.

DOJ_NMG_0078557

Where to hold the prisoners among Guantanamo's eight detention facilities is an exercise in risk assessment complicated by the shutdown of Camp 1 — previously the most populous prison — and the virtual emptying of Camp 4 to modify fans and light fixtures that the rioters used to make weapons.

Unlike Camp 5, the reigning hard-time housing, Camp 6 has no outside windows or natural light in the cells. The prefabricated units are arrayed along two sides of a triangle. Bare concrete walls, floors and metal furnishings make the common room an echo chamber.

In addition to mothballing the tables, lockers and leg-stretching spaces in the new camp, the Navy's construction force, or SeaBees, and the prison's Kellogg Brown and Root contractors have erected chain-link partitions to make 10-by-30-foot exercise pens in what was designed as an open sports court.

Other retrofitting has included shower doors that will prevent the detainees from communicating, said Lt. Cmdr. Eileen D'Andrea, who was in charge of the prison's construction and 11th-hour revisions. An expanded guard force also will be needed to provide the manpower to shackle and escort each prisoner every time he needs to leave his cell, said Lt. Col. Mike Nicolucci, Dennis' deputy.

The hardening of Guantanamo detention dispirits the detainees and their lawyers, who see it as part of U.S. political posturing in an election year.

"They've set this up as a showcase and they feel they can't back down from it," Marine Maj. Michael Mori, who represents Australian detainee David Hicks, said of the Bush administration's Guantanamo operations. "Every day in Iraq and Afghanistan they let people go who they know are far more dangerous than these guys."

Rank-and-file guards express little concern or curiosity about the conditions of the prisoners' confinement, noting that they are just doing their duty.

"I don't know exactly what they did but they must have done something wrong to be here," said Master-at-Arms Seaman Leif Kreizenbeck, a 23-year-old Oregonian who arrived barely a month ago.

Construction chief D'Andrea said the prison's design allows for future changes. Each of the eight clusters of 22 cells around a common area is self-contained and could be transformed to a medium-security, communal-living "pod" if that is what detention authorities decide.

That prospect seems distant.

"Once we get Camp 4 repaired — and that is costing us a tremendous amount of money — we will be very selective about who goes back to Camp 4," said Harris.

carol.williams@latimes.com

Produce The Body (WSJ)

By Richard A. Epstein

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

Last week, the Bush administration persuaded a divided Congress to pass the Military Commissions Act (MCA), giving the president the authorization the Supreme Court ruled that he needed to try enemy combatants in Guantanamo.

The MCA was bitterly contested, and one of the most hard-fought provisions involves the right of detainees to demand that the government justify their detention to an independent judicial officer. On this point, Sens. John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham have claimed in this newspaper that the MCA preserves the rights of individuals "to challenge his status in administrative and judicial fora," and that "these challenges are in excess of what our soldiers would be afforded as prisoners of war." In fact, the law offers far less protection than their broad observation suggests. The MCA strips them of their right to habeas corpus -- unwisely removing an indispensable and long-standing check on the abuse of executive power.

The average American naturally responds with a blank stare to that Latin mouthful, habeas corpus ad subjiciendum. But the phrase loses all of its obscurity -- and none of its punch -- when expressed in plain English: "Produce the body that it may be subjected to examination."

The writ grew up in England, long before the American Revolution, to counter the power of the Crown to arbitrarily imprison and execute its foes. Historically, habeas corpus directed the officer of the Crown who had custody of a prisoner to bring him into court, where an impartial judge could independently decide whether the confinement was justified. If, however, the original conviction was tainted by a coerced confession or the admission of illegally obtained evidence, the judge could order the prisoner freed, then and there.

Modern American practice no longer requires that the prisoner literally be brought into court at the outset of legal proceedings. Today, a judicial hearing attended by lawyers for both sides decides on the legality of the prisoner's confinement. Nevertheless, the older concerns still animate the modern practice. Lawful imprisonment, second only to lawful infliction of death, is the hallmark of state power. In any system of limited government, such loss of liberty should be hedged by strong procedural protections unless some grave public necessity requires its suspension.

DOJ_NMG_0078558

By eliminating habeas review for Guantanamo detainees, the MCA has jettisoned the fundamental right of any prisoner to test the lawfulness of his detention. You may immediately object: Why, if ordinary prisoners of war may be detained for the duration of the conflict without habeas corpus -- as in World War II, the Korean War or the Vietnam War -- should the writ be available to unlawful enemy combatants captured in the war on terror? Because context matters. In conflicts between states, the prisoners are uniformed soldiers. We know they are combatants, we know what counts as the end of the war, and habeas serves no useful role. In a terrorist war, with nonuniformed combatants and chaotic battlefield conditions, wide military sweeps make sense -- but only if we take steps after the heat of battle to allow detainees to challenge their status. Without meaningful judicial review, innocent people could be arbitrarily or erroneously imprisoned, indefinitely.

To be sure, an individual's status as an enemy combatant is determined by a Combatant Status Review Tribunal (CSRT), and the MCA subjects this military tribunal's determination to judicial review. But the process is grossly deficient. It denies a detainee the assistance of counsel. It prohibits him from seeing the evidence against him. It lets the government alone decide what evidence the tribunal sees; it lets the government rely on evidence consisting of double or even triple hearsay; and it lets military superiors override tribunal decisions and fire tribunal members when they disapprove of their decisions.

The MCA also sharply limits judicial review. The court sees only the questionable evidence that the government allowed the tribunal to see, which the detainee has no opportunity to confront. And even this limited judicial review kicks in only if the government (1) triggers a CSRT proceeding for the detainee and (2) carries that review process through to a "final decision." The MCA does not require the government to do either. However, unless the government does both, the law allows the government to hold any prisoner -- even if he is not an unlawful enemy combatant -- in custody for the rest of his life, with no due process and no recourse to the courts.

No one deserves that fate. Truth must count. Innocence must matter. A deeply flawed Combatant Status Review Tribunal process and an optional system of limited judicial review sacrifices both. Only habeas corpus review can fill the gap. Happily, the Supreme Court is likely to invalidate this part of the MCA. The Constitution states that the writ of habeas corpus can be suspended only when rebellion or invasion endangers public safety. That's not the case here: A world of difference separates the risk of future terrorist acts from a present invasion on American soil.

To strip the federal courts of habeas jurisdiction for individuals captured in the war on terror tramples a fundamental guarantee of liberty that the Constitution provides to citizen and alien alike. It makes a mockery of our efforts to advance the cause of freedom throughout the world, and will be seen, both at home and abroad, as a cynical exercise in hypocrisy.

We can effectively respond to terrorist threats as long as our institutions remain open, as they are today. No disorder or unrest blocks the use of ordinary judicial processes; an aggressive foreign policy abroad, coupled with lawful surveillance at home, can go a long way to reduce the terrorist threat without trenching on key personal liberties. Retaining habeas corpus is vital if we are to remain faithful to our noblest constitutional traditions when they matter most, in times of trouble.

The Supreme Court should enforce the constitutional guarantee that Congress has authorized the president to ignore.

Mr. Epstein is the James Parker Hall Distinguished Service Professor of Law at the University of Chicago and the Peter and Kirsten Bedford Senior Fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution.

USA Denies Any Wrongdoing In Computer Terrorism Lawsuit (AP)

By Rebecca Boone, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

BOISE, Idaho (AP) -- The United States says it did nothing wrong when federal agents arrested and detained an American citizen as a material witness in a computer terrorism case.

The government's formal response to the lawsuit brought by Abdullah al-Kidd was filed in U.S. District Court on Friday.

In his lawsuit, al-Kidd contended that the federal government and several of its agents - including former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft and his successor, Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert Mueller, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and others - violated his civil rights by improperly using material witness laws.

The individuals named in the case have until Nov. 27 to respond; the United States' response deadline was Friday.

In its response, filed by Justice Department lawyer J. Marcus Meeks, the United States denied al-Kidd's allegations and said that al-Kidd was not entitled to any damages.

The lawsuit arose after al-Kidd - a former student at the University of Idaho who played football for the Vandals under the name Lavoni Kidd - was arrested in 2003 as a material witness in the government's case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen. Al-Kidd and Al-Hussayen both worked on behalf of the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators alleged funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0078559

A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia.

Al-Kidd was never actually called to testify, but he spent two weeks in jail as a material witness and was later released to the custody of his wife with strict limitations on where he could travel. He sued, alleging that he was falsely imprisoned and that the government violated due process, using material witness laws to arrest, detain and investigate individuals without first proving probable cause.

Al-Kidd said the investigation and detention not only caused him to lose a scholarship to study in Saudi Arabia, but cost him employment opportunities.

Harper Protests US Deportation Of Canadian To Syria (AFP)

AFP, October 7, 2006

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper has protested to US President George W. Bush about the deportation to Syria of a Canadian, who was tortured and held for a year.

Harper spoke about Maher Arar, a Canadian of Syrian origin, in a 15-minute telephone call with Bush following a Canadian inquiry's report that cleared Arar of any terror links.

"I indicated to president Bush that Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, would be sending a letter today to his counterpart, Secretary of State (Condoleezza) Rice, to launch a formal protest on the treatment of Maher Arar," Harper told reporters.

"He had been unfairly deported where he had faced torture in Syria, and that American officials had not been candid and truthful in their dealings with Canadian officials in the case and had violated what we understand to be the protocols for such communications between our two governments," he said.

Arar was stopped in New York, on his way to Canada from a trip to Tunisia, in September 2002 and was deported to Syria where he was jailed and tortured for more than a year.

"The president said that he would look at the complaint seriously, and we are expecting a response, an official response, to our complaint as well as assurances that we will not be facing that kind of conduct on the part of US authorities in the future, because we want to help the US in the fight against terrorism, and certainly, we share their concerns about security," Harper told reporters.

The inquiry headed by Judge Dennis O'Connor said in its report that US authorities had likely relied on faulty intelligence provided by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) to hold and deport the 36-year-old software engineer to Syria.

The mid-September report also urged Ottawa to register officially objections with Syria and the United States for their treatment of Arar.

Germany's Denials On Detainees Challenged (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 6 -- The chief plotter of the Sept. 11 hijackings and another al-Qaeda leader who spent time in secret CIA prisons might have been interrogated in Germany before their transfer last month to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to lawyers for other terrorism suspects in U.S. custody.

Lawyers for a British legal association that represents Guantanamo prisoners reported Friday that two of their clients had given independent -- though secondhand -- accounts that al-Qaeda leaders Khalid Sheik Mohammed and Tawfiq bin Attash were questioned on military bases in Germany after their capture in Pakistan in 2003.

The prisoners' statements, based on information that they said was revealed to them by interrogators, challenge repeated denials by the German government that it played any part in the U.S. government's secret network to detain and transport terrorism suspects after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States.

The statements also open the possibility that the CIA held prisoners on a U.S. military base in Germany without the knowledge of the host government in the early days after the attacks.

The British legal defense group, Reprieve, acknowledged that it did not have proof that German airspace or territory was used. But it called on the German government to investigate further. The prisoner statements, which have been declassified by the U.S. military, are contained in notes from interviews with their lawyers at the U.S. military detention center at Guantanamo.

"I'm certainly not saying it's established fact," Clive Stafford Smith, Reprieve's legal director, said in a telephone interview. "But it's definitely something we should follow up on."

DOJ_NMG_0078560

Thomas Steg, a German government spokesman, dismissed the report. He said a German parliamentary committee had already found no evidence that the CIA used Germany to transfer or detain terrorism suspects. "There is nothing to these accusations," Steg said at a news briefing. "There were and are no such facilities in Germany."

Robert Wood, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Berlin, declined to comment.

Last month, President Bush revealed that 14 senior members of the al-Qaeda leadership had been taken to Guantanamo on Sept. 6 after spending years overseas in secret prisons operated by the CIA. The 14 prisoners included Mohammed, the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and Attash, who helped plan the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole in Yemen.

After the two were captured, they disappeared from public view. The Bush administration has not revealed where they were detained before they were taken to Cuba last month.

According to Reprieve, however, foreign interrogators fishing for information about Mohammed and Attash revealed to other prisoners that the al-Qaeda leaders were being kept in Germany for at least part of that time.

One of those prisoners, Binyam Mohammed, said that he was imprisoned in Morocco for 18 months after the CIA transferred him there. Moroccan interrogators, he said, accused him of meeting Khalid Sheik Mohammed in March 2002 to discuss an alleged plot to explode a radiological device, or "dirty bomb."

During questioning, Binyam Mohammed said his Moroccan interrogators told him the al-Qaeda leader was being held at a U.S. prison at an air base in Germany. The Moroccan prisoner, who was later taken back to Guantanamo, denies having any connection to al-Qaeda or knowing Khalid Sheik Mohammed, his lawyers said.

Separately, Attash's younger brother said he was told by Jordanian interrogators in 2003 that the USS Cole plotter was also being detained at a U.S.-run prison at an air base in Germany, according to Reprieve. The brother, 21-year-old Hassan Attash, was also later transferred to Guantanamo and remains in custody there.

Reprieve said both prisoners' statements concerning Germany were unsolicited. Because they were being held in isolation at Guantanamo and elsewhere, the group said, it would have been difficult to coordinate their story.

Since last year, German prosecutors have also been investigating whether the CIA used Ramstein Air Base, a NATO installation and headquarters of the U.S. Air Forces in Europe, to transfer a kidnapped radical cleric from Italy to Egypt in 2003.

In that case, German and Italian investigators have tracked flight logs indicating that the cleric was flown from a joint U.S.-Italian base in northern Italy to Ramstein, where he was put on another plane and flown to Cairo.

The American Way Of Secrecy (NYT)

By Francis Fukuyama

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

A RECENT article in The Washington Post described how researchers at George Washington University's National Security Archive were surprised to find 1970's statistics on the size of the American nuclear arsenal blacked out in documents they had obtained. This was surprising because the figures had been published many times in the past; more detailed ones had in fact been given directly to the Soviets in various arms control talks. And yet bureaucrats in the Defense and Energy Departments, acting under new post-9/11 rules, deemed the airing of this historical information dangerous in a world of terrorists and rogue nations.

It has become a cliché to say that "everything changed" after 9/11, but for two great American intellectuals — the sociologist Edward Shils and Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the former New York senator — recent events would have represented the eternal return of the same. Both argued that in the past, the United States has taken real foreign threats and vastly exaggerated the menace they represented, spinning out conspiracy theories. These justified the creation of a state based on secrecy that undermined American liberties and the free exchange of information, the fundamental sources of success for the United States as a society.

Shils, one of the founders of modernization theory and a longtime professor at the University of Chicago, wrote "The Torment of Secrecy: The Background and Consequences of American Security Policies" in 1956, in the immediate aftermath of the McCarthy era. Shils accepted the reality of the Soviet threat and the existence of conspiracies against the American way of life. But he also argued that American democracy, in contrast to the historically aristocratic orders in Europe, was based on a principle of publicity in public affairs — indeed, it "luxuriated" in its wide-open culture. That openness made the idea of external threat and internal subversion especially shocking: "In America, more excitable temperaments and a tradition of violence in expression and energy in action have prompted a passionate response to the threat of secret machinations." A weaker sense of privacy than that of the Europeans, as well as a "flimsier attachment to corporate bodies," made Americans seek their identity in great national symbols, leading to a hyperpatriotism and a tendency to see things in black and white.

In the early days of the cold war, the government's response to these fears was to grant the executive branch a huge degree of discretion in security affairs. The most visible manifestation of this tendency was the development of a classification system that suddenly removed a large amount of information from public scrutiny, and a system of loyalty checks that, in Shils's words, "hurt the delicate tissue which binds our society together."

DOJ_NMG_0078561

Shils had no more ardent disciple than Moynihan, who wrote an introduction to a 1996 reissue of "The Torment of Secrecy." Moynihan used his perch on the Senate Intelligence Committee to make a sustained attack on the government's penchant for secrecy, and for his fellow Americans' willingness to tolerate restrictions on their liberties in the name of security. In his book "Secrecy: The American Experience," published in 1998, he argued that "secrecy enables a constitutionally weak executive to bypass the legislature in making decisions that the legislature will not support when things go wrong."

Moynihan pointed out that the Venona intercepts of decrypted Soviet communications from the late 1940's, declassified only after the cold war ended, showed without a doubt that there had been a major Soviet spy network in the United States. The intercepts proved that Julius Rosenberg was guilty of atomic espionage, and that Whittaker Chambers's charges that Alger Hiss was a Soviet agent were correct. Defense of Hiss had of course become a cause célèbre among the liberal intelligentsia of the 1950's. And yet security officials within the government all along had conclusive evidence of his spying, and of the true scope of the Soviet conspiracy. But they failed to reveal what they knew, even to President Truman. This failure, Moynihan said, allowed the public imagination to supplement real knowledge with destructive fantasies, which in turn called into being a generation of anti-anti-Communists. This is a polarization with which we are still living today.

The creation of a national security bureaucracy walled off from public scrutiny produced other malign effects as well. Assumptions about the economic strength of the Soviet Union generated by the intelligence community were not scrutinized against what many people who had actually visited the country knew about its condition. This led to a consistent overestimating of the Soviet threat and the failure to predict the largest event of the late-20th century, the collapse of Communism. All bureaucracies seek to enlarge their missions, and in true form the end of the cold war led not to a decrease in the number of official secrets, but to a vast increase.

Rereading these books in the light of 9/11, the Iraq war and the Bush administration's current efforts to extend executive power makes one realize the extent to which our current situation is not in the least new. While the nihilistic murder of nearly 3,000 Americans on American soil was unprecedented, the fact remains that both the actual and perceived threat of the late 1940's was much more acute than the one presented by Islamist terrorism today. The Communists controlled a huge nation-state — the Soviet Union — and conquered half of Europe. In 1949 they came to power in the most populous country in the world. The awesome destructive power of nuclear weapons was new; experts at the time confidently predicted that many states would acquire them in short order and that future wars would be nuclear. Americans lived in the shadow not of the destruction of a single city, but of their entire society. And the enemy had agents who could potentially penetrate the country's most elite institutions, something few jihadists can aspire to do today.

All new threats entail huge uncertainties. Then, as now, there was a pronounced tendency to assume the worst, and for the government to claim enormous discretion in protecting the American public. The Bush administration has consistently argued that it needs to be protected from Congressional oversight and media scrutiny. An example is the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance of telephone traffic into and out of the United States. Rather than going to Congress and trying to negotiate changes to the law that regulates such activities, the administration simply grabbed that authority for itself, saying, in effect, "Trust us: if you knew what we know about the threat, you'd be perfectly happy to have us do what we're doing." In other areas, like the holding of prisoners in Guantánamo and interrogation methods used there and in the Middle East, one can only quote Moynihan on an earlier era: "As fears of Communist conspiracies and German subversion mounted, it was the U.S. government's conduct that approached the illegal."

Even if we do not at this juncture know the full scope of the threat we face from jihadist terrorism, it is certainly large enough to justify many changes in the way we conduct our lives, both at home and abroad. But the American government does have a track record in dealing with similar problems in the past, one suggesting that all American institutions — Congress, the courts, the news media — need to do their jobs in scrutinizing official behavior, and not take the easy way out of deferring to the executive. Past experience also suggests that the government would do far better to make public what it knows, as well as the limits of that knowledge, if we are to arrive at a balanced view of the challenges we face today.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US And Europe Reach Draft Air Data Deal (FT)

By Sarah Laitner
Financial Times, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078562

The FBI and other American anti-terror agencies will have easier access to sensitive personal information on passengers flying from the European Union to the US, under a deal agreed on Friday.

Brussels and Washington struck the fresh concord after weeks of negotiations to replace a controversial pact from 2004 through which the US receives up to 34 pieces of data on air travellers.

That deal was invalidated by the EU's highest court on a legal technicality and expired last Saturday, prompting fears of transatlantic travel chaos.

Negotiations on a new pact had hit a sticking point over Washington's demands for an easing of restrictions on sharing the passenger records among US anti-terror authorities.

Michael Chertoff, head of the US department of homeland security, last month warned that his agency was "handcuffed" by European privacy requirements that had hindered it giving information to other agencies.

But Franco Frattini, EU justice commissioner, on Friday said that he had agreed to allow smoother passage of information between US authorities after Washington gave fresh guarantees over data protection.

Speaking at an EU justice ministers' meeting in Luxembourg, he said: "We are not talking about more data or more exchanges, we are talking about making it easier to transmit data."

In a statement issued after agreement was reached, Mr Chertoff said: "I applaud my counterparts at the European Union for agreeing with me on the importance of sharing this passenger data to defend us against terrorism." He pointedly emphasised the EU and US's "joint goal of combating terrorism while respecting our joint commitment to fundamental rights and freedoms, notably privacy".

Requests from other agencies that might conduct counter-terrorism investigations, such as the US Treasury and the Department of Justice, would have to be examined on a case-by-case basis, EU officials said, and these authorities would not have direct electronic access to the records.

US authorities demand records including name, age, seat preferences and payment details on incoming air travellers as part of toughened measures introduced after the September 11 attacks.

EU officials said that Washington will continue to store the data for up to three and a half years. The US will also retain the right to share the records with other governments, they added.

The court decision to strike down the original concord was an embarrassment to the EU, which spent months crafting the initial deal in the face of concerns over passengers' privacy rights.

A failure last week to establish a new agreement had prompted fears of legal limbo for airlines, amid worries that they would face lawsuits for breaching privacy rights.

The new pact, finalised after a nine-hour video conference, is valid until next July. Brussels and Washington will in November start talks for a longer-term agreement.

U.S. Reaches Deal With EU To Obtain Data From Airlines (WSJ)

By William Echikson And Anne Jolis

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union and the U.S. on Friday reached a deal over the exchange of data on airline passengers.

The agreement was reached after the two sides missed a court-appointed Oct. 1 deadline to renew a 2004 deal under which airlines gave 34 pieces of passenger information to the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

Negotiations collapsed about a week ago when EU negotiators rejected Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's demand to lift restrictions on sharing the passenger data with other U.S. law-enforcement agencies.

"This is positive for the EU -- this will guarantee legal continuity on a very sensitive matter," said EU Security Commissioner Franco Frattini.

Mr. Frattini said Friday's new deal is applicable until the end of July 2007, by which time the two sides will "agree on a more permanent arrangement." Mr. Frattini said the EU agreed to allow Homeland Security to share the data with other U.S. agencies with a "comparable standard of data protection." This includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation and agencies within the Department of Justice.

This will allow the U.S. to "make full use of passenger data," Mr. Chertoff said in a statement Friday.

Trans-Atlantic carriers breathed a sigh of relief at the deal. "The agreement signed today will put an end to a period of uncertainty that was highly uncomfortable both for European carriers and their passengers," said Ulrich Schult-Strathaus, secretary-general of the Association of European Airlines.

The U.S. has acceded to the EU's demand that Homeland Security may no longer directly access the data from the airlines' databases, but will have to request the data from airline authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0078563

Under the previous deal, the Department of Homeland Security was able to access the names, addresses and credit-card details of passengers within 15 minutes of a flight's departure for the U.S. Mr. Chertoff added, however, that the new agreement means Homeland Security will receive the data it wants earlier still "when there is an indication that early access could assist in responding to a specific threat."

Write to William Echikson at william.echikson@dowjones.com1 and Anne Jolis at anne.jolis@dowjones.com2

E.U. Agrees To Ease U.S. Access To Data On Passengers (WP)

By Molly Moore And Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 6 -- European officials agreed Friday to grant U.S. law enforcement and intelligence agencies easier access to detailed personal data on transatlantic air passengers, despite concerns about individual privacy and fears that the information could be misused.

The new pact, replacing one struck down by a European Union court in May, continues arrangements by which all passenger names, credit card numbers and other personal information are passed electronically to the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency.

But it softens various restrictions on when and how that data can be passed to the CIA and other intelligence organizations.

Under the new system, "if we have particular interest in a number of flights, or a specific destination, then we can therefore use that information and share it with other counterterrorism agencies," said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, which includes the customs and border agency.

The data request must have some "specificity," he said, such as the recent alleged plot to bomb airliners flying from London. In that case, passenger information on flights from Britain to the United States could be shared with the FBI, he said.

The Europeans insisted on certain data protection safeguards. The U.S. agencies sharing the information, for instance, may retain the data for no more than 3 1/2 years, the same limit that applies to the border protection agency. And not everything that an airline knows about a passenger -- special meal requests, for instance -- will be turned over.

Many Europeans, living in countries with some of the most stringent privacy protections in the world, have been critical of what they perceive as U.S. efforts to usurp privacy of personal data, banking records and other information as part of attempts to identify potential terrorists.

In 2004, the European Commission -- the E.U.'s executive arm -- approved an agreement with the United States on the transfer of passenger data. But the European Parliament -- the E.U.'s elected lawmaking body -- challenged the deal in court, leading to it being overturned in May.

Pierre Sellal, France's permanent representative to the E.U., told reporters Friday that the new arrangement, reached after a nine-hour, transatlantic video conference, "permits the United States to protect against terrorist attack, but at the same time safeguards the essential liberties of passengers."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff offered a similar view.

But some European officials remain skeptical of the new agreement, which requires airlines to provide the data to the U.S. government on flights heading to the United States within 15 minutes of takeoff.

"The E.U. has once again caved in to U.S. pressure at the expense of E.U. citizens' civil liberties," Cem Oezdemir, a German member of the European Parliament, said in a statement released in Brussels. He said the new accord "allows the continued plundering of E.U. passengers' personal information."

"It's clear that the U.S. government continues to want more data than it needs to screen passengers and that it wants to use the data for purposes other than simply keeping dangerous people off of airplanes and in this agreement it has made some steps in that direction," said Jim Dempsey, policy director for the Washington-based Center for Democracy and Technology.

Since the court ruling in May, airlines have been operating in a legal limbo, subject to possible lawsuits from passengers alleging privacy violations and facing potential fines or landing-rights refusals from the United States if they fail to provide the data.

"This is an important agreement that will ensure normal operations for the 105,000 passengers who fly between these two jurisdictions each day," Giovanni Bisignani, director general of the International Air Transport Association, said in a statement.

The new agreement does not change the type of information to be provided on each passenger. It will include name, address, credit card information, frequent flier number, telephone and e-mail contacts and the history of the person's no-shows for flights.

E.U. officials said that airlines would not have to provide data that could be used to identify racial origin, political opinions, health and sex life. Meal orders, for instance, could help identify a passenger's religious or ethnic background.

Nakashima reported from Washington.

Report Cites Watch List Errors (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct 6 — Thousands of people have been mistakenly linked to names on terrorist watch lists when they crossed the border, boarded commercial airliners or were stopped for traffic violations, a government report said Friday.

More than 30,000 airline passengers have asked just one agency — the Transportation Security Administration — to have their names cleared from the lists, according to the Government Accountability Office report.

Separately, the National Security News Service and "60 Minutes" reported that the no-fly lists contain the names of 14 of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers; Evo Morales, the president of Bolivia; Nabih Berri, the speaker of Lebanon's Parliament; and Saddam Hussein.

In a statement released Friday, the F.B.I. denied that either Mr. Morales or Mr. Berri were on the list.

The list also contains such generic names as Gary Smith, John Williams and Robert Johnson. When "60 Minutes" spoke with 12 people named Robert Johnson, it reported, all said that they are detained almost every time they fly.

But the list did not have the names of any of the 11 British suspects charged with trying to blow up airliners with liquid explosives.

Probe Of Anthrax Attacks Casts Shadow On Brothers (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

CHESTER, Pa. -- On Nov. 15, 2001, Irshad and Masood Shaikh found themselves standing under the darkest cloud imaginable: The brothers had become suspects in the worst bioterrorism attack in American history.

An FBI SWAT team battered down their front door, pointed semiautomatic rifles at Irshad's wife and carried out the first raid on a private home in the federal investigation of the anthrax attacks. Agents in moon suits carted out the Shaikhs' computers, medicines and books and swabbed the television set for anthrax spores.

But the FBI had acted on a bad tip. By every account available, agents found no evidence implicating the brothers, who are widely respected public health experts.

Since then, the Shaikhs have suffered consequences great and small. Irshad Shaikh, 44, who is Chester's health commissioner and has worked on humanitarian missions in Iraq and Afghanistan with U.S. officials, has been blocked by the FBI from obtaining a federal contract with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Immigration officials canceled his scheduled interview for U.S. citizenship. And whenever Irshad returns to the United States from abroad, federal agents escort him off the airplane and interrogate him for hours.

Masood Shaikh, 46, serves as the Chester city epidemiologist. Like Irshad, he obtained a medical degree in Pakistan and a master's degree and a doctorate in public health from Johns Hopkins University. Two years ago, Masood was selected to work on removing land mines from Iraq. But the federal government refused to extend Masood's work visa pending a "security clearance." The clearance never came through, and Masood could not leave the country.

Masood, once poised to apply for American citizenship, now faces the expiration of his work visa and a return to Pakistan after 15 years in the United States.

The brothers acknowledge that they cannot prove that the government is behind every one of these roadblocks, but they point to a pattern.

"Our whole life has been turned upside down since 9/11," Irshad said by telephone from Cairo, where he is working with the World Health Organization. "For God's sake, they are welcome to search my house anytime. I will give them the key."

No one could argue with the FBI's urgency in trying to find the anthrax killers. The mail attacks in September and October 2001 claimed five lives and left 17 people gravely ill. The assailant possessed one of the deadliest bioweapons, and, with the slightest tweak in delivery, the anthrax spores might have caused tens of thousands of deaths. As the years passed and the FBI turned its searchlight on half a dozen people, careers and lives have been shattered.

The FBI designated Steven J. Hatfill, a Washington infectious disease researcher, as "a person of interest," and Louisiana State University dismissed him in 2004. In August 2004, FBI teams searched the home of Kenneth Berry, a New York physician who held three patents related to bioterrorism. He has lost his job and now lives in New Jersey.

Neither Hatfill nor Berry has been charged with a crime. Both vehemently deny any involvement with the anthrax letters, and Hatfill has sued the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0078565

But few suspects so unequivocally lack any connection to anthrax research as do the Shaikh brothers. They have never done biowarfare research. Their attorney, former prosecutor Anthony F. List, describes a Kafkaesque maze in which federal officials argue that they cannot be expected to "clear" men who, officially, are accused of nothing.

Spokesmen for the FBI, the U.S. attorney's office and the Department of Homeland Security say they are prohibited by federal law from talking about anyone even tangentially connected to a criminal investigation.

"This office has made no allegations regarding the Shaikhs," said Richard Manieri, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. "The Justice Department . . . typically doesn't announce when an investigation is closed or comment on the status."

List says prosecutors gave him Web addresses for federal inspectors general, but that is an uncertain path, and appeals can take years. "My clients are committed public servants," List said. "They don't have years to get on with their lives."

The Shaikh brothers grew up in Islamabad, Pakistan, in what they described as a secular and upper-middle-class family -- nine of their cousins are doctors. They immigrated to the United States and attended Johns Hopkins; Irshad was a Fulbright scholar.

In Chester, a working-class city of 36,000 just south of Philadelphia on the Delaware River, many residents view the Shaikh brothers with something approaching reverence. Irshad has served as health commissioner since 1994. On holidays, the brothers would volunteer to run the animal-control truck, picking up dead dogs and deer.

"We are very lucky to be the beneficiaries of their talents," said Chester City Council member Monir Z. Ahmed. "They've had a thousand opportunities to hurt people right here in Chester, and all they do is help us."

Then came the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The anthrax mailings began a week later. When Irshad heard a knock at his office door Nov. 15 and found four federal agents waiting, he was not surprised, he recalls.

"Muslim? Pakistani? Unfortunately we have all these characteristics," Irshad said. "I understand that. We are not angry, we are not resentful. This was logical."

The FBI smashed through the door of his house and found Irshad's wife, a dentist, asleep in bed. They handcuffed her at gunpoint. Other agents burst into the downstairs office, which was rented by the AIDS Care Group of Chester.

"They handcuffed our carpenter," recalled physician Howell Strauss. "One agent asked about the white dust -- I explained it was from the Sheetrocking. Then they took away our Elmer's glue for testing. I told them, 'You've been surveilling this house for weeks, and this is what you do?' I'll never have the same faith in our government."

Half a year later, Irshad Shaikh took a job with the Vietnam Veterans of America Foundation, running a mortality survey in Afghanistan. He worked closely with State Department officials. Later, the CDC asked Irshad to work in Atlanta and analyze the data, but the FBI insisted that he could not set foot in the federal offices, a ban that at least one senior CDC administrator protested, according to a federal official.

In June 2003, Irshad served as a leader with the Emergency Mine Action Survey in Iraq under the auspices of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority. He was responsible for securing and removing ammunition stockpiles, working closely with Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus and Brig. Gen. Frank G. Helmick of the Army's 101st Airborne Division. Irshad proudly e-mailed a photo of himself in a Black Hawk helicopter. He's sitting shoulder to shoulder with Helmick.

When Irshad returned to the United States, agents escorted him off the airplane. "You know what the other passengers are thinking: 'Terrorist!' " Irshad said.

Irshad and his wife have decided it is wiser to stay overseas in Cairo with WHO until the matter blows over -- although, for the first time, he has started saying, " If this blows over . . ."

"I decided to live this difficult exile," he said. "I know we are collateral damage. But we know, we believe , that fairness will prevail in our adopted country."

He paused.

"I would like say, respectfully, please let us get on with our lives."

The phone clicked off. Masood, sitting in their attorney's office listening to the conversation, shrugged. Irshad is the family optimist. "I came to this country hoping I could work and have a good career," Masood said. "My brothers still has some hope. I'm losing mine."

Bush Balks At Criteria For FEMA Director (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

President Bush reserved the right to ignore key changes in Congress's overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency -- including a requirement to appoint someone with experience handling disasters as the agency's head -- in setting aside dozens of provisions contained in a major homeland security spending bill this week.

DOJ_NMG_0078566

Besides objecting to Congress's list of qualifications for FEMA's director, the White House also claimed the right to edit or withhold reports to Congress by a watchdog agency within the Department of Homeland Security that is responsible for protecting Americans' personal privacy.

The standards for the FEMA director were inspired by criticism of former FEMA chief Michael D. Brown's performance after Hurricane Katrina last year. Brown, a lawyer and judge of Arabian horses, had no experience in disaster response before joining FEMA.

Bush's moves came in a controversial assertion of executive authority known as a "signing statement," which the White House issued late Wednesday, the same day the president signed the $34.8 billion measure. Congress has assailed the unprecedented extent of Bush's use of signing statements to reinterpret or repudiate measures approved by lawmakers instead of exercising a formal veto.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said the actions, first reported by the Associated Press, upheld the president's right to choose his advisers and control executive branch activities.

"There's nothing new here. The president has the authority to choose which of his subordinate officers he'll rely on," Fratto said. "The president has the authority to determine what the relationship is between them."

Lawmakers in both parties -- Democrats more harshly than Republicans -- said Bush was ignoring precedent and neglecting lessons of the bungled response to Katrina.

"Amazingly, President Bush continues to show more interest in expanding his executive power than in running the government in a fair, effective and competent manner," said Rep. Martin O. Sabo (Minn.), ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security.

A spokesman for Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who chaired a House Katrina investigation, said the White House is slighting Congress and ignoring the political toll of Brown's incompetence and ties to GOP cronies.

"Davis hopes the White House isn't saying they don't understand the need for minimal qualifications, or that they might bypass them. If indeed they are, then we haven't come very far from the days of 'Heck of a job, Brownie,' " Davis spokesman David Marin said, in a reference to Bush's early praise for Brown. "Good luck getting someone confirmed who doesn't meet these standards."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate's Katrina investigation, said its findings showed that the president needs a principal adviser for emergency management, as he has on military matters in the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Congress sets job requirements for officials from the U.S. solicitor general to the director of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, she said. They are comparable to the five years of management experience and demonstrated emergency-management skills it mandated for the head of FEMA, she said. The director also should be allowed to make recommendations directly to Congress, she said, authority that the White House rejected.

"Congress needs a forthright assessment of the state of the nation's preparedness from the FEMA director," Collins said.

The White House also reserved the right to withhold or alter reports of a unit that monitors DHS use of Americans' personal information in background checks, employment screening and air travel, among other things.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, warned against muzzling the office, as DHS emerges as "the central hub for the integration" of government databases containing that information.

The DHS Privacy Office's last report to Congress covered activities up to June 2004. DHS spokesman Larry Orluskie said a new report, updated through this June, will be sent to the White House for review in coming days and is expected to be made public in about a week.

New Orleans Population Is Reduced Nearly 60% (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 6 — The city's population has dropped by nearly 60 percent since Hurricane Katrina, far more sharply than recent optimistic estimates had suggested, according to an authoritative post-storm survey released this week.

The population of New Orleans is now only 187,525, well under half the pre-storm population of 454,863, according to the survey, commissioned by several state agencies. The United States Census Bureau and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention advised those who carried out the door-to-door population count this summer.

"We actually knocked on doors and asked how many people lived there," said Dr. Alden Henderson of the centers. About 490 households were surveyed, and researchers went to more than 1,100 dwellings, he said.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin has suggested that about half of New Orleans's former residents had returned, basing his projections partly on utility users. But the new numbers indicate that repopulation will take awhile to reach that level.

DOJ_NMG_0078567

"The recovery is going to be slower than we anticipated," said David Bowman, an official with the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which helped commission the survey. "It's going to take time to get the housing stock back online."

The margin of error for the survey was relatively high, plus or minus 12 percentage points.

The new figures also suggest that many more whites than blacks have returned to New Orleans. The white and black populations here are now separated by less than three percentage points, according to the survey — a gap much smaller than previously thought, and far less than the pre-hurricane divide, when New Orleans was 67 percent black. Whites now make up 44 percent of the population and blacks 46 percent, according to the new survey.

For months, neighborhood activists and housing advocates have suggested that the city's African-American population has had a difficult time re-establishing itself. Much of the rental housing was destroyed by the storm, rents have risen significantly and federal housing aid has barely begun to flow. The new numbers appear to bear out these concerns. They also suggest that the relatively high black vote in last spring's city elections — as much as 57 percent of the electorate — was elevated by citizens making the trip specifically to vote.

Still, officials expect these population figures to go up, eventually. More than 11,000 people from New Orleans have applied for federal rebuilding aid through the state's Road Home program. Some 80,000 housing units were destroyed in Orleans Parish alone, and their reconstruction has hardly begun.

The new population count has taken analysts here somewhat aback.

"The conventional wisdom was higher," said Richard Campanella, a Tulane University geographer. "It's a little bit of a disappointment. I don't question the numbers, that's for sure. This is the most authoritative survey yet."

Though officials acknowledged the new survey might not fully account for all of the city's daytime population — many are still commuting in to work on their houses — they emphasized that it was likely to be far more reliable than previous efforts, which relied on measures like school enrollment and electricity use.

WAR NEWS:

Warner's Iraq Remarks Surprise White House (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — The White House, caught off guard by a leading Republican senator who said the situation in Iraq was "drifting sideways," responded cautiously on Friday, with a spokeswoman for President Bush stopping short of saying outright that Mr. Bush disagreed with the assessment.

"I don't believe that the president thinks that way," Dana Perino, the deputy White House press secretary, said when asked whether the president agreed with the senator, John Warner of Virginia. "I think that he believes that while it is tough going in Iraq, that slow progress is being made."

Ms. Perino's carefully worded response underscores the delicate situation that Mr. Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has created for the White House just one month before an election in which Mr. Bush has been trying to shift the national debate from the war in Iraq to the broader war on terror.

Speaking to reporters on Thursday after returning from a trip that included a one-day stop in Baghdad, Mr. Warner said the United States should consider "a change of course" if the violence there did not diminish soon. He did not specify what shift might be necessary, but said that the American military had done what it could to stabilize Iraq and that no policy options should be taken "off the table."

With the blessing of the White House, a high-level commission led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, is already reviewing American policy in Iraq. But the commission is not scheduled to report to Mr. Bush and Congress until after the November elections, a timeline that the White House had hoped would enable Mr. Bush to avoid public discussion of any change of course until after voters determine which party will control Congress next year.

Now, Mr. Warner's comments are pushing up that timeline, forcing Republicans to confront the issue before some are ready. In an interview on Friday, Senator Susan Collins, a Maine Republican who has been critical of the administration's approach in the past, said there was a "growing sense of unease" among other Republicans, which she said could deepen because of Senator Warner's comments.

Ms. Collins, who is the chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, echoed Mr. Warner's calls for a shift in strategy in Iraq. "When Chairman Warner, who has been a steadfast ally of this administration, calls for a new strategy," she said, "that is clearly significant."

DOJ_NMG_0078568

She said the current approach, which she attributed to Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, had not led to an overall reduction in violence or any prospect that American troop levels would come down soon.

"We've heard over and over that as Iraqis stand up, our troops will stand down," Ms. Collins said. "Well, there are now hundreds of thousands of Iraqi troops and security forces, and yet we have not seen any reduction in violence."

Democrats, who have been using their fall election campaigns to tap into intense voter dissatisfaction with the way that Mr. Bush has handled Iraq, quickly seized on the Warner remarks, circulating them in e-mail messages to reporters. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, convened a conference call on Friday afternoon to hammer home the theme that even Republicans believed that the administration must change course. "Warner's statement is an important, important statement and, I hope, a turning point," Mr. Biden told reporters.

He that at least two Republican colleagues other than Mr. Warner had told him that once the election was over, they would join with Democrats in working on a bipartisan plan for bringing stability to Iraq. Echoing Mr. Warner's language, he said, "I wouldn't take any option off the table at this time. We are at the point of no return."

The White House said Friday that Mr. Bush had not spoken to Mr. Warner about his comments, and otherwise insisted that it had not glossed over the problems in Iraq. During her afternoon briefing, Ms. Perino harked back to a speech in late August in which, she said, the president said Iraq was at a "crucial moment." She said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had put forth the same message during her unannounced visit to Baghdad this week.

Later in the day, the White House circulated an e-mail message titled "Iraq Update: Political Progress," citing comments of other lawmakers, including Democrats, who had returned from the Middle East with more hopeful assessments than the one offered by Mr. Warner.

Senator Warner Has Grim View Of Iraq (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 7, 2006

U.S. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, returned from Baghdad with a grim outlook on how things are going there.

Normally a supporter of Bush policies in Iraq, Warner now says he believes in giving Iraqi leaders 90 days to make progress against insurgents.

Otherwise, the United States will need to make some "bold" moves, he told the Virginia Pilot. He did not elaborate.

Rice Urges Kurds To Work For Peaceful, Unified Iraq (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, October 7, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met the leaders of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, urging them to cooperate with Iraqi Arabs in building a peaceful and unified country.

Rice dropped in on Kurdish regional president Massud Barzani in Arbil, his northern capital, after an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital Baghdad, which is in the grip of a brutal sectarian conflict.

"The Kurdish people will ... certainly be better served if Baghdad and its surrounding areas are stable and democratic," Rice told reporters at a joint press conference with Barzani.

"We had a very good discussion about the national reconciliation process and the vision of unified democratic Iraq that is stable, that is at peace and at peace with its neighbors," she said.

Grateful for US support in throwing off the yoke of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein, Iraq's Kurds have put their long-cherished dreams of independence on hold while the Baghdad government struggles to rebuild the war torn country.

But separatist tensions are never far from the surface, and fierce rows have recently erupted over the banning of Iraq's national flag in the north and the Kurdish government's determination to develop its own oil industry.

Washington fears a Kurdish declaration of independence would accelerate the possible disintegration of Iraq and knows it would be bound to anger regional ally Turkey, which has a restive Kurdish minority of its own.

Kurdish leaders regularly warn that they will secede if the rights of their region -- a union of three Iraqi provinces which has been broadly autonomous since 1991 -- are trampled on by the Arab-led Baghdad administration.

This threat reared its head again last week, when the Kurds announced the development of a new oil field, amid complaints from the central government that it should be consulted before deals are signed with foreign firms.

Barzani's oil minister furiously rejected federal oversight of oil contracts, and repeated the threat to declare independence.

Rice tried to calm the oil row during her visit.

"Our view... which I think most Iraqis agree with, is that oil needs to be a unifying factor and not one that would help to make the country less unified," she told reporters late Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0078569

Barzani said after meeting Rice: "We are for a fair distribution of oil revenues for the Iraqis."

Meanwhile, officials in Baghdad confirmed that a Kurdish lawmaker in Iraq's national parliament had been kidnapped and murdered during Rice's visit, which came after Monday's breakthrough pledge by Iraq's political factions to work together to halt the bloodshed.

Rice met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and senior leaders from both sides of Iraq's bitter sectarian divide between Sunni and Shiite factions.

"The mass murders have shocked the people," Maliki said on Iraqi television, insisting that the reconciliation initiative was not reached under foreign pressure "but by the will of the Iraqis."

The violence convulsing the capital was in full evidence for Rice's visit, with 16 US soldiers killed since Monday. A rocket attack on the airport upon her arrival forced her military C-130 transport plane to spend 45 minutes circling the airfield.

Rice departed Arbil after a delay of more than two hours due to aircraft problems and headed to London for a meeting of six major powers on whether to urge the United Nations to slap sanctions on Iran over its suspect nuclear programme.

The Iraqi authorities, meanwhile, declared a total curfew Friday evening in the northern oil city of Kirkuk, shutting down entrances to the city for an undisclosed period of time, police said.

"This operation comes within the context of a new security being implemented by Iraqi forces in Kirkuk," said Captain Emad Jassem Khidr of Kirkuk police.

Police said they had collected 35 corpses over a period of 24 hours in Baghdad, mostly in the Sunni western half of the city.

The bodies bore the tell tale markings of Baghdad's grim sectarian war with signs of torture and bullet wounds to the head.

Rice Appeals To Oil-rich Kurdish North (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Convinced oil revenue is the long-term key to economic independence for a unified Iraq, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appealed Friday for cooperation from the autonomous and oil rich Kurdish north.

Rice visited the region's powerful president, Massoud Barzani, less than two weeks after the regional government threatened to break away from Iraq in a dispute over oil.

After a session with their staff, followed by a lengthy one-on-one meeting at the Kurdish government offices in Irbil, Rice and Barzani stood in front of U.S. and Kurdish flags and spoke to reporters.

Barzani, speaking in Kurdish through an interpreter, said Kurdistan, "like any other nation, has the right to self-determination." However, he said he is committed to a "federal democratic and pluralistic Iraq."

For her part, Rice thanked Barzani for the Kurds' long cooperation with the United States, adding, "and I appreciate also your important participation in the process of national reconciliation. Thank you."

When he was asked about the future distribution of oil wealth, Barzani did not repeat recent assertions that Kurdistan alone should control new contracts and business arrangements for oil pumped in the region. But at the same time, he gave no endorsement of proposed national legislation on dividing up income from oil.

Rice's two-day trip to Iraq is meant to show U.S. support for the country's fragile central government, under assault by a spiral of sectarian violence and growing calls for autonomy among Iraq's regions.

And while she said the administration is always reviewing its policies in Iraq, she said it would not halt its backing for the country's struggling government.

"The option that the President has been very clear that he is not reviewing is beginning to somehow remove American support for this regime, for this new government in Iraq, before it's able to do the job on its own," she told reporters as they flew to London for a meeting on Iran's nuclear program.

Rice's departure from Irbil was delayed Friday, leaving unclear how much progress would be made at the London session.

Rice had to wait about two hours for a replacement plane because of mechanical problems discovered in the C-17 military transport that was supposed to ferry her to Turkey, where another jet was waiting to fly her to London.

The delay meant Rice would arrive late for a meeting with foreign ministers from Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China. The group still planned to meet but would be unable to finish its business and refer Iran to the U.N. Security Council on Friday as had been expected, said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, who was traveling with the secretary.

In Iraq, fears of Kurdish secession have risen in recent weeks, especially when Barzani briefly banned the display of the Iraqi flag in government buildings.

The oil dispute reflects the larger fight over federal control in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0078570

Although the parliament briefly averted a crisis over the Kurdish threat last month, leaders have been unable to pass a federal law on the distribution of oil wealth

The U.S. and other international backers want quick action on a law that would streamline the complicated oil sector, attract foreign investment and provide for equitable distribution of oil profits across Iraq.

Oil is still pumping at prewar levels more than three years after the invasion that toppled the former president of Iraq, Saddam Hussein.

Oil resources are now governed by vague terms in the national constitution written last year.

Energy analysts estimate oil revenues make up more than 95 percent of Iraq's domestic budget.

Since the Gulf War of 1991 the Kurdish north had been out of Saddam's control and the Kurds established their autonomous region under U.S. and British protection. After the U.S.-led invasion and occupation of Iraq, Kurdistan was the only region that did not witness major changes.

Iraq's new constitution recognizes Kurdish self-rule and provides a legal mechanism for other areas to govern themselves but within the Iraqi state.

Sunni Arabs, who had enjoyed control over Iraq under Saddam, now fear the Kurdish push for secession under the nation's new federal system. Should the Shiite majority in the oil-rich south follow suit, the Sunnis would find themselves with little more than date groves and sand.

Kurds Show Signs Of Seceding From Iraq (AP)

By Yahya Barzanji, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

With violence bloodying Iraq, Kurds in the peaceful north have been showing signs of going their own way, raising their own flag and even hinting they could secede in a dispute over oil wealth — moves that have alarmed Shiites and Sunnis.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's visit to Kurdistan on Friday underlined American worries that Kurds may be pushing too hard too soon for autonomy powers at a time of increasing sectarian tensions.

Kurds insist they are only using the autonomous powers given to them by the constitution passed last year that laid down a federal system in Iraq. But many of those powers — particularly the division of oil wealth — remain vague.

Some Shiites are also pressing for their own autonomous region in the south, but even mere talk of federalism — amid a wave of Shiite-Sunni violence that has killed thousands this year — has raised fears of the country falling apart.

"I warn those who back federal regions," a top Sunni Arab cleric, Harith al-Obeidi, said in his prayer sermon Friday in a Baghdad mosque. "They should think about security in Baghdad before claiming that federalism will provide security for the regions. ... Federalism in its current form will lead to the division of Iraq."

Sunnis in particular worry that a breakup of the country will create strong Shiite and Kurdish regions in the south and north — where Iraq's oil wealth is concentrated — and leave Sunnis in an impoverished central zone with no resources.

Backing for independence has always been strong in the autonomous zone in Iraq's northernmost three provinces, where the majority of the country's 5 million Kurds live. They have enjoyed self-rule since 1991.

While much of the rest of Iraq has been torn by violence, Kurdistan has remained largely at peace. Sunni and Shiite Arabs who want to enter Kurdistan must go through elaborate permit procedures — still, many have flocked there seeking jobs in one of Iraq's few areas that see significant private investment.

Kurdistan's president, Massoud Barzani, sparked an outcry last month when he ordered all Iraqi flags removed from government buildings in the region and replaced with the Kurdistan flag — a green, red and white tricolor with a yellow sun.

The Kurdish flags remain in place, and Barzani refuses to raise the Iraqi one — a holdover from the rule of Saddam Hussein, who persecuted the minority Kurds and Iraq's Shiite majority — until a new national flag is created representing all of the country's communities.

Kurdish oil deals have also raised concerns in Baghdad. The Kurdistan government signed a series of agreements with foreign companies to develop new oil fields this year. Over the summer, a Canadian-Turkish consortium drilled a test well in the area of Taq Taq, between Sulaimaniyah and Irbil.

Oil Minister Hussain al-Shahristani said the central government would review contracts signed separately by the Kurdistan government — drawing a sharp warning from the region's prime minister, who said if Baghdad moves in on Kurdish deals it would fuel independence sentiment.

"The people of Kurdistan chose to be in a voluntary union with Iraq on the basis of the constitution," Prime Minister Nechirvan Barzani said in a statement issued Sept. 28. "If Baghdad ministers refuse to abide by that constitution, the people of Kurdistan reserve the right to reconsider our choice."

DOJ_NMG_0078571

At a news conference with Rice in the Kurdish city of Irbil, Barzani underlined that Kurdistan, "like any other nation, has the right to self-determination." However, he said he is committed to a "federal, democratic and pluralistic Iraq."

For her part, Rice told Barzani, "I appreciate also your important participation in the process of national reconciliation."

Kurdish officials insisted they would move ahead with developing their oil sector, arguing the constitution gives them the right to do so.

"We will continue in exploring the oil resources in Kurdistan in accordance with articles in the constitution that allow each region to exploit its resources," Kamal Kirkoukli, deputy president of the Kurdistan parliament, told The Associated Press.

But the constitution remains vague on sharing oil wealth. It calls for a fair distribution, but also gives regions a hand in developing new oil fields. Parliament has been debating legislation on dividing oil wealth, but has yet to pass a law.

Kirkoukli and other Kurdish officials dismissed worries of the Kurds pressing a bid to secede.

"This is nothing new. ... They always accuse the Kurds that they want to break up Iraq," said Saadi Ahmed Pira, the Irbil chief of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, one of the region's two main parties. "Today in the Iraqi government, there are strange voices of Arab chauvinism and they mirror the ideas of the previous Saddam government."

"The Kurds' decision not to withdraw from Iraq is not for the sake of the Sunnis," he said. "In the current political situation, the Kurds have chosen to live in a united federal Iraq."

Rice Tells Kurds That Unity Is Key (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Their security rests with closer ties to fellow Iraqis, not to their friend the U.S., she says.

IRBIL, Iraq — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged restless Iraqi Kurds to seek their future in a closer alliance with other Iraqis, as she visited the country's relatively peaceful Kurdistan region Friday for talks with regional President Massoud Barzani.

Meanwhile, political and sectarian violence continued to afflict the rest of the nation. Kurds condemned Thursday's abduction and slaying of a Kurdish lawmaker in Baghdad, a probable sectarian attack, and a Danish soldier was killed in southern Iraq. At least 20 Iraqi civilians were reported killed in bombings and shootings around the country, Iraqi officials said.

Rice declared that Iraq's minority Kurds, who suffered greatly under the rule of Saddam Hussein, can find their best security guarantee not from their powerful ally, the Americans, but from the Iraqi Constitution.

The efforts of Iraq's new government to revise the constitution and better develop a federal system "is one that can, within the framework of a united Iraq, protect and defend the rights of all people," she said in an appearance with Barzani at his offices in Irbil, in northern Iraq.

Barzani, president of the Kurdistan regional government, spoke publicly in terms likely to please Rice, saying Kurds are committed to working within the federal system and will share oil revenue from wells discovered in their region.

"Our views were very similar, and we have pledged that we will continue in our efforts in our cooperation to implement the process that we have started, until we establish a federal, democratic, pluralistic Iraq, an Iraq which will be free from terrorism and terrorists," Barzani said.

Despite the apparent harmony, U.S. officials are concerned by issues now swirling in Kurdistan, the least violent and most pro-American part of Iraq.

Many Kurds want the region to secede, especially as they see sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Arabs to the south on the rise.

There has been growing tension with Turkey, which has attacked members of the separatist Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, within Iraq's borders. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, recently warned that if Iraq's neighbors, including Turkey, sought to undermine the sovereignty of the country, Iraqis could reciprocate.

Kurds are also at odds with fellow Iraqis over how to divide oil revenue. Some Kurds think money from newly developed fields should be spent in Kurdistan, not turned over to the federal treasury. The constitution is vague on that point.

Barzani, asked for his view on the issue, said that as the constitution provides, "we are [for] a fair distribution of the oil revenues all over Iraq."

Rice didn't mention the issue during her appearance, but earlier in the week she said the United States favored an equal distribution of oil wealth to all segments of the country.

The dispute has exacerbated tensions between Kurds and those Iraqis who favor a strong role for the central government in allocating energy revenue. The conflict is often played out violently on the streets of the oil-rich northern city of Kirkuk, where U.S. and Iraqi forces Friday imposed a new curfew in an effort to stem a string of bombings and assassinations.

Danish military officials said a soldier was slain in fighting in Basra.

DOJ_NMG_0078572

Violence has been a constant in Baghdad, where Mohammed Redha Mohammed, a Kurdish member of parliament, and a bodyguard were abducted Thursday and later found dead. The two were kidnapped as they left the offices of a prominent Sunni charity.

Such killings are often carried out by sectarian death squads suspected of having ties to Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces. U.S. and Iraqi officials consider the Shiite gangs the most destabilizing element in the civil warfare that has gripped much of central Iraq.

The 1,200-man 8th Brigade of the Interior Ministry was taken off Baghdad's streets this week amid charges of complicity or cooperation with Shiite death squads. But at a news briefing Friday, U.S. Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, the officer in charge of training Iraqi police, called that move an "isolated incident."

The 8th Brigade has had a bad reputation for months, he said, and he commended Iraqi police, noting that 4,000 officers have been killed and 8,000 wounded since August 2004.

Iraqi forces have made significant progress under the current government, he said.

"A year ago we had a situation where a police station was attacked and policemen were running out the back door leaving all the equipment," he said. "That does not occur anymore. Our policemen are more confident."

But Iraqis continue to express grave doubts about the government and its security forces.

"These days the Iraqi people are being slaughtered, and the politicians are only concerned about how to divide Iraq, to make one part for a particular sect," Hareth Ubaidi of the Sunni Nawaf Mosque in Baghdad told worshipers gathered for Friday prayers.

"All of this is preparing for a sectarian war."

Richter reported from Irbil and Daragahi from Baghdad. Times staff writers and special correspondents in Baghdad, Diwaniya, Kirkuk and near Basra contributed to this report.

Afghanistan: Five Years Later (WP)

By Donald H. Rumsfeld

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

On Oct. 7, 2001, President Bush spoke from the Treaty Room of the White House to announce the beginning of Operation Enduring Freedom, a mission designed to disrupt and destroy al-Qaeda operations in Afghanistan and the regime that had harbored and supported Osama bin Laden's terrorist network.

It was never going to be an easy mission. Afghanistan was among the world's poorest nations, with little political or economic infrastructure. Nearly three decades of war, drought and a Soviet occupation by hundreds of thousands of troops had yielded a broken, lawless nation.

Yet from halfway around the world -- with but a few weeks' notice -- coalition forces were charged with securing a landlocked, mountainous country that history had dubbed the "graveyard" of great powers.

Given the circumstances, it is not surprising that military experts and columnists raised the specter of Vietnam and "quagmires" -- both before and during combat operations. They cited the forbidding terrain, brutal weather and the Soviet Union's total failure.

Within weeks of our launching combat operations, however, the Taliban regime had been defeated, consigning yet another cruel regime to the dustbin of history. Coalition forces took control of Kabul, and since then the Afghan people have fashioned a new constitution and successfully held the first democratic presidential election in their long history.

Now, five years after the start of Operation Enduring Freedom, another signpost has been marked on Afghanistan's long, difficult road to stability: NATO took control of security operations for the entire country on Thursday, as well as the 24 Provincial Reconstruction Teams that are strengthening infrastructure across the nation.

This is an unprecedented moment for the NATO alliance. In 2001 NATO forces were for the first time deployed beyond their traditional European borders. Today the number of troops in Afghanistan from nations besides the United States has reached more than 20,000 -- to add to the approximately 21,000 American troops serving there.

Not all the news about Afghanistan is encouraging. There is, for example, the legitimate worry that increased poppy production could be a destabilizing factor. And rising violence in southern Afghanistan is real.

President Hamid Karzai, speaking with President Bush recently at the White House, acknowledged the difficulties: "Afghanistan is a country that is emerging out of so many years of war and destruction. . . . We lost almost two generations to the lack of education. . . . We know our problems. We have difficulties. But Afghanistan also knows where the problem is."

The problem, he said, is poverty and extremism. Success requires a strong and capable Afghan government that can provide services and opportunities for all its people.

DOJ_NMG_0078573

During the active combat or conventional phase of any war, there are clear signs of progress: battles won, key strategic points taken, enemy forces captured or killed. In the post-battle phase, however, the measure of progress is not as clear -- especially in a war such as the Global War on Terror, which relies so heavily on the development of civic institutions in places that have known little more than war and destitution.

And yet, for all of the challenges the Afghan people face, there are many promising indicators. Among them:

Â· Security: The Afghan National Army has grown to more than 30,000, with approximately 1,000 soldiers added each month. The Afghan National Police now number more than 46,000. Afghan forces were successful in providing security for the two national elections held since 2004.

Â· Economy: The size of Afghanistan's economy has tripled in the past five years and is projected to increase another 20 percent next year. Between 2003 and 2004, government revenue increased 70 percent, to $300 million. Coca-Cola recently opened a $25 million bottling plant in Kabul, and other large multinational companies are considering opportunities in Afghanistan.

Â· Education: In the past five years, more than 42 million school textbooks have been printed and distributed, and some 50,000 Afghan teachers have been trained. Almost 600 schools have been built, and now more than 5 million children attend school, a 500 percent increase from 2001.

Â· Health care: In 2001 only 8 percent of Afghans had access to at least basic health care; at least 80 percent do today. Some 5 million Afghan children have been vaccinated.

Â· Infrastructure: Thousands of kilometers of roads have been built or improved since the Taliban fell. Since 2004, 25 provincial courthouses have been built and hundreds of judges trained.

Building a new nation is never a straight, steady climb upward. Today can sometimes look worse than yesterday -- or even two months ago. What matters is the overall trajectory: Where do things stand today when compared to what they were five years ago?

In Afghanistan, the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one.

The writer is secretary of defense.

Rumsfeld Cites Progress In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, October 7, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that despite Afghanistan's rising opium production and violence in the south, "the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one" five years after the Taliban's fall.

Rumsfeld, in an opinion piece in Saturday's edition of The Washington Post, said Afghanistan's economy has tripled in five years, its forces have grown by 1,000 soldiers a month, the number of students in school has grown fivefold and 80 percent of the population has access to basic health care, up from 8 percent.

Ticking off more progress, he cited the building of 25 courthouses, a 70 percent jump in revenue and even Coca-Cola's opening of a $25 million bottling plant in Kabul.

"Building a new nation is never a straight, steady climb upward," he wrote. "Today can sometimes look worse than yesterday — or even two months ago. What matters is the overall trajectory."

Rumsfeld touched on only a few of the setbacks, including a surge in the drug production that the Taliban had almost wiped out five years earlier.

But the defense secretary glossed over other dangers: The Taliban has taken control large parts of the countryside, more than 3,000 people have been killed in rising violence this year, and militants have been assassinating political figures, burning down schools and creating havoc with roadside bombs.

Taliban Revived In Southern Afghanistan (AP)

By JIM KRANE

Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP, October 7, 2006

New Zealand soldiers, part of International Security Assistance Force, man in the city of Bamyan, north west of Kabul, Afghanistan on Thursday, Oct. 5, 2006. NATO took over eastern Afghanistan from U.S.-led forces Thursday, assuming control of 12,000 U.S. troops and command of the entire country.

Afghanistan (AP) - A sweating man wanders into a crowd and blows himself up, leaving a dozen bodies lifeless on the street. A few blocks away, a car bomb pulverizes an armored Humvee, killing two U.S. soldiers and 14 civilians. The kind of anonymous insurgent violence that is convulsing Iraq has migrated 1,500 miles east to plague Afghanistan five years after the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban regime.

DOJ_NMG_0078574

The prospect of a second downward spiral - though so far Afghanistan isn't nearly as violent as Iraq - has experts worried that Western militaries don't have an effective strategy for these irregular wars.

"One Iraq is bad enough," said Bruce Hoffman, a counterinsurgency expert at Georgetown University. "Given that our two main theaters of operations aren't going well, one has to question how well the U.S. understands counterinsurgency."

The reborn Taliban acknowledges that it has adopted the suicide bombings, beheadings and remote-controlled bombs of the Iraqi insurgent movement. Nearly 200 civilians have been killed in suicide attacks this year that look all too much like the wave of bombings sweeping Iraq.

"We're getting stronger in every province and in every district and every village," said Qari Mohammed Yusuf Ahmadi, who calls himself the Taliban's spokesman for southern Afghanistan. "We don't have helicopters and jet fighters. But we're giving America and its allies a tough time with roadside bombs, suicide attacks and ambushes. Our Muslim brothers in Iraq are using the same tactics."

Resemblances to Iraq don't stop there. Taliban public relations teams videotape attacks and post them online, an uncharacteristic venture into modern technology for a Muslim fundamentalist group that once banned cameras and computers.

The West's military strategy in Afghanistan also resembles that in Iraq.

Just as critics say Washington did not send enough troops to Iraq before the insurgency took root, analysts fault the U.S. for failing to press its advantage in Afghanistan in 2002 and 2003 when the Taliban were all but vanquished.

Meanwhile, Afghan observers say the same harsh U.S. tactics, decried in Iraq for causing civilian casualties, have helped the Taliban recruit new fighters.

But unlike Iraq's insurgents, the Taliban has ready sanctuary and support just outside their battle zone, in the border areas of Pakistan.

"There will be no end to this insurgency until its sanctuaries and external support are addressed," said Christopher Alexander, the deputy head of the U.N. Assistance Mission in Afghanistan.

The U.S. military estimates about 6,000 Taliban and other insurgent fighters operate in Afghanistan, many from bases in Pakistan. Yusuf Ahmadi - who spoke by satellite phone from an undisclosed location and whose exact ties to the militia's leadership are unclear - put the figure in the tens of thousands.

The Taliban comeback, while focused on the volatile south and east, has begun to hit Kabul. The mountain capital's tree-lined boulevards are now scarred, like the streets of Baghdad, by garlands of razor wire, towering blast walls and impromptu police checkpoints.

There's little indication that Iraqi insurgents are joining the fight in Afghanistan or giving the Taliban direct aid, although a few Arab and Chechen fighters mingle in Taliban ranks.

But even without much personal contact, the Taliban has learned from Iraq's insurgency. Web sites explain the insurgent's art: everything from concealed rocket launchers to roadside bomb-making.

"We're not saying they're getting direct support from Iraq," a U.S. military official in Afghanistan said on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity the information. "They've evolved by adapting their tactics. They've seen the value of the suicide bomber in Iraq. For them, it's a very cheap and effective weapons system."

The U.S. and NATO military response in Afghanistan also has nuanced differences from Iraq. U.S. warplanes drop 10 times more bombs in Afghanistan than they do in Iraq, and a few U.S. and NATO troops live off base in village houses, a strategy rarely attempted in Iraq.

But most of the allied war efforts looks similar. In both places, troops cordon off villages and search homes. They employ billions of dollars in technology - things like signal jammers and mine-clearing vehicles - to find and disarm roadside bombs. They operate from bases nearly identical in appearance, with troops living in tin trailers barricaded by dirt-filled metal baskets.

The Afghan war is still far smaller, occupying just 40,000 allied troops - a quarter of those in Iraq - and suffering a fraction of the casualties. But for individual soldiers serving in mountainous Taliban lands like Zabul province, the dangers feel the same.

"I know Iraq grabs a lot of headlines. But there's still a war going on over here," said Lt. Col. Steve Jarrard, 46, of Johnson City, Tenn., based in the hard-bitten southern town of Qalat. "I really hope we're doing the right thing over here."

Right now, it's too early to tell the result of major U.S. and NATO offensives aimed at crushing the Taliban.

"In three to six months you'll see a noticeable effect," said NATO spokesman Maj. Luke Knittig. "But you're talking two to five years before seeing a defeat of the insurgency" in southern Afghanistan.

AP correspondents Noor Khan in Kandahar and Fisnik Abrashi in Kabul contributed to this report.

U.S. General Says 4,000 Iraqi Policemen Have Died In 2 Years (NYT)

By John O'Neil

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

About 4,000 Iraqi policemen have been killed and more than 8,000 have been wounded in the last two years, the American general in charge of training the country's police forces said yesterday.

"They have paid a great price," Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson said, "yet Iraqis are signing up as recruits every day."

General Peterson said the figures covered casualties from September 2004 to the present. Earlier this year, a spokesman for the general told Congressional researchers that 1,497 Iraqi police officers were killed and 3,256 were wounded in 2005.

Taken together, the numbers appear to show a rising casualty rate among the Iraqi police, who have replaced American troops as the prime focus of insurgent attacks for much of this year.

In a televised briefing from Baghdad, General Peterson acknowledged that the police forces and the Interior Ministry that supervises them were still plagued by corruption and sectarianism, and that good unit commanders were in short supply.

But he pointed to a number of recent developments as reason for optimism, including the decision last week by Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani to suspend the Eighth Brigade, Second Division, an 800-member police unit in Baghdad, after some of its officers were suspected of taking part in the kidnapping and killing of Sunni workers from a food processing plant.

General Peterson said that a battalion commander had been arrested in the episode, in which his unit was operating outside of its authorized area, and that two of the brigade's three battalions had previously failed inspection.

Murders carried out by death squads linked to sectarian militias are the main cause of Iraqi deaths now, according to the American military, and Sunni leaders have complained about Shiite killers operating under the cover of the forces led by the Shiite-dominated government.

Mr. Bolani is seen as a more independent figure than his predecessor, who was a leader of one of the main Shiite parties. General Peterson called the suspension of the Eighth Brigade the result of an "isolated incident," but said that Mr. Bolani "realizes that within his ministry he has individuals who joined the legitimate security forces of Iraq but maintained loyalty to militias."

Asked about the Sunni perception that the police are dominated by Shiites, the general said that local police units were meant to reflect the makeup of the area they patrolled. He said the national police force was 75 percent Shiite and 25 percent Sunni, which reflects the ethnic breakdown of the country apart from Iraqi Kurdistan, where security is handled by the regional government.

The national police will be the focus of a new round of training meant to improve the quality of the forces, now that a goal of recruiting 188,000 officers has been all but met, General Peterson said. The force had been created to do paramilitary duties, and its members now need to learn more basic skills, he said.

Over all, General Peterson emphasized the "tremendous progress" made since American forces designated 2006 as the "year of the police."

He cited Anbar Province, the restive western region long dominated by Sunni insurgents, as one example. "We've cleared out the Euphrates River valley and are starting to see police forces grow and take hold and perform their responsibilities admirably," he said.

But he stressed that solving the problems of the police would take time.

"This is like trying to build an airplane in flight," he said. "They're just rookies, and we put them all throughout Iraq. We give them some capable leaders, but this is not simple."

In Baghdad, authorities reported a fresh crop of sectarian deaths, with 15 bodies found yesterday. In a Shiite enclave in southern Baghdad, Abu Dshir, 5 Iraqis were killed and 10 were wounded when mortars crashed into a house, an Iraqi police official said.

4,000 Iraq Police Killed In Past 2 Years (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, October 7, 2006

About 4,000 Iraqi police have been killed and more than 8,000 wounded in the past two years, the U.S. commander in charge of police training said Friday, but he said the force's performance was improving and officials are working to weed out militiamen.

Beefing up Iraq's security forces is a cornerstone of efforts to stop the violence that has torn the country since the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003. Police have been a prime target for attacks by Sunni insurgents.

Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led police of helping fuel sectarian violence that has killed thousands this year. They say the police have been infiltrated by Shiite militias and turn a blind eye to death squads who kidnap and kill Sunnis.

On Friday, a Sunni Kurdish party accused Shiite militias of killing a Kurdish lawmaker, Mohammed Ridha Mohammed, who was kidnapped in Baghdad the night before and whose body was found dumped along with that of his driver.

DOJ_NMG_0078576

Members of parliament have fallen victim in the past to Sunni insurgents, who have often targeted Kurds. But Mohammed's slaying was the first blamed on Shiite militias. He was a member of a religious conservative Kurdish party, the Islamic Group, a small faction in the Kurdish coalition that is part of the Shiite-led government.

More victims were found Friday in the spiral of slayings between Shiite and Sunni groups. Nine bodies were discovered in the southern Shiite city of Kut and the nearby town of Suwayrah. Among them was that of a Suwayrah city councilman.

During Friday prayers at the Imam al-Hussein shrine in the southern city of Karbala, the representative of Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, urged militias to put down their arms.

"The weapons should be in the hands of the government only," Ahmed al-Safi told worshippers. "No other group should be allowed to carry weapons, so that the state would be able to provide the appropriate security conditions to the Iraqi people."

Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson said it is hard to tell how many militia members have infiltrated the police forces.

"I have no idea what the number is," said Peterson, speaking from Baghdad to reporters at the Pentagon. "Certainly if we ask the question, they won't respond that they are associated with any militia. ... It's something we continue to look for. We do ask the question."

He said that any Iraqi police who are identified with a militia or who commit crimes are arrested, and others who have affiliations that cannot be tied directly to a crime are released from duty.

Iraqi authorities on Wednesday pulled a brigade of about 700 policemen out of service in their biggest move ever to uproot troops linked to death squads. The brigade is suspected of allowing gunmen to kidnap 24 workers from a frozen food factory in a district of Baghdad where the Shiite Mahdi Army militia is known to have considerable power.

The brigade commander was relieved of his duties, and a battalion commander was arrested, Peterson said, adding that officials had identified problems with the brigade during an inspection in August. He said the brigade "demonstrated very poor performance" in their missions.

Still, he said he believes the matter, which included the deaths of seven workers, was "an isolated incident."

"We have not seen other actions of late tied to sectarianism," he said. He added that Iraqi officials realize there are "individuals who joined the legitimate security forces of Iraq but yet still maintain loyalties to militias. So that is an issue."

Peterson said there are many police who are loyal to the country and "they've paid a great price" — putting the toll since September 2004 at 4,000 policemen killed and 8,000 wounded in attacks.

Altogether about 186,000 Iraqi police have been trained, and officials expect to exceed the goal of 188,000 by 10,000 by year's end, he said.

Currently there are 6,000 coalition forces embedded with the Iraqi police units as training teams, and Peterson said the Iraqis are improving.

"A year ago we had a situation where a police station was attacked and policemen would run out the back door, leaving all the equipment," he said. "That does not occur anymore."

The United States has put increasing pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take action to stop sectarian violence amid deep divisions within his Cabinet between Shiite and Sunni parties. Sunnis complain al-Maliki is hesitant to take tough action against Shiite militias because many of them are linked to parties he relies on.

Associated Press correspondent Lolita C. Baldor in Washington contributed to this report.

4,000 Iraqi Police Killed In 2 Years, U.S. Official Says (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Iraqi police have suffered 4,000 killed and 8,000 wounded over the past two years as the fledgling force grapples with wartime problems including corruption and infiltration by sectarian militia, a U.S. commander said yesterday.

Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, commander of the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team in Baghdad, described significant headway in building an Iraqi police force, saying that 99 percent of the target force of 188,000 police has been trained and 82 percent have their equipment.

But he said continued efforts will be needed in 2007 to improve the quality of the force, provide training in leadership and basic policing skills, and weed out militia members -- some of whom are known to have carried out sectarian executions.

"It's hard to really ascertain how many individuals within the national police forces . . . still maintain loyalties to militias," Peterson said in a Pentagon teleconference with reporters. "We do ask the question, but obviously the response is always 'no.' So I have no idea what the number is."

This week, Iraq's Interior Ministry had to remove a brigade of hundreds of Iraqi police from duty in Baghdad after it participated in sectarian violence, including one battalion that raided a meat-processing factory and kidnapped more than 20 Sunni workers, seven of whom were later found executed.

DOJ_NMG_0078577

That brigade, as well as other Iraqi police units now being inspected, will undergo three weeks of "police transformational training" to improve policing skills, Peterson said.

Peterson called the sectarian killings by police "an isolated incident" and said the decision to order the police brigade back to its garrison was "very positive."

"The minister has been concerned about two principal issues within the ministry: corruption and sectarianism," said Peterson, whose 1,000-person team is in charge of supporting the training, manning and equipping of Iraq's police force. In addition, about 6,500 U.S. troops and more than 600 police officers are currently acting as embedded advisers to Iraqi police units.

Deaths Across Iraq Show It Is A Nation Of Many Wars, With U.S. In The Middle (LAT)

By Solomon Moore And Louise Roug, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — Consider a recent day — an average 24 hours in Iraq.

Here in the capital, the bodies of eight young men were found chained together, stripped of identification papers, shot and dumped in a parking lot, the first of 20 corpses found in the city that day.

In northern Iraq, a man detonated a bomb vest amid a group of women, children and men lining up for cooking oil, killing himself and 21 others. In the south, police found the bullet-torn body of a senior anti-terrorism official. And in Al Anbar province, in the west, a car smashed into a line of police recruits and exploded, killing 13 by fire and shrapnel.

In all, at least 57 people died and 17 were injured in the violence that day, Sept. 18.

They were all killed in the same country, but not in the same war. The fighting in Iraq is not a single conflict, but an overlapping set of conflicts, fought on multiple battlegrounds, with different combatants. Increasingly, American troops are caught between the competing forces.

In western Iraq's deserts, Sunni Arab insurgent groups, some homegrown and others dominated by foreign fighters, attack Iraqi government forces and the U.S. troops who back them up. In Baghdad and surrounding provinces, Sunni and Shiite fighters attack each other and their rivals' civilians in a burgeoning civil war that U.S. troops have tried to quell.

In southern Iraq, the Shiites dominate. But they are divided, with rival militias fighting over oil and commerce. And in the north of the country, Arabs and Kurds battle for control.

Often during the last three years, the U.S. military has shifted troops to try to tamp down one of these conflicts, only to see another escalate. Now, many American officials worry that with the proliferation of armed actors in Iraq's multiple conflicts, the original U.S. counterinsurgency mission has become something else — an operation aimed at quelling civil war, which is a much more ambiguous and politically fraught objective.

American troops find themselves in the crossfire, caught among foreign militants, Sunni Muslim nationalist rebels, Shiite Muslim militiamen and other armed groups — all fighting each other.

"It's a very complex situation," said Maj. Gen. Thomas R. Turner, commander of the Army's 101st Airborne Division. "Sometimes it's difficult to figure out where the violence is coming from."

West Desert Insurgency

Al Anbar province houses the conflict most familiar to Americans and most costly to U.S. troops — Marines and Iraqi insurgents, battling in the country's vast western desert.

The insurgents, almost all Sunni Arabs, are a mix of groups, some made up primarily of Iraqis, others heavily composed of foreign fighters drawn to the battle against the U.S. occupation. In addition to American troops, they target Iraqi forces and Sunnis who are suspected of cooperating with the government.

Barely a week passes without the U.S. military sending out several terse death notices from Al Anbar.

Attacks against U.S. forces have climbed 27% in Al Anbar since last year, according to the U.S. Marine Corps. American attempts to reduce the toll by turning over security duties there to Iraqi forces have met with little success. Marines say there are 5,000 Iraqi police officers and 13,000 Iraqi soldiers in the province, but that the Iraqi forces remain fragile and unable to sustain themselves. Half the Iraqi soldiers are on leave at any given time, and many don't return to duty. In May, desertion rates in some Iraqi units reached 40%.

In August, threats from insurgents led half of Fallouja's police force to stay home for days, a U.S. general said. And Fallouja at least has a police force. Other strategic cities, including Haditha, Hit and Ramadi, remain virtually lawless.

Meanwhile, Al Qaeda in Iraq, the best known of the insurgent groups, continues to make inroads in the province, consolidating and expanding its reach. Al Qaeda in Iraq was led by Abu Musab Zarqawi until U.S. forces killed him in June. American officials had hoped Zarqawi's death would severely disrupt the group, but that does not appear to have happened.

DOJ_NMG_0078578

"Al Qaeda has murdered, intimidated, co-opted or paid off all the local national insurgent groups," said Marine Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a military spokesman in Fallouja. "They run an organized criminal enterprise that has its tentacles in everything from black-market gasoline sales to extortion of police and government paychecks. Al Qaeda provides the leadership and organization for this loose association of organized criminals."

In addition to the deaths of U.S. troops, the conflict has taken a toll on Al Anbar's residents, many of whom have fled. Those who stay are at constant risk.

Among the police recruits killed in Ramadi recently was Faiz Mohamad Ali. In an interview, his brother described Ali as an art institute graduate, painter and optimist.

Ali attempted to join the police after failing to find a market for his paintings, said the brother, who asked not be identified for fear insurgents would track him down.

"Four days before he got killed, we were chatting about Iraq. He was enthusiastic and went on talking about how everybody should take part in building this country," Ali's brother said. "I remember him talking about how he could serve Iraq as a painter: 'My paintings are talking about Iraq in my own way,' he said. 'The new, shiny Iraq.' "

Militia-Plagued Capital

While the Sunni Arab insurgency is blamed for much of the violence in Al Anbar province, in Baghdad, Shiite militias carry out the majority of killings, according to most U.S. officials. Sunnis account for most of the victims.

The capital, with its 6 million residents, is home to about a fourth of Iraq's population. It is the nation's administrative center and among its most religiously and ethnically diverse cities. This year, it has also been a sectarian killing field.

The United Nations reported that 2,884 people were killed in Baghdad in July, the highest monthly death toll since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. In August, 2,222 people were killed and in September, 1,980 — the decline probably due to increased patrols in the capital.

In addition to the thousands killed, hundreds of thousands of residents of Baghdad and the provinces immediately around it have fled their homes. Shiites and Sunnis have abandoned mixed neighborhoods in favor of others offering more homogeneous populations.

In recent weeks, Diyala, a province with about 1 million residents just north of Baghdad, has been particularly violent.

On Sept. 18, police in Baqubah, the provincial capital, reported that gunmen had assassinated the Sunni mayor of the nearby village of Udayem, making the official one of hundreds of people killed in the province in recent weeks. It remains unclear why the mayor was targeted or who killed him.

Internal Shiite Warfare

Until recently, southern Iraq seemed relatively peaceful. Now, Shiites, who dominate the region, have splintered into factions that feud over oil resources, smuggling proceeds, political power and religious authority. Violence remains smaller in scale than in the capital, but it is increasing.

Virtually all the south's political and religious institutions are divided among four Shiite groups: the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite party in the country; followers of Muqtada Sadr, the radical cleric who has called for the U.S. to pull out its troops; and two smaller parties, the Islamic Dawa Party and Al Fadila al Islamiya. Because each of the warring local parties is affiliated with Iraq's governing Shiite alliance, local disputes often spread to the highest reaches of society, threatening national stability.

Huge amounts of money are at stake in the fighting. The southern city of Basra, Iraq's second-largest, controls vast oil reserves and the nation's only seaport, making it a vital trailhead for billions of dollars of imports and exports — much of them smuggled. The Shiite parties there compete for illicit profits, many Iraqi analysts say.

The struggles in some cases have flared into open war. In August, in the town of Diwaniya, militiamen loyal to Sadr squared off against government troops infiltrated by the Badr organization, the militia loyal to the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. The resulting battle left 40 dead, including a dozen troops who ran out of ammunition and were executed by Sadr's loyalists. That same month in Karbala, Sadr's fighters fought supporters of competing Shiite cleric Mahmoud Hassani.

Shiite political parties are also using assassinations to knock off opponents in advance of upcoming provincial elections.

"There are clashes among parties and militias at various levels, and by the time the provincial council elections come, there will be bloody conflicts in Basra," an Iraqi intelligence official said.

U.S. and British military officials are moving ahead with plans to withdraw troops from the south, saying the area has stabilized enough for Iraqi troops to handle. Whether that assessment is accurate is unclear. After British troops handed over a base in Maysan province, militiamen vandalized it and stripped it bare as Iraqi troops looked on. American forces plan to withdraw from Najaf by November, said Lt. Col. Michael Hilliard, the commander of Forward Operating Base Duke near Najaf.

These withdrawals are designed to turn security over to the Iraqi government but seem likely to further empower the militias.

DOJ_NMG_0078579

"We have no authority in our cities because the clerics and religious powers are controlling the area," Gov. Aqeel Kharzali of Najaf province said Sept. 18 at a conference of Iraqi police and southern politicians.

"This is evident when a policeman tries to confront a militia without a fatwa. Our police in Diwaniya and Karbala are marginalized, and we have no authority to fire renegade officers aligned with the militias."

Kurdish-Arab Clashes

The same day Kharzali spoke, gunmen driving a BMW attacked guards at an oil pipeline near Kirkuk, in northern Iraq. In Mosul, four police officers were ambushed and shot to death.

The main players and political stakes in Kirkuk and Mosul are similar: Both cities have mixed Kurdish and Arab populations battling for local control.

During ousted President Saddam Hussein's rule, the government pursued a policy of 'Arabization' in the north. More than 100,000 Kurds were exiled from the Kirkuk area alone.

Iraq's constitution calls for a census that will define the voting districts for a referendum on Kirkuk's fate — whether it will be annexed to Kurdistan or to Arab-dominated Tamim province. In Kirkuk and Mosul, Kurdish politicians have been accused of trying to gerrymander yet-to-be-scheduled provincial votes. Arabs and Kurds accuse each other of politically motivated killings.

Kirkuk is the biggest prize because the city and its environs contain about 40% of Iraq's oil reserves.

About 40% of the area's residents are Kurds, including many who have returned since the 2003 invasion. Approximately one-third of Kirkuk's residents are Arabs, many of whom arrived in the city during Hussein's reign. Turkmens constitute about 20% of the regional population. The two smaller groups have sometimes joined forces to resist Kurdish control, but have also battled each another.

Car bomb attacks in Kirkuk have tripled in the last year, and roadside bombings have doubled, according to U.S. military officials who provided trend lines but not actual numbers of such assaults.

Assassinations have also increased, with attackers focusing on politicians and police. Explosions in August targeted a courthouse and Kurdish political offices affiliated with President Jalal Talabani's party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan.

Mosul has none of Kirkuk's oil wealth, but it remains a trouble spot because of its Sunni extremist element. In the wake of the U.S. siege of Fallouja in 2004, fleeing rebels made Mosul their haven. When American troops retook Mosul, insurgent forces fled to Tall Afar. U.S. troops retook the latter city in September 2005 in a large-scale assault, but rebels remain deeply rooted in all three cities.

Until March of this year, most attacks in the Mosul area targeted U.S.-led forces, but by April, there were almost as many assaults against Iraqi security forces as against the Americans. There was also an increase in attacks against civilians, according to the U.S. military.

Despite the violence, the number of U.S.-led troops in Iraq's six northern provinces has been reduced from 31,000 to 21,000.

Alla Eid, a 26-year-old student at Mosul University, said the city has been taken hostage by clashing insurgents and U.S. forces. "We are living like cavemen. We eat and go to work or school every morning, and then life ends before sunset," she said. After dark, Mosul "turns into a city of ghosts."

Times special correspondents Ali Windawi in Kirkuk and Saad Fakhrildeen in Najaf and correspondents in Baghdad, Mosul, Ramadi, Fallouja, Diwaniya and Baqubah and in Kuwait contributed to this report.

Unit Due For 3rd Iraq Tour As Troops' Burden Deepens (AJC)

By Ron Martz

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 7, 2006

Fort Stewart — In April 2003, Army Spc. Cedric Shelbon was among the 3rd Infantry Division soldiers based here who led the American assault on Baghdad that hastened the fall of Saddam Hussein. Last year, Shelbon returned to Iraq as a push was made to train Iraqi forces to assume more responsibility for defense of their country.

Now, after less than a year at home, Shelbon and about 4,000 of his fellow soldiers from the division's 1st Brigade Combat Team are preparing for a third tour in Iraq, this time facing nearly out-of-control sectarian violence.

The prospect of spending another year in Iraq as a Humvee driver has left the 23-year-old from Marion, La., pondering his own fate.

"It's kind of nerve-racking. You see your friends get killed and you wonder if the next time it's going to be you," Shelbon said earlier this week as his unit went through its final major training exercises at home before deploying overseas in January.

Shelbon is among dozens of soldiers in the brigade — unit officials say they don't have an official count — who will be making their third combat tour in Iraq in less than four years.

DOJ_NMG_0078580

The multiple deployments and rapid turnaround are evidence that the service is stretched so thin it may have to request broader access to National Guard units to meet demands being made on it, Army officials said recently at an infantry conference at Fort Benning.

Turnover has been high

Col. John Charlton, the brigade commander, is among those who will be serving a third combat tour in Iraq, all with the 3rd Infantry Division.

"Duty calls," Charlton, 46, of Spokane, Wash., said with a smile and a shrug when asked about going back so soon.

Charlton commanded an infantry battalion of about 750 soldiers during the initial invasion, then last year was responsible for helping the division plan its operations. He said he has known for some time that the unit was likely to return in January, even though the official announcement did not come until last week.

"We still have lots of work to do over there," he said. Charlton estimated that a significant percentage of the senior officers and senior enlisted soldiers are combat veterans, but about 20 percent have no combat experience at all.

"There's a significant amount of learning that needs to take place," said Lt. Col. Doug Crissman, commander of the brigade's 2nd Battalion, 7th Infantry Regiment, who has not been to Iraq and only took command in late July.

Crissman, 40, of Burke, Va., estimates about 40 percent of the 728 soldiers in his battalion will be making their third trip to the war zone. "I think it's made for a slightly shorter preparation window and flattened the learning curve for us," Crissman said.

But the turnover in Crissman's unit has been high, especially among officers and senior enlisted, said Command Sgt. Major Samuel Coston, the top enlisted soldier in the battalion.

Out of 728 soldiers in the unit, 316 changed duty stations or left the Army after returning from Iraq in January.

"None of the lieutenants we have now were here [for the last tour], all the previous company commanders are gone and all the first sergeants are new," said Coston, 45, of Wallace, N.C., a combat veteran of Panama and Iraq.

Trainers come to troops

The short turnaround time for the brigade has resulted in a training pace so accelerated that the two weeks it would have normally spent at one of the Army's major training facilities at Fort Irwin, Calif., or Fort Polk, La., before going to Iraq were instead spent here.

Rather than packing up the brigade and sending it to Fort Irwin, the Army brought the trainers from the California base to Fort Stewart to replicate as best they could what is offered at the high-desert training site, which more closely resembles Iraq than the piney woods of southeast Georgia.

Although the woodsy terrain at Fort Stewart is much more confining than Fort Irwin, the trainers were able to use the mock Iraqi villages here and the Iraqi role players in scenarios that allowed the soldiers to use their tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles, Humvees and helicopters in much the same fashion as they will once they get to the war zone.

This is only the third time Fort Irwin trainers have taken their Iraq-preparation program on the road. But the first two times, at Fort Bragg, N.C., and Fort Carson, Colo., were on a much smaller scale, each involving training fewer than 1,000 soldiers, said Lt. Col. Jim Miller, deputy commander for the Fort Irwin training operations group. "It was a little bit of a challenge" to move the Fort Irwin training to Fort Stewart, Miller said.

Iraq combat is changing

Training the 1st Brigade's 4,000 soldiers meant moving much of the Fort Irwin equipment and personnel — about 1,000 trainers and Iraqi role players plus more than 600 vehicles — across the country with just three weeks notice. The total cost was about $10 million, only slightly cheaper than it would have cost to send the brigade to California. But by bringing the trainers to Georgia, what would have been a five-to-six week preparation and training process for the brigade was accomplished in only three weeks.

It was a good exercise for the Fort Irwin group, Miller said, because the pace of current operations may mean future pre-Iraq training exercises at other major bases.

"At some point we anticipate the Army having this capability to come to your home [post] and do the training there," Miller said.

Charlton, the brigade commander, said even the two-time combat veterans need to be retrained because of the changing nature of the fighting in Iraq. More emphasis is being put on such things as quelling sectarian violence and dealing with suicide bombers in these three weeks of training — ending today — than in previous training. "They do a very good job of replicating every scenario we could face over there," Charlton said.

Staff Sgt. Joshua Pickering, a squad leader with Bravo Company, 2nd Battalion, 7th Infantry Regiment, agreed with Charlton, to a degree.

"For our time constraints, they did the best they could," said Pickering, 24, of Miami, another of the brigade's soldiers heading to Iraq for a third time. But Pickering, whose wife is expecting their first child next month, said his unit did not get this level of training before the initial invasion. He said it is especially good for newcomers because many of the role players are expatriate Iraqis who take their jobs seriously. "I think it opens [the new soldiers'] eyes about how difficult it is to deal with the civilians over there," Pickering said.

DOJ_NMG_0078581

Shelbon, the Humvee driver, said, "Nothing is ever going to be close to the real thing, but they do a pretty good job."

Charlton said he is not sure where his unit will be headed in Iraq, although there has been speculation it will replace a brigade of the 1st Armored Division in Anbar province in western Iraq, one of the more restive areas in the country. Pickering, who re-enlisted last year in Iraq for the tax-free bonus, said no matter where the brigade goes, it will be easier dealing with another deployment for most of the soldiers once they are there.

"I'm a little nervous now," he admitted. "It's tough leaving the wife behind, but once you are there you get focused on what you have to do."

Medic Testifies That Marines Shot Iraqi Civilian (MSN)

MSNBC, October 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif. - A Navy corpsman was sentenced Friday after testifying that Marines in his patrol seized an Iraqi civilian from his home, threw him into a hole and put at least 10 bullets in his head and chest after growing frustrated in their search for an insurgent.

Petty Officer Melson Bacos, 21, was sentenced to 10 years in prison, but he will end up serving only a year under a plea deal. Bacos was also dishonorably discharged.

Bacos agreed to a plea deal earlier Friday in which he agreed to testify in exchange for a lesser sentence on kidnapping and conspiracy charges.

A medic, Bacos was charged along with seven Marines in the slaying of Hashim Ibrahim Awad last spring in the town of Hamdania.

“I knew what we were doing was wrong,” Bacos testified, speaking nearly in a whisper. “I tried to say something and then I decided to look away.”

“I was shocked and I felt sick to my stomach,” he added.

Bacos was the first of the servicemen to be court-martialed. The seven others could get up to life in prison.

Prosecutors have said that the servicemen killed Awad out of frustration and then planted an AK-47 assault rifle and a shovel by the body to make it look as if he had been caught digging a hole for a roadside bomb.

The incident was one in a series in which the conduct of American troops in Iraq have damaged America's image worldwide.

Sergeant was 'mad' at release

Bacos testified that the squad entered Hamdania on April 26 while searching for a known insurgent who had been captured three times, then released. Squad leader Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins was “just mad that we kept letting him go and he was a known terrorist,” Bacos said.

The group approached a house where the insurgent was believed to be hiding, but when someone inside woke up, the Marines instead went to another home and grabbed Awad, according to the testimony.

Bacos said the squad had intended to get someone else if they did not capture the insurgent, then stage a firefight to make it appear they had found an Iraqi planting a roadside bomb.

Awad, 52, was taken from the home with his feet and hands bound, then placed in a hole, Bacos said. Bacos said he asked the Marines to let Awad go, but Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda told him in crude terms that he was being weak and should stop protesting.

Bacos said Hutchins fired three rounds into the man's head after checking to see if he was dead, then Cpl. Trent Thomas fired seven to 10 more rounds into his chest.

Hutchins also called in to a command center and reported the squad had seen a man digging a hole and wanted permission to fire at him, Bacos alleged.

Bacos said he saw Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington put the victim’s fingerprints onto an AK-47 and on a shovel to implicate him as an insurgent who had fired first. Bacos was told to fire an AK-47 into the air to simulate the sound of a firefight.

After the killing, Bacos said, he was standing in the road when another Navy corpsman drove by.

“He asked me what happened, and I was very vague,” Bacos testified. “I said, ‘I want you to remember something. We’re different. We’re not like these men.’”

Transferred for safety

Bacos was recently transferred from Camp Pendleton, where the Marines have been held, to Marine Corps Air Station Miramar for his own safety.

DOJ_NMG_0078582

Military prosecutors had charged Bacos under the theory that he did nothing to stop the alleged crime. In return for his testimony, murder charges and other counts against him were dropped.

Along with Magincalda, Pennington, Hutchins and Thomas, the other Marines charged are: Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, Pfc. John J. Jodka, and Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr.

David Brahms, Pennington's lawyer, said Bacos' account will be subjected to intense scrutiny. "This is just one guy who is going to tell the story as he sees it," Brahms said.

"The defense's job is to climb a mountain," he added. "With Bacos' plea, the mountain is slightly higher."

Former Army prosecutor Tom Umberg suggested that others might follow Bacos' lead and strike similar plea bargains.

"You don't want to be the last guy standing. The first guy gets the best deal," he said.

Medic's background

A Purple Heart recipient with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, Bacos was the first to admit his role in the Hamdania case. The murder was one in a series of incidents in which the conduct of American troops in Iraq have hurt the country's image worldwide.

The son of immigrant Philippine parents, Bacos, a former high school varsity wrestler, had hoped to become a doctor and administered first-aid for his platoon.

He enrolled in the Navy after graduating from high school in 2003, was first deployed to Iraq in 2004 and redeployed for a second tour in Iraq this year. In court he wore a Navy summer white service uniform bearing several medals.

Bacos' wife, who is also a Navy corpsman, attended the hearing at Camp Pendleton near San Diego, as did his father.

Other Camp Pendleton-based Marines are under investigation in a separate incident in November 2005 in which 24 civilians were killed in the Iraqi town of Haditha.

Courts have also convicted a series of low-ranking U.S. soldiers for abusing Iraqis at the notorious Abu Ghraib prison.

Sailor Details Killing Of Iraqi Civilian (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Oct. 6 -- Eight members of a Marine squad planned to kill a suspected Iraqi insurgent and developed a cover story before their April raid, but when they could not find their target, they pulled a neighbor from his bed and shot him to death instead, a Navy medic who was part of the group testified Friday.

Melson J. Bacos offered the first testimony in the case -- one of several the government has brought against servicemen charged with assaulting and killing Iraqi civilians -- and it came as the result of a plea bargain for the hospital corpsman 3rd class. Bacos and seven Marines in his squad were charged with shooting a civilian in the Iraqi town of Hamdaniyah on April 26, then planting a shovel and an AK-47 next to him to make it appear he was burying a roadside bomb.

In exchange for his testimony and an agreement to testify against his former squadmates, prosecutors dropped murder charges against Bacos and accused him instead of kidnapping and conspiracy. Bacos, 21, was effectively sentenced to about seven more months in the brig.

The seven Marines still face charges of premeditated murder, kidnapping and conspiracy.

In quiet but vivid testimony in a courtroom on the military base where he had been imprisoned since May 23, Bacos mostly corroborated the government's account of the slaying and added new detail.

With his wife and father sitting behind him, Bacos haltingly told the court that the squad of eight servicemen was on ambush patrol when their leader gathered them under a tree in a palm grove and said he had a plan. Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III wanted to kill an Iraqi named Saleh Gowad, who Hutchins thought was an insurgent, Bacos said. Gowad had been detained and released three times, Bacos testified, and Hutchins "was mad that we kept letting him go."

Hutchins assigned each man a role: Bacos and two others would steal a shovel and an AK-47 to plant near the body, while others would go to Gowad's home and pull him out at night, Bacos said. They planned to dig a hole so it would seem Gowad had been burying a bomb when he was killed.

If Gowad was not home, they would carry out their plan on another civilian, Bacos testified. They agreed to lie to military investigators who would come behind them.

"We all said, 'I'm in,' " Bacos said.

At 3 a.m. on April 26, the squad put the plan in action, Bacos said. When they went to Gowad's home, "one of the family members woke up and saw us," Bacos said. "So Corporal [Trent D.] Thomas and Corporal [Marshall L.] Magincalda pointed at the house next door."

Thomas and Magincalda went into the house while Bacos and a Marine waited outside. The pair came out with Hashim Ibrahim Awad, Bacos said. Awad was a 52-year-old father of 11 with an injured leg who had worked as a policeman from 1969 to 1990, two of Awad's brothers told military investigators in a videotaped interview that was played in court Friday. Bacos said he did not know Awad's name at the time and had no reason to suspect him of insurgent activity.

The Marines bound his feet and gagged him, Bacos said.

Bacos said he saw Hutchins fire "three rounds into the man's head," Bacos said. "And after, I saw Corporal Thomas fire seven to 10 rounds into the man's chest."

Bacos said he then fired the stolen weapon into the air to make it sound as if a firefight had occurred, he said.

Bacos told Col. Steven Folsom, a military judge, that he had tried to stop the squad members from killing Awad. "I knew what we were doing was wrong," he said. "I tried to say something, sir, and then I decided to look away."

"Why didn't I do more to stop it? Why didn't I just walk away?" Bacos asked during his sentencing. "The answer to that question is, I wanted to be part of the team. I wanted to be loyal. I wanted to be a respected corpsman. But wanting to be a loyal, respected corpsman is not an excuse for immorality. . . . I apologize to my country, to the United States Navy and to the United States Marine Corps . . . and I also ask forgiveness of the Iraqi family."

Bacos was moved two days ago from the brig at Camp Pendleton to a cell at Marine Corps Air Station Miramar. His plea agreement includes a provision that he be notified if any of his co-conspirators are to be housed in the facility where he is serving his sentence.

Government prosecutors argued that Bacos deserved 10 to 15 years in prison and a dishonorable discharge. "This court has a responsibility to harness this tragedy to send a general message to all of the troops serving in Iraq that if you commit a crime of this magnitude, you will face swift and severe justice," said Capt. Nicholas Gannon, the government's attorney.

Bacos can expect blistering cross-examination when he testifies at the courts-martial for the Marines in his squad, said Eugene R. Fidell, a former military prosecutor who now is president of the National Institute of Military Justice. "I know a number of the lawyers involved in the case, and these are not potted plants," he said.

A defense attorney for Hutchins, Lt. Col. Joe Smith, said, "At this point we look forward to proceeding with the case, and think that a much more complete picture will develop through the proceedings."

Corpsman Who Failed To Halt Killing Of Iraqi Receives Prison Sentence (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Oct. 6 — A Navy hospital corpsman who said he watched seven members of his Marine squad repeatedly shoot an unarmed Iraqi in the head and chest in April was sentenced Friday to 10 years in prison, which was reduced to one year in a plea agreement..

The corpsman, Petty Officer Third Class Melson J. Bacos, 21, pleaded guilty to modified charges of conspiracy and kidnapping, but avoided the charge of murder and a possible death sentence by agreeing to cooperate with prosecutors and testify against members of his squad.

With time served, Petty Officer Bacos could be released in five months.

His testimony offered the first detailed public description of the April 26 incident in Hamdaniya, a Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad, where prosecutors say the eight soldiers joined in an unprovoked murder tantamount to a war crime.

The men, all members of Kilo Company in the Third Battalion, Fifth Marine Regiment, are accused of dragging Hashim Ibrahim Awad from his home, binding his hands and feet, gagging him and then shooting him at point-blank range; and later planting evidence and lying to cover up his death.

“I witnessed Sergeant Hutchins dead check the man and then fire three rounds into the man’s head,” Petty Officer Bacos said, speaking about his squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, a focus of his testimony. After that, he said, Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, another squad member, fired 7 to 10 rounds into the man’s chest.

All eight men — the others are Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda, Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington, Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr. and Pvt. First Class John J. Jodka III — were charged June 21 with premeditated murder, kidnapping, conspiracy and making false statements to investigators.

Charges against Petty Officer Bacos were reduced as part of his plea bargain.

The petty officer said the plot to kill an Iraqi and cover it up was devised hours before the shooting as the men “huddled” in a palm grove near the crime scene. The unit had been on ambush duty, searching for Saleh Gowad, a man the government considered “a known, high-value individual,” he said. Mr. Gowad had been a detainee at the Abu Ghraib prison but was released, which was an apparent sore point for Sergeant Hutchins, the petty officer said.

“He was just mad that they kept letting him go when he was a known terrorist, sir,” Petty Officer Bacos told the military judge, Col. Steven Folsom. “He was detained and released three times, sir.”

DOJ_NMG_0078584

The petty officer said Sergeant Hutchins and the other marines “devised a plan” to kill any Iraqi if Mr. Gowad could not be found. But he said that he was not part of the initial planning, and that when he first heard the proposal, he brushed it off.

“I didn’t believe they would carry out a plan like that,” he said.

He protested, he told the judge, saying that in his view, “there was no justification.”

“It was unlawful, sir,” he testified, but he eventually went along. “I knew what we were doing was wrong,” he said. “I tried to say something, and then I decided to look away.”

He also said: “I wanted to be part of the team. I wanted to be loyal.”

Court documents read into the record Friday recounted how the men stole a shovel and an AK-47 to plant near the body, and later shot rounds in the air to create bullet casings that would suggest a gunfight.

“I feel my honor is gone,” Petty Officer Bacos said.

In a statement to the court, he apologized to the victim’s family, as well as to his own, and to the Marines and the nation.

“Perhaps he could have had a crisis of conscience when he stole that shovel,” said Nicholas Gannon, the prosecutor. “He could have had a crisis of conscience when they approached Mr. Awad’s house. But he did not.”

Sailor Testifies About Killing Of Iraqi (AP-Y)

By Linda Deutsch, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, October 7, 2006

A Navy corpsman testified Friday that Marines in his patrol seized an Iraqi civilian from his home, threw him into a hole and put at least 10 bullets in his head and chest after growing frustrated in their search for an insurgent.

Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson J. Bacos said he saw a Marine put fingerprints from the victim onto a rifle and on a shovel to implicate him as an insurgent.

"I was shocked and I felt sick to my stomach," Bacos said.

Bacos, a medic who had been on patrol with the squad, was charged along with seven Marines in the slaying of Hashim Ibrahim Awad last spring in the town of Hamdania. But Bacos struck a deal with prosecutors under which he pleaded guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy and agreed to testify Friday at his court-martial about what he saw.

"I knew what we were doing was wrong," Bacos testified, speaking nearly in a whisper. "I tried to say something and then I decided to look away."

Bacos said he asked the Marines to let Awad go, but Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda told him in crude terms that he was being weak and should stop protesting.

Bacos, 21, was the first of the servicemen to be court-martialed. The seven others could get up to life in prison.

Military judge Col. Steven Folsom sentenced Bacos to 10 years in prison but reduced the term to one year because of the plea agreement. That will be further reduced by time served. Other counts of murder, kidnapping and conspiracy were dropped in exchange for his cooperation while a reduction in rank and a dishonorable discharge also were suspended.

Prosecutors have said that the servicemen killed Awad out of frustration and then planted the assault rifle and shovel by the body to make it look as if he had been caught digging a hole for a roadside bomb.

Bacos testified that the squad entered Hamdania on April 26 while searching for a known insurgent who had been captured three times, then released. Squad leader Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins was "just mad that we kept letting him go and he was a known terrorist," Bacos said.

The group approached a house where the insurgent was believed to be hiding, but when someone inside woke up, the Marines instead went to another home and grabbed Awad, according to the testimony.

Bacos said the squad had intended to get someone else if they did not capture the insurgent, then stage a firefight to make it appear they had found an Iraqi planting a roadside bomb.

Awad, 52, was taken from the home with his feet and hands bound, then placed in a hole, Bacos said.

"I felt I couldn't stop it any more that day," Bacos testified. "They were going to do it. They were going to carry out the plan, so I continued on."

Bacos said Hutchins fired three rounds into the man's head after checking to see if he was dead, then Cpl. Trent Thomas fired seven to 10 more rounds into his chest.

After the killing, Bacos said Hutchins called in to a command center and reported the squad had seen a man digging a hole and wanted permission to fire at him.

Bacos said he saw Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington put the victim's fingerprints onto an AK-47 and on a shovel to implicate him as an insurgent who had fired first. Bacos was told to fire an AK-47 into the air to simulate the sound of a firefight.

"Why didn't I just walk away?" Bacos asked before being sentenced. "The answer to that question was I wanted to be part of the team. I wanted to be a respected corpman, but that is no excuse for immorality."

DOJ_NMG_0078585

After the killing, Bacos said, he was standing in the road when another Navy corpsman drove by.

"He asked me what happened, and I was very vague," Bacos testified. "I said, 'I want you to remember something. We're different. We're not like these men.'"

Bacos' wife and father sat in the front row of the courtroom during the court-martial. During a break, Bacos turned to her and mouthed the words, "I love you."

The tiny courtroom was still as Folsom repeatedly asked Bacos if he had been coerced into giving his account of the shooting.

Bacos said he was testifying voluntarily. He wore a white Navy uniform and a Purple Heart his wife said he had been awarded during a previous tour in Iraq.

Bacos was recently transferred from Camp Pendleton, where the Marines have been held, to Marine Corps Air Station Miramar for his own safety.

Military prosecutors had charged Bacos under the theory that he did nothing to stop the alleged crime.

Along with Magincalda, Hutchins and Thomas and Pennington, the other Marines charged are: Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, Pfc. John J. Jodka and Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr.

David Brahms, Pennington's lawyer, said Bacos' account will be subjected to intense scrutiny. "This is just one guy who is going to tell the story as he sees it," Brahms said.

Former Army prosecutor Tom Umberg suggested that others might follow Bacos' lead and strike similar plea bargains.

"You don't want to be the last guy standing. The first guy gets the best deal," he said.

After the proceedings, Bacos said he deeply regrets what happened in Hamdania.

"Hopefully, that family will forgive us for what we have done," he said.

Navy Man Admits Kidnapping Iraqi (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 7, 2006

A Navy petty officer admitted Friday that he was involved in kidnapping an Iraqi man allegedly shot dead by U.S. Marines.

Melson Bacos pleaded guilty to conspiracy and kidnapping in a proceeding at Camp Pendleton, Calif., the Los Angeles Times reported. He was sentenced to a year with credit for time he has already spent in custody.

Bacos' description of the crime can be used in the prosecution of seven Marines charged with the murder of Hashim Ibrahim Awad. He said Awad was trussed up, with hands and feet tied, when he was shot.

Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins, the team leader, went after Awad because he was frustrated at not finding a known insurgent, Bacos said.

"He was mad we kept letting him go when he was a known terrorist," Bacos said.

The Marines and Bacos allegedly set the scene so that Awad appeared to have been planting a bomb when he was shot. But his family complained to military authorities that he had been taken from his house.

Sailor Sentenced To One Year In Iraqi's Slaying (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Navy corpsman admits his role in the killing and asks forgiveness of the victim's family. He will testify against seven Marines in the incident.

CAMP PENDLETON — A Navy corpsman was sentenced Friday to one year in the brig after he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and kidnapping in the death of an Iraqi man and agreed to testify against seven Marines charged with murder.

In an emotional statement at his court-martial, Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson Bacos admitted his role in killing an unarmed man and asked forgiveness of the dead man's family.

"I also apologize to our country, to the Navy and the Marine Corps for not living up to the values of honor, courage and commitment," he told the judge, Col. Steven Folsom. "I've learned from this mistake, and to tell the truth is the only honorable thing I can do."

Bacos, 21, said he was sickened as he watched Marines fatally shoot 52-year-old Hashim Ibrahim Awad, a disabled Iraqi who had been dragged from his home shortly after midnight April 26 in Hamandiya, west of Baghdad.

"I felt shocked and sick to my stomach," Bacos testified.

He said he knew that what the Marines were doing was illegal but he felt powerless to stop it.

"They were going to do what they were going to do," he said. "I felt I couldn't do anything else."

But he added that later in the night, he told a fellow corpsman about his dismay over what the Marines had done, saying: "I want you to remember something — we're different. We're not like these men."

DOJ_NMG_0078586

Bacos testified that the Marine squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, had hoped to capture and kill a "high value" Iraqi long suspected of planting bombs. When the original target could not be found, Hutchins allegedly decided to kidnap and kill Awad, who had also been suspected of insurgent connections. The squad was on a late-night ambush mission to catch insurgents planting roadside bombs.

Bacos said he watched the Marines line up and fire at Awad. Hutchins then did a "dead check" on Awad, firing three more rounds into his head, and Cpl. Trent D. Thomas fired seven to 10 rounds into him, Bacos testified.

Bacos said he had earlier asked Cpl. Marshall Magincalda to release Awad but Magincalda refused, telling Bacos he was being a weakling. As a corpsman, Bacos was assigned to provide additional firepower as well as emergency medical help to the Marine squad.

"Why didn't I do more to stop it?" Bacos said in his statement to Folsom. "Why didn't I just walk away? The answer is I wanted to be part of the team."

Prosecutors had asked for a sentence of 10 to 15 years in prison and a dishonorable discharge. Defense attorneys said a term of several months would be sufficient.

Folsom said Friday that he would have sentenced Bacos to 10 years in prison and a dishonorable discharge but that he was bound by the plea agreement already approved by the top general that mandated one year in the brig and no discharge. The secretary of the Navy or the Marine brass, however, could move to discharge him under less than honorable circumstances.

In exchange for his guilty pleas, a murder charge that could have brought the death penalty was dismissed.

Bacos agreed to testify against the Marines, who were once his comrades in Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment.

In the original charges, Bacos faced a murder count even though he was not alleged to have fired his weapon. That charge was based on the theory that any co-conspirator is equally guilty when a murder is committed.

The Marines and Bacos were charged with leaving an AK-47 and shovel near the body to suggest that Awad was an insurgent caught burying a roadside bomb.

Bacos testified that he stole an AK-47 from an Iraqi home and fired it into the air so the Marines would have shell casings to leave beside Awad's body.

Bacos, who is married to a Navy corpsman, had been held at the brig at Camp Pendleton with the other seven defendants since being returned from Iraq in May. But once the plea bargain was reached, he was moved to the brig at Miramar Marine Corps Air Station in San Diego for his safety.

Marine Pfc. John Jodka also has been moved from the brig at Camp Pendleton, suggesting that another plea deal is underway. A gag order prevents lawyers from discussing his case.

Bacos was on his second deployment to Iraq; in his first tour, during the battle in Fallouja in late 2004, he received a Purple Heart after being wounded and a Combat Action Ribbon.

Initially, the Marines told their superiors that Awad had been killed after he was discovered planting a roadside bomb to explode beneath a U.S. military or Iraqi civilian vehicle. But the Marine Corps launched an investigation after Awad's family protested that he had been taken away without provocation and was not connected to the insurgency.

Folsom watched a 19-minute tape of Awad's relatives explaining their version of the April 26 killing before he handed down the sentence. The Iraqi's brothers described Awad as a disabled police officer and father of 11 who bore no malice toward American forces in Iraq.

On Friday, an attorney for one of the Marines asked the judge to close the hearing to the media so Bacos' comments would not be made public and possibly taint any jury pool. Folsom denied the request from attorney David Brahms, who is representing Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington.

"This is not a game," Brahms told reporters. "This is real. I have a man's life in my hands."

The Hamandiya incident is the first of two high-profile cases of alleged brutality against Iraqis by Marines from Camp Pendleton to come to court-martial.

Two dozen Marines are being investigated in a November incident in which 24 Iraqis, including women and children, were killed in the town of Haditha.

A preliminary investigation has concluded that some of the Marines should face murder charges. But Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis Jr., commanding general of Marine Forces Central Command, is still reviewing those recommendations and has not decided whether charges will be filed.

tony.perry@latimes.com

For Recruiter, Saying 'Go Army' Is A Hard Job (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

EL CAJON, Calif. — Sgt. Cameron Murad wanders the strip malls and parking lots of this Iraqi immigrant enclave in the arid foothills beyond San Diego. Wherever he goes, a hush seems to follow.

He stands by the entrance of a Middle Eastern grocery in khakis and a baseball cap, trying to blend in. He smiles gently. He offers the occasional Arabic greeting.

Quietly, he searches the aisles for a version of himself: an Iraqi expatriate with greater ambition than prospects, a Muslim immigrant willing to fight an American war.

There are countless hard jobs for American soldiers supporting the occupation of Iraq. Few seem more impossible than the one assigned to Sergeant Murad. As the conflict grows increasingly violent and unpopular, the sergeant must persuade native Arabic speakers to enlist and serve with front-line troops.

"I feel like a nomad in the middle of the desert, looking for green pastures," said Sergeant Murad, 34, who is from the Kurdish region of Iraq.

Linguists have emerged as critical figures in the occupation. They interpret for commanders in meetings with mayors and sheiks. They translate during the interrogation of Iraqi prisoners. They shadow troops on risky missions.

In the pressing search for Arabic speakers, the military has turned to Middle Eastern immigrants in the United States. Sergeant Murad is a rising star in this effort. He has recruited 10 men to the program in little more than a year, a record unrivaled in the Army National Guard.

Still, he is an unlikely foot soldier in the campaign. His own evolution — from a teenage immigrant who landed in North Dakota after the first gulf war to a spit-and-polish sergeant — has been marked with private suffering.

In boot camp, he was called a "raghead." Comrades have questioned his patriotism. Last year a staff sergeant greeted him by calling out, "Here comes the Taliban!"

He remembers a day in 2002 when the comedian Drew Carey visited a base in Saudi Arabia where he was working. During a skit, Sergeant Murad recalled, Mr. Carey dropped to the ground to mimic the Muslim prayer. As the troops roared with laughter, Sergeant Murad walked out.

"I thought about my mom when she prays, how humble she is," he said.

Yet, day after day, Sergeant Murad sets out to sell other immigrants on the life he has lived. He believes that Muslims need the military more than ever, he said: At a time when many feel alienated, it offers them a path to assimilation, a way to become undeniably American.

It has proved, for him and others, the ultimate rite of passage.

"It's almost like Superman wearing his cape," said Gunnery Sgt. Jamal Baadani, 42, an Egyptian immigrant with the United States Marine Corps. "I've got my uniform on, and you can't take that away from me because I've earned it."

Sergeant Murad has earned it, but with a price. He has changed his name. He has drifted from Islam. He often finds himself at odds with the immigrants he is trying to enlist.

To many of them, he is a mystery. He sees himself as a man of unavoidable contradictions: an American patriot and a loyal Kurd; a champion of the military to outsiders, a survivor within its ranks.

Feeling Like an Outcast

The sergeant is six feet tall, but often stands shrunken, his hands politely clasped. He has a long, distinguished nose and wears glasses that darken in the sun but never fully fade, lending him a distant aura.

He plies the streets of El Cajon in a rumbling, black Toyota Tacoma pickup. In the back, he carries stacks of fliers advertising what the Army calls the "09-Lima" program.

Through the program, speakers of Arabic, Farsi, Dari, Pashto and Kurdish are sent to boot camp like other soldiers. They later receive specialized training as linguists, and a majority are deployed to Iraq.

Of the thousands of interpreters working for the military in Iraq, most are civilians under contract, some of whom earn as much as $170,000 a year. But military commanders prefer uniformed linguists because they cannot refuse combat missions and are subjected to more thorough security checks.

They are offered a fraction of what many civilian linguists earn, with salaries starting at roughly $28,000, including allowances. The program's perks, such as expedited citizenship, a starting bonus and medical coverage, are a major draw, military officials said.

Since the Army created the program in 2003, more than 800 people have signed up. But nearly 40 percent of them have either dropped out or failed language tests or boot camp. Enlistment in the program has improved with the help of civilian Arabic speakers contracted by the Army to recruit.

In California, the Army National Guard is trying the same approach, but with troops. Capt. Hatem Abdine assembled a team of soldiers of mostly Middle Eastern descent to help recruit full time, and brought Sergeant Murad on board last year.

In April, the sergeant arrived in El Cajon. Before his first week was up, he felt like an outcast.

Stacks of fliers and business cards that he had left in grocery stores had vanished. Cashiers who welcomed him on his first visits were suddenly too busy to talk. One manager fled the store. The owner of another shop turned his back and flipped kebobs over a high-licking flame.

"They're so agitated when I approach them," Sergeant Murad said. "Is it because I'm ugly? I don't think I'm that ugly."

Nestled in a parched valley, El Cajon drew its first Iraqi settlers half a century ago because of the resemblance it bore to their homeland. The population boomed in the 1990's when thousands of refugees — primarily Kurds and Shiites — joined what had long been the domain of whites and Hispanics.

Sergeant Murad makes his rounds with a truck full of Army promotional items, including a box of T-shirts that state, in Arabic, "If you can read this" — and then in English — "the National Guard needs you." He cannot bring himself to wear one.

"To put on that shirt and keep a face free of blush — it's just an impossible thing for me to do," he said

He favors a more subdued approach. He strolls into restaurants and barber shops, as though he were just passing through. He offers a smooth, "Assalamu alaikum," or peace be upon you.

A conversation begins. Soon, Sergeant Murad is reminiscing about his hometown, Kirkuk. Then, almost as an afterthought, he mentions his job. "Call if you know anyone," he says, offering a card.

But the calls rarely come. When they do, recruitment is hard won. In the fall of 2005, Sergeant Murad signed up his first two recruits. Over the next 12 months, he found about 20 other men. Half of them changed their minds.

Most often, recruits do not follow through because of objections from a parent or spouse. Others learn of more lucrative opportunities. Store windows in El Cajon are plastered with fliers advertising the six-figure salaries offered to civilian interpreters.

Some of the sergeant's candidates are overcome by fear. A 33-year-old Egyptian man from Hemet, Calif., withdrew from the program in June after watching news from the region on Arabic television channels.

"I know what's happening over there," said the man, who would not give his name. "My kids need me more than the money."

From late 2002 to May 2006, 172 civilian contract linguists were killed in Afghanistan and Iraq, representing 2.6 percent of the roughly 6,500 linguists who worked for United States coalition forces, a Department of Defense official said.

None of the 152 interpreters who have served in Iraq for the 09-Lima program have been killed. But that fact carries little weight in El Cajon, where memories of violence linger.

"They came here to live in peace and now you're asking them to go to war," said the owner of a bakery on Main Street who had fought against Iran with Saddam Hussein's army. "We are full up of the war."

In the pursuit of trust, it does not help that Sergeant Murad is Kurdish. The Kurds, like the Shiites, are often seen to have an interest in promoting the American occupation of Iraq because of the repression they suffered under Mr. Hussein.

The sergeant, who refers to the occupation as "the liberation," does not hide his impassioned support of the war, or the fact that he is Kurdish.

Sometimes, this backfires. When he told an Iraqi woman at a Laundromat that he was Kurdish, she snapped, "Saddam was a wonderful president."

One afternoon last April, Sergeant Murad dropped by the Main Street bakery, bought a box of chocolates and left another stack of pamphlets behind. He was sure they would be tossed, but seemed not to care. He was feeling giddy.

For the first time in weeks, he had a candidate.

The Sting of 9/11

Sergeant Murad's path to the United States military began 15 years ago, on a lush meadow in Kurdistan.

American helicopters hovered overhead, dropping packets of dehydrated food to thousands of refugees, including Sergeant Murad, his three brothers and their parents.

The next day, they reached a refugee camp run by the United States military in Zakho. There, a group of marines was standing guard, hefty, tattooed and smiling. Sergeant Murad, then 18 and rail-thin, thought the men looked like warriors.

Soon after, in September 1991, the family arrived in Minot, N.D., as political refugees. A year later, Sergeant Murad got his green card and enlisted in the Army.

"If a person like me isn't obligated to serve this country, who is?" he said. "I had to make a decision that this is my country, that this side is my side."

He entered the military as Kamaran Taha Muhammad. When he got to boot camp at Fort Jackson, S.C., he spoke choppy English.

He was, and remains, a shy man. "If a fly looks at me, I turn red," Sergeant Murad said.

But the first time a fellow soldier insulted him, he threw a punch. He fought often enough that he was relegated to kitchen patrol.

DOJ_NMG_0078589

In time, Sergeant Murad made friends. When he graduated as a light-wheel mechanic, his fellow soldiers cheered.

The first few years of his military life went smoothly. He was stationed at a base in Germany. After his tour of duty ended, he found work as the head civilian linguist at an Air Force base in Riyadh.

But on Sept. 11, 2001, as Sergeant Murad watched the attacks on television in Riyadh, he felt a searing angst. The next day, he walked into the dining hall holding a tray, and stopped at a table of officers he knew.

He told them he was sorry. No one responded.

"He didn't know where he fit in," said Fernando Muzquiz, 42, now a retired master sergeant with the Air Force.

Sergeant Murad experienced a shift after Sept. 11, both in his relationship to Islam and to America. It was as if a fault line crept through him.

As a Muslim, he felt ashamed.

"I was crushed theologically," he said. He pored through the Koran, looking for proof that it condemned terrorism. But from the loud speakers of mosques in Riyadh, he heard sheiks praying for the mujahedeen.

From Americans, he felt the sting of suspicion.

On trips home to Minnesota, where his parents had moved, Sergeant Murad noticed the new attention he got at airports. In Atlanta, a security officer saw his last name, which was still Muhammad, and called out, "We got one."

Sergeant Murad wanted to prove his loyalty. He got his chance when the United States invaded Iraq.

By then, he was working in Bahrain as a civilian linguist with the Naval Criminal Investigative Service. (He had lost his job in Riyadh after taking an unauthorized trip off base, which he attributed to a lapse of judgment.)

In Bahrain, he was elated to learn that he would be sent to southern Iraq on a top-secret mission with the Navy Seals. But several days into the voyage, he heard a sailor on his ship whisper, "Cam is one of them."

Sergeant Murad stopped working for the Navy in March, with his mission in Iraq successfully completed.

That month, he changed his name.

"In a way, it was my reaction to say, 'No, I am not the same as this criminal, this coward,' " said Sergeant Murad, referring to Osama bin Laden. "I am an American, I am Cam, I am a naturalized citizen."

Kamaran became Cameron. Muhammad was dropped for another, less conspicuous family name, Murad.

The middle name he chose was perhaps most surprising: Fargo.

"I always wanted a connection to North Dakota," he said.

Even with a new name, Sergeant Murad felt ill at ease back in the United States. He has stopped going to mosques. He no longer considers himself a practicing Muslim. He has few Middle Eastern friends.

"If somebody's name is on a list, and that person has my name or contact number, I will get harassed," he said.

The Army, he decided, was the most comfortable place to be. In 2005, he joined the National Guard full time.

He is careful to tell potential recruits about the military's zero tolerance policy on discrimination, and urges them to file complaints should harassment occur.

Still, Sergeant Murad has never filed a complaint of his own. During several interviews, he was reluctant to talk about his negative experiences, saying that he did not want to "whine" and that all immigrants endure hardship before they are accepted.

Last year, when an instructor at an Army base referred to Sergeant Murad as "the Taliban," he laughed along.

"I laughed not to cause trouble," he said. "I laughed because I am really getting tired of this. I laughed because I know it's a hopeless situation. What do you do? You just have to laugh."

"It doesn't matter what you think of me," he said. "Like it or not, I'm your brother in arms."

Closing the Deal

The new candidate's name was Khaled. Sergeant Murad jotted down his number, passed on by the captain. The Iraqi immigrant had called after spotting a brochure about the program, the captain explained. And there was one more thing: the man was on the fence.

Sergeant Murad's job is often one of delicate persuasion. He began by talking to Khaled, who lived near El Cajon, on the phone. (To protect his identity, the military requested that his last name not be published.)

By the time they agreed to meet, Sergeant Murad felt uneasy. Not only was Khaled a Sunni; he was from Mr. Hussein's home province.

A stout man with a mustache answered the door. He seemed overweight for the rigors of boot camp, thought the sergeant, and his age — 39 — was just short of the cutoff.

They stiffly shook hands, and then sat and sipped tea in a tidy, candle-scented apartment. A framed picture showed Khaled, his wife and three children waving from Disney World. Since arriving in the United States in 1999, Khaled had hopped from one low-wage job to another, pumping gas, stocking groceries.

Now, he told Sergeant Murad, he had made up his mind. He needed the educational loans the military offered.

DOJ_NMG_0078590

Still, he was nervous.

“I’m expecting a shock,” said Khaled. “I’ve been hearing good things, bad things.”

As he does with all recruits, Sergeant Murad warned Khaled that he might be hazed at boot camp, and distrusted by other soldiers. But over time, the sergeant promised, he would make friends.

The two men sat talking until the afternoon turned to dusk. The sergeant gave Khaled tips on how to lose weight, and promised to help prepare him for the English tests. Before parting, they embraced.

As Sergeant Murad drove off, he smiled and shook his head. “This is an Arab from the Sunni Triangle trusting a Kurd with his life,” he said.

Khaled entered boot camp in July and is now in advanced training.

Often, finding recruits is only the beginning of Sergeant Murad’s job. He spends time with their families after they have joined up, reassuring mothers that their sons will eat properly, and helping wives fill out insurance forms.

Last April, Sergeant Murad drove to a boxy stucco house to visit the pregnant wife of a 22-year-old Shiite recruit. The woman was worried about her husband’s safety in Iraq.

“The fact that he’s an Iraqi — it’s unfathomable to these nationals that he would be with the United States military,” she said in Arabic, perched on a couch next to her mother-in-law.

“He is Muslim and in the military — it doesn’t look right.”

The older woman frowned.

“If it were up to me, I would make you join the military because they freed you from Saddam,” she told her daughter-in-law.

Boot camp had been effective, the mother said. Her son seemed newly disciplined, more mature. There was only one thing she disliked: his limited vacation.

“Just two weeks!” she said. “Even in the army of Saddam Hussein, this wasn’t the case.”

On a sunny afternoon in August, Sergeant Murad was back in his truck, cruising El Cajon with a fresh stack of business cards.

He was learning to avoid certain shops. He waved mockingly at the kebab store as his truck rolled by, no longer concerned about who might be watching.

He had come to the conclusion that first impressions counted little.

Plenty of Iraqis had misjudged him. Eventually, though, they grew to like him.

It was the same with soldiers, Sergeant Murad said. He looked back on his time in boot camp as the ultimate proof that hardship can be overcome, and wary comrades, won over.

“In the end, when somebody gets to know Cam the soldier, Cam the citizen, they always take my side,” he said. “That’s where my triumph is. The hurt goes away.”

Picking Up The Pieces Of Slain Troops' Lives (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

ABERDEEN PROVING GROUND, Md. -- Spread across several tables in a vast warehouse here are the pieces of one soldier's life.

There is the photo album with images of graduations and family gatherings, tanks and smiling military buddies. There are piles of brown T-shirts and socks, a jumble of sneakers and boots, a plastic bag filled with handwritten letters. A knife. A stack of video games.

Nearby, surrounded by walls of metal mesh, are rows of dusty black footlockers that have just returned from war. Inside each are the artifacts of other lives cut short.

This is the Joint Personal Effects Depot, a pair of warehouses on this base northeast of Baltimore that serve as the military's main repository for the possessions of U.S. troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan. Within days of troops' deaths in action, their clothes, pictures and books and everything else that defined their lives on the battlefield wind up here.

It is then the job of 138 people to inventory, photograph, clean and pack all of the items so they can be sent home to grieving families, the last remnants of the ones they loved.

There are ghosts here, whispers of these people who sacrificed their lives to serve their country. In a recent tour of the facility, the names and identifying information of the dead were concealed to protect their families, but the presence of the dead was still strong.

"There's a lot of each individual in those lockers," said Lt. Col. L. Scott Kilmon Jr., who commands the depot. Working with the materials day after day can be an emotional strain, he said. "It takes a toll on you."

DOJ_NMG_0078591

The workload has gotten steadily heavier over the past few years, as nearly 3,000 U.S. troops have died in the Middle East and thousands more have been injured. The seriously wounded who are evacuated from the fighting also have their things shipped to Aberdeen now. Kilmon said the depot is bracing for the fall and winter, when there have been higher levels of U.S. casualties in Iraq.

And because the fighting seems likely to continue, the Defense Department is working to establish the depot as a more permanent operation. Kilmon said there are plans underway to move the temporary, wartime facility to Dover Air Force Base by 2009, which would put it at the same facility where the troops' remains are processed. Now, the items are flown to Dover and are loaded on semitrailers for the 90-minute drive to this makeshift operation in Maryland, where the effects are organized.

The warehouse feels a bit like a morgue. The rows of mesh cages are chilly, and somber employees meticulously sift through the items.

"Five brown T-shirts," called out Pfc. Alisha Ricketts, sitting in one cage cataloguing the contents of eight footlockers that belonged to a noncommissioned officer recently killed in Baghdad. "One white washcloth."

A photograph of two young children peeked out of a plastic bag in front of Ricketts. Spec. Tyrone Wheatley placed woodworking magazines into a footlocker and glanced at a clipboard. Dirty socks, Fruit of the Loom underwear, shirts and shorts were streaked with desert dust and grime, the pile giving off the scent of the soldier's sweat, fresh from the Iraqi summer heat. A little bit of Baghdad.

In most cases, after all the items are inventoried, workers wash the clothes, scrub the boots and clean all equipment with compressed air, said Maj. Leslie Rafferty, the depot's operations officer. Washers and dryers hum constantly. Compact discs are wiped of dust. Camera film is developed.

"We slowly but surely lay out their life," Rafferty said.

Some families, she said, send notice that they do not want the clothes washed, so they can smell their loved one when the items are returned. All government-issued items are logged and returned to circulation, so the sleeping bags and compasses are later issued to others who might be deployed.

Marvin Scott, 63, looked up as he tied the laces of a soldier's left Asics sneaker, tucking the bow behind its tongue.

"You're seeing the pictures of their families, their wives, their children, and you know they have a lot of hurt," Scott said. "It can be very emotional. Not everyone can work here."

Scott, a civilian contractor who puts the finishing touches on items that are to be sent home, folds creases into T-shirts and creates careful stacks of DVDs. It can be heartbreaking, he said, but he wants each family to see that someone has taken the time to neatly pack the reminders away for them. And he has seen a lot of those reminders up close.

"You can read a lot about a person by what they had with them," Scott said. "You can tell how they dressed, you can tell what they listened to, what they watched and what they read. Sometimes you can really see them."

This soldier, the one Scott was getting to know on a recent day, was devoted to video games and anime . A PlayStation 2 sat in a plastic bag, a large television tipped on its back in a footlocker. Games like "Ape Escape: On the Loose" lay next to such DVDs as "The Matrix," "Eraser" and "South Park," a veritable catalogue of young-American-male pop culture.

In a separate bag with a set of the soldier's dog tags was a solitary black plastic comb, its tines bent and color slightly faded from countless runs through the man's hair.

Nearby, on a set of tables where a new footlocker was just unlocked and opened, Pfc. James Childress ran a gloved hand over a pile of books, traces of dirt slipping from the worn pages. Stephen King's "Desperation" sat next to a yellowed copy of "You've Come a Long Way, Charlie Brown." Farther down the table was a pair of flip-flops, an impression of feet in the foam.

All documents, letters, data drives and photographs are carefully examined in a secret environment to make sure that nothing classified returns home, and also to make sure that nothing untoward is left for parents, spouses and children. Pornography, for example, is removed. "Human beings are human beings," Rafferty said.

Kilmon said depot employees have found wills and messages to family members on computer drives, including an audiotape one soldier made for his child, who was not yet born when he recorded the message. Sometimes workers have to walk off the line to gather their emotions.

Big-screen televisions have become more common, and employees said they see a lot of guitars, too. An acoustic guitar waited on a table to be packed last week. The most unusual item: a motorcycle.

Though clothes with blood or tissue on them are supposed to go with the bodies for transfer to medical examiners, they appear at the depot from time to time. A large cardboard box sits on a loading dock, labeled "medical examiner." Under the lid are dozens of translucent red biohazard bags filled with camouflage clothes, some bloodstained. Sometimes there are bits of human remains.

DOJ_NMG_0078592

The officers here know that when there are mass casualties in Iraq or Afghanistan, their operation is going to be busy about three weeks later; there is an average of 22 days between a death in the field and the arrival of personal items at the depot. Another 11 days or so later, the items are shipped by FedEx to families around the country.

"In my first days here, I was just in awe," Childress said, standing back for a moment to survey one soldier's belongings. "These are all real people. We know we're the final link between them and their families."

DOJ:

Sharon Potter Sworn In As Local U.S. Attorney (WHI)

By MICHELLE BLUM

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, October 7, 2006

WHEELING — Sharon Potter was sworn in Friday as the new U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia, but a formal ceremony will be held at a later date, according to information provided by Potter's office.

Potter succeeds Thomas Johnston, who was sworn in as U.S. District Judge for the Southern District of West Virginia in April.

Potter was sworn in by U.S District Judge Irene M. Keeley in Clarksburg. Details of the formal event have not yet been released.

Potter has served as assistant U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia since September 1992, according to information provided by Potter's office.

Assigned to the U.S. Attorney's office in Wheeling, Potter has handled a variety of criminal prosecutions ranging from fraud and tax evasion to drug trafficking and computer-related crime.

Potter has also been involved in criminal and civil property forfeiture cases, generating resources for state and local law enforcement agencies. She has also obtained funds for victims of fraud through restitution in a variety of cases.

Working with the FBI, Potter assisted in forming a district-wide computer crime task force and has been involved in initiatives with federal agencies designed to foster the networking and sharing of knowledge and resources between academia, industry and law enforcement to better identify and prosecute computer crimes.

In 1997, Potter received the Department of Justice Director's Award for Superior Performance following her prosecution of a nationwide securities fraud/money laundering case, which involved about 15,000 victims and netted more than $2.3 million in forfeitures.

In addition, Potter worked closely with the Internal Revenue Service Criminal Investigation Division investigating and prosecuting tax-related cases involving income and employment tax evasion, abusive tax shelters and other financial fraud matters.

She also worked with the Three Rivers Drug Task Force in Fairmont, prosecuting federal drug trafficking offenses.

A graduate of Vanderbilt University and California Western School of Law, Potter began her legal career with the West Virginia Public Service Commission in 1985. From 1987-89, Potter worked as an assistant district attorney in Centre County, Pa. From 1990-92, Potter was an associate with the law firm of Martin & Seibert in Martinsburg and was an assistant prosecutor in Berkley County, W.Va.

Potter resides in Wheeling with her husband and three children.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Farmer Mac Plans To Restate Results From Three Years (WP/BLOOM)

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Farmer Mac, the government-chartered buyer of U.S. farm loans, said it would restate its financial results for 2003, 2004 and 2005 to correct how it accounted for some derivatives transactions.

The changes won't "have any significant" effect on capital, the company said yesterday. Farmer Mac didn't provide an estimate of the size of the restatement. The company reported combined profit of $87.3 million for 2003, 2004 and 2005.

The accounting rule involved in Farmer Mac's restatement is the same one that caused mortgage finance companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and some of the Federal Home Loan banks to restate their results in recent years. The rule requires companies to determine the market value of derivatives and account for them on their balance sheets.

DOJ_NMG_0078593

Derivatives are financial instruments derived from stocks, bonds, loans, currencies and commodities, or linked to specific events, such as changes in interest rates or the weather.

There are exceptions, but after reviewing its books, Farmer Mac determined that "fluctuations in the fair value of its derivatives will be reflected in the statements of operations rather than being deferred or offset," the company said.

Shares of Farmer Mac fell 35 cents, to $25.33.

Farmer Mac made no personnel changes related to the restatement, company spokeswoman Andrea Calise said. She declined to say when Farmer Mac began its accounting review.

Accounting errors at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and quarterly losses at some Federal Home Loan banks are fueling a push in Congress to change how government-chartered finance companies are regulated.

Suit Over Sale Of MySpace Dismissed (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 7, 2006

News Corp., the buyer, says it feels 'vindicated'

News Corp., Rupert Murdoch's media company, said a judge dismissed a lawsuit challenging its purchase of MySpace.com, rejecting claims by Brad Greenspan, former chief executive officer of the Web site's parent, that the deal cheated shareholders.

Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Carolyn Kuhl ruled Friday that the acquisition of Intermix Media Inc., MySpace's parent company, last year was lawful and shareholders were fully informed when they voted on the transaction, New York-based News Corp. said Monday.

The decision lifts a cloud over the popular networking site, which Greenspan says he started in August 2003.

He sued MySpace in February, saying the $580 million paid by News Corp.'s Fox unit didn't reflect the growth prospects.

Thursday, he demanded a federal investigation into the sale, claiming the deal defrauded shareholders of more than $20 billion.

News Corp. and Fox Interactive "feel vindicated" by the ruling, Mike Angus, general counsel of News Corp.'s Fox Interactive Media, said.

Greenspan last week posted his claims in a report at Freemyspace.com, a Web site where he argued the purchase should be nullified.

He said he was seeking an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and the Senate.

MySpace would be worth billions of dollars had it stayed on its own and sold shares to the public, Greenspan said, an assertion challenged by analysts.

News Corp. snatched MySpace during a weekend in July 2005 after Viacom Inc. offered $500 million for the business. MySpace has more than doubled its registered users this year, to more than 110 million.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rove Aide Linked To Abramoff Resigns (WP)

By Peter Baker And James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

A top aide to White House strategist Karl Rove resigned yesterday after disclosures that she accepted gifts from and passed information to now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, becoming the first official in the West Wing to lose a job in the influence-peddling scandal.

Susan B. Ralston submitted her resignation to avoid causing political damage to President Bush a month before the midterm elections, officials said. "She did not want to be a distraction to the White House at this important time," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

A congressional report showed last week that Ralston accepted sometimes-pricey tickets to nine sports and entertainment events from Abramoff while she provided him with inside White House information. The bipartisan report said there is no evidence that Rove knew of or approved of Ralston's actions, and sources said yesterday that the White House was surprised by the report's revelations.

The White House counsel's office conducted a review of the report, but with Ralston's departure it closed its inquiry yesterday. "Nothing more will come from the report, no further fallout from the report," Perino said.

DOJ_NMG_0078594

A senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the counsel's office reached no conclusion about whether Ralston violated gift limits because her resignation made the point moot. But the official said there were "mitigating circumstances" in her case because she had a preexisting relationship with Abramoff, for whom she worked before joining the White House. The official said the White House made no criminal referral in her case. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment.

The sprawling Abramoff investigations have triggered prosecutions on Capitol Hill and on K Street, but Ralston's resignation brought the scandal into the White House proper. The only other White House official caught up in the probe has been David H. Safavian, the procurement chief for the Office of Management and Budget, who was convicted in June of lying about his ties to Abramoff.

As right hand to the president's most important adviser, Ralston was closer to the center of the Bush operation. She was a key organizer of presidential events, coordinating with White House political, scheduling, advance and public liaison offices. "She will be missed because she solves problems, and finding people in government who solve problems" is rare, a colleague said.

Ralston, who earned $122,000 a year, had been a minor player in the scandal for more than a year, but it was not until her e-mails with the lobbyist were released by the House Government Reform Committee last week that her role became known.

The information supplied by Ralston to Abramoff often involved procedural matters, social events and possible administration appointments, the committee said.

Rules ban White House officials from accepting gifts worth more than $20 from anyone doing business with the government. Exceptions can be made for preexisting relationships, although ethics officers generally advise officials to avoid anything that might be misinterpreted.

Rove has been out of town all week and declined to comment yesterday. A colleague said that neither Rove nor anyone else at the White House pushed Ralston to leave. Ralston did not respond to telephone or e-mail messages yesterday, and her attorney, Bradford A. Berenson, declined to comment.

In a letter to the president dated Thursday, Ralston wrote: "It has been a tremendous privilege to work at the White House and now after almost six years the time has come for me to pursue other opportunities." The White House did not announce the resignation until Friday afternoon, timing that is often used to minimize bad news.

"She leaves without any animosity from us," said White House counselor Dan Bartlett. "She's been a tireless worker for the president, and we will be sad to see her leave."

As a former Abramoff assistant, Ralston played intermediary between the lobbyist and Rove. The congressional report found 66 Abramoff contacts with the White House, more than half of them with Ralston. In addition, Abramoff's lobbying colleagues contacted Ralston 69 times.

On Oct. 21, 2001, Ralston e-mailed Abramoff that Rove had read an Abramoff memo about a political endorsement in the Mariana Islands governor's race, a little-noticed election but one important to Abramoff because he had lucrative clients there. Ralston reported to Abramoff that Rove had agreed, writing the next day: "You win :)."

More often, Abramoff fell short at the White House. Abramoff contacted Ralston to get Rove to place a close ally, Mark Zachares, as head of the Interior Department's Office of Insular Affairs. Ralston rebuffed a meeting with Rove for Zachares, saying it was unnecessary because Rove was on their side. But Zachares did not get the position.

In November and December 2003, Abramoff e-mailed Ralston about Iraqi bonds apparently issued by one of his clients, American Bondholders Foundation, the House committee said. In response, Ralston indicated that the National Security Council had not "gotten back to me yet." Six days later, she had an answer. "The NSC is very suspect of this proposal," she wrote. "The White House will not support it."

Ralston helped Rove get tickets from Abramoff for a game in the NCAA basketball tournament but told Abramoff that "Karl has to pay for his tickets." The White House said last week that Rove paid for his tickets. But Ralston apparently did not pay for tickets she accepted to Bruce Springsteen and Andrea Bocelli concerts and Washington Capitals, Washington Wizards and Baltimore Orioles games.

"Are floor seats available," Ralston asked in December 2001 for four Wizards tickets worth a combined $1,300, the report said.

"For you? Anything!" Abramoff replied. "How many do you need?"

Ralston: "4"

"You got 'em," Abramoff said. "I'll organize."

Aide Who Linked Abramoff And Rove Resigns At White House (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — Susan B. Ralston, a former aide to the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff who went on to work for the presidential adviser Karl Rove, has resigned from the White House after a report that she was a conduit between the two men.

Ms. Ralston submitted her resignation to President Bush on Thursday night, saying the time had come "to pursue other opportunities."

Administration officials acknowledged, however, that she quit as a result of a Congressional report, released last week, that documented hundreds of contacts between Mr. Abramoff and the White House.

"A protracted discussion of the report was not in anyone's best interest, and when she chose to step down, we supported her decision," a White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said.

According to the report, Ms. Ralston was repeatedly lobbied by Mr. Abramoff after she became a top aide to Mr. Rove, as her former boss sought to curry favor with her new one. Once a high-rolling operator who lavished gifts on lawmakers and officials — in exchange, he hoped, for help with his clients — Mr. Abramoff has become, in the midterm elections, synonymous with corruption.

For more than a year, Ms. Ralston was entangled in two Washington scandals at once. A nexus between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Rove, she was also pivotal in the C.I.A. leak case. It was Ms. Ralston who patched through a telephone call from a Time magazine reporter to Mr. Rove, a conversation that cast a suspicion on the White House strategist. Ms. Ralston testified to a grand jury on the leak and was interviewed by prosecutors in the Abramoff case.

Ms. Ralston was never accused of wrongdoing. The Congressional report suggested she merely passed on messages from Mr. Abramoff to Mr. Rove, who sought basketball tickets from the lobbyist and ate at his restaurant (where, White House officials said, Mr. Rove paid for his own meals).

On Friday, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, which issued the report, accused White House officials of "trying to make Susan Ralston the scapegoat."

"There is a lot that we don't yet know about the assistance that Ms. Ralston provided Mr. Abramoff from inside the White House," Mr. Waxman said in a statement. "But there are also many unanswered questions about the assistance that higher-ranking White House officials appeared to provide Mr. Abramoff."

Ms. Ralston was promoted after the 2004 election, receiving the title special assistant to the president and a raise to $122,000, from $64,700.

White House Aide Ralston Quits After Abramoff Report (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, October 7, 2006

Oct. 6 (Bloomberg) -- A top aide to White House political director Karl Rove has resigned after a U.S. House report examined her ties to disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The aide, Susan Ralston, is quitting a week after a House Government Reform panel described her role in arranging tickets to sporting events from the lobbyist to Rove.

``She recognized that a protracted discussion of the matters in the House Government Reform Committee's report would be a distraction to the White House, and she chose to step down," assistant White House Press Secretary Dana Perino said. ``We support her decision, and after a review of the report, we consider the matter closed."

The report showed that Abramoff claimed at least 485 contacts with administration officials between 2001 and 2004, including nine with Rove. Based on billing records from Abramoff's former law firm, the report said he claimed 17 meetings, seven telephone conversations and 42 e-mail exchanges with White House officials -- more than half with Ralston, who also is a former colleague of Abramoff's.

The report cited several instances in which Ralston helped Abramoff get access to White House officials, passed documents to Rove and kept Abramoff informed about political appointees he was pushing for jobs.

Iraqi Bonds

In November 2003, Ralston told Abramoff about the position the National Security Council was taking on Iraqi bonds, which was of interest to one of Abramoff's clients, the American Bondholders Foundation, according to the report.

Abramoff and Ralston also discussed the possibility of Ralston taking a job with a defense company, the report said.

Ralston may have received tickets for nine sporting events and concerts, including four tickets to an Aug. 10, 2002, Bruce Springsteen concert, the report said. In all, the tickets offered to Ralston were worth $1,300, it said.

``In most cases, the documents do not indicate whether the White House officials paid or offered to pay for the tickets," the report said. Ralston requested tickets for herself on at least seven occasions, the report said. In one instance, Abramoff e-mailed Ralston about hockey tickets: ``No problem, you don't have to pay!"

Other Opportunities

In her resignation letter to President George W. Bush yesterday, Ralston said ``the time has come for me to pursue other opportunities."

The report showed that Abramoff routinely offered concert and sports tickets to White House officials, and that in 2002 Ralston was also the go-between on tickets to the NCAA basketball tournament for Rove, tickets Rove said he paid for.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Jan. 3 to conspiracy to corrupt public officials and is cooperating with a federal probe.

The Abramoff case has already led to the conviction of former White House official David Safavian and an agreement to plead guilty to accepting illegal gifts by Representative Robert Ney, an Ohio Republican.

Abramoff also was sentenced in March to five years and 10 months in prison in a separate Florida fraud case.

In her capacity as Rove's assistant, Ralston also testified before a federal grand jury investigating whether administration officials purposely leaked the identity of CIA agent Valerie Plame; neither Rove nor Ralston was charged with wrongdoing in that matter.

White House Aide To Rove Resigns (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 7, 2006

The latest casualty in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal was a key aide to presidential political strategist Karl Rove who once worked for the disgraced influence-peddler.

Susan Ralston stepped down Friday from her post as a special assistant to President Bush. A congressional report showed she had extensive contacts with Abramoff and had accepted tickets to sporting events and concerts from him.

Corruption and scandal are major issues going into the Nov. 7 elections. Ralston's resignation followed accusations that her contacts with Abramoff showed he was closer to Rove and Bush than the White House has been willing to acknowledge.

"She recognized that a protracted discussion of these matters would be a distraction to the White House and she's chosen to step down," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said.

A recent House Government Reform Committee report listed hundreds of contacts that Abramoff's lobbying group had with the White House. Ralston had been administrative assistant to Abramoff and, after Bush took office, assumed the same post with Rove.

Ralston played an instrumental role in organizing and choosing presidential event sites.

Rep. Henry Waxman of California, the top Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, said he suspects the White House is trying to make Ralston a scapegoat.

"There is a lot that we don't yet know about the assistance that Ms. Ralston provided Mr. Abramoff from inside the White House, but there are also many unanswered questions about the assistance that higher-ranking White House officials appeared to provide Mr. Abramoff," Waxman said.

"The vast majority of lobbying contacts and meals with White House officials documented in the report were with White House officials other than Ms. Ralston," Waxman said.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to fraud and is now cooperating with prosecutors in an influence-peddling investigation that has enveloped Capitol Hill even as lawmakers, facing elections, struggle with the fallout from a scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to teenage male pages.

The latest Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that about half of likely voters consider corruption and scandal in Congress very or extremely important, and about two in three of those said they would vote for Democrats in House races.

The committee's report — based largely on Abramoff's billing records and e-mails — listed 485 lobbying contacts with White House officials over three years, including 10 with Rove. The report indicated that Abramoff and associates lobbied on behalf of more than 20 individuals for administration jobs but were successful only once.

According to e-mails, Abramoff and his team offered White House officials tickets to 19 sporting events and concerts. Ralston was the most frequent recipient. The report did not make clear whether Ralston or other White House officials paid for any of the tickets.

The federal gratuities statute makes it a crime to give anything of value to a public official for any official act performed by that official. Ethics rules prohibit federal employees from accepting gifts unless given because of personal friendship.

Top Rove Aide Resigns In Lobby Scandal (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Susan Ralston quits after a panel shows her as a link between Jack Abramoff and officials.

DOJ_NMG_0078597

WASHINGTON — The top aide to White House strategist Karl Rove quit Friday, a week after congressional investigators portrayed her as a key link between senior officials and the now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff — brokering deals for his clients as she accepted premium tickets to sporting events and concerts.

Susan Ralston had worked as Rove's executive assistant, functioning as a gatekeeper of sorts for President Bush's most trusted political advisor. She was an aide to Abramoff before she joined the White House and became what the lobbyist called his "implant" there.

As Rove's top staffer and a special assistant to the president, Ralston becomes the closest aide to Bush to leave in a scandal that has so far enveloped lobbyists, lawmakers, Capitol Hill aides and an administration procurement official while, until now, sparing the inner sanctum of the White House.

Her departure comes as Republican leaders on Capitol Hill combat allegations that they did not adequately respond to inappropriate behavior toward House pages by Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.). It is the latest GOP setback in a midterm election year increasingly defined by scandal. Republicans are hoping to retain majorities in the House and Senate for the final two years of Bush's presidency.

Ralston "did not want to be a distraction to the White House at this important time," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, adding that Ralston "played a very valuable role in advancing the president's agenda." Perino said Ralston would leave within the next couple of weeks.

The report issued last week by the House Governmental Reform Committee quoted e-mails from Ralston in which, among other things, she helped lobby Rove about political endorsements in tiny U.S. protectorates represented by Abramoff and arranged for Rove to sit as Abramoff's guest in a private box for first-round games in the NCAA basketball tournament.

The bipartisan investigation documented more than 400 lobbying contacts between Abramoff's team and the White House between January 2001 and March 2004, including dozens with Rove's office and nine with the top strategist himself. The report was based on thousands of pages of billing records and e-mails obtained from Abramoff's firm.

The committee did not subpoena information from the White House, making it difficult to conclude in many cases whether Abramoff's requests were granted and whether the lobbyist, as White House officials have argued, was exaggerating his influence.

The report suggests Ralston accepted premium tickets to nine events, including professional basketball, hockey and baseball games as well as a performance by Italian tenor Andrea Bocelli for which ticket prices, according to a newspaper account at the time, ranged from $88 to $333.

Ethics rules forbid officials from taking gifts worth more than $20 from people doing business with the government, but the committee investigation did not determine whether Ralston and other officials paid for tickets in every case or listed them on disclosure forms. E-mails suggested Rove paid $50 apiece for NCAA basketball tickets.

Perino said Friday that the White House review of the 91-page report was "complete" and that "we expect nothing further to come of the report" beyond Ralston's departure.

Democrats were not satisfied, charging that the White House was making Ralston a "scapegoat" to avoid answering more serious questions. The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of Los Angeles, issued a statement Friday noting that Ralston's 69 contacts with Abramoff and his team reflected less than 15% of all of the contacts with White House officials, and saying that the actions of senior aides such as former political director Ken Mehlman deserved more scrutiny.

Last week's report included e-mails suggesting that Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, was offered tickets to a rock concert and helped an Indian tribe represented by Abramoff secure $16 million for a jail despite resistance from Justice Department officials.

"The vast majority of lobbying contacts and meals with White House officials documented in the report were with White House officials other than Ms. Ralston," Waxman said. "It is ludicrous for the White House to say it considers the review of the committee report 'complete' when it has not provided answers to any of the most important questions involving Mr. Mehlman and other senior White House officials."

In an interview Friday, Mehlman said he did not recall any specifics from his dealings with the Abramoff team.

"I can tell you that as political director I was always very careful to make sure everything I did was above board and consistent with the rules," he said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to federal charges as part of an ongoing congressional bribery investigation that continues to loom over Capitol Hill and the GOP. A Senate subcommittee concluded that Abramoff fleeced Indian tribes out of millions of dollars in fees that he split with one of his associates.

One associate, Tony Rudy, a onetime aide to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), has pleaded guilty to conspiracy. He admitted accepting favors, cash and other gifts while working for DeLay and after leaving to become a lobbyist.

According to the House report, Ralston often helped coordinate dealings between the Abramoff team and her bosses.

In October 2001, when Abramoff asked through a series of memos and e-mails that the White House withhold an endorsement from a candidate in the tiny Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, Ralston finally responded: "You win :). KR said no endorsement."

Another set of e-mails suggested Ralston could be interested in parlaying her relationships with Abramoff and the White House into a lucrative business deal, perhaps creating a defense or homeland security firm, but only for the right price.

"It would take a significant amount of money for me to be lured away [from the White House] so unless you're really serious and can make it worth my while, let's wait until 2005," she wrote to Abramoff in November 2002.

Replied Abramoff: "I am not in a position to offer you serious money for this right now."

peter.wallsten@latimes.com

Secret Papers Could Halt CIA Case (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff intends to load up his criminal trial with information about nine national security matters, the names of foreign leaders and details about various terrorist groups, according to court filings in the Valerie Plame leak case.

The papers filed this week hint at what has been taking place behind closed doors as Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald tries to limit the amount of classified data that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is permitted to use at his trial, scheduled for January.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton is asking whether classified evidence would overlap with what Libby is likely to say in his testimony. Libby's attorneys have said he will take the witness stand to deny lying to the FBI in its investigation of the disclosure of Plame's identity to the media.

Even if prosecutors agreed ahead of time about the importance of the "nine national security matters" he wants to disclose, Libby would be entitled to introduce additional evidence, the lawyers wrote.

In court documents, prosecutors argued that it would be "unnecessarily wasteful of time" to allow Libby to present "names of foreign leaders or government officials of other countries, or the names and histories of various terrorist groups."

The danger for prosecutors is that the sheer volume and sensitivity of the classified information Libby wants to introduce could scuttle the trial. Once the judge identifies classified information Libby is entitled to present, U.S. intelligence agencies must rule on whether the secrets can be declassified. The trial would collapse if the intelligence agencies refuse to declassify the information.

Libby is charged with five felony counts of perjury, obstruction and making false statements to the FBI. He is accused of lying about how he learned of Plame's CIA employment and what he told reporters about her when her husband, former U.S. ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, was accusing the Bush administration of twisting prewar intelligence to help sell the public on waging war against Iraq.

Libby plans to use what his attorneys call "a memory defense" and must be allowed to demonstrate how busy he was, the lawyers say.

Report On Possible Abuses By Former Member Of Intelligence Panel Is Held Up (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — A report on whether a convicted former member of the House Intelligence Committee abused his position has remained under wraps for nearly four months, largely because of a battle between the committee's leaders over issuing a subpoena in the matter, members of Congress say.

Representative Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the committee, complained about the delay in a letter sent Thursday to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan. Ms. Harman protested what she said had been Mr. Hoekstra's refusal to subpoena the former lawmaker, Randy Cunningham, a California Republican.

Mr. Cunningham resigned from Congress in November and is serving an eight-year sentence in federal prison for accepting more than $2 million from supporters and military contractors in return for helping them obtain government business.

Mr. Cunningham's guilty plea centered mainly on his actions as a member of the House Appropriations Committee. He was also a member of the intelligence panel, and its investigation examined whether he tried to improperly influence decisions on classified spending proposals. Mr. Cunningham first sat on the Intelligence Committee in 2001 and for part of last year was chairman of its subcommittee on terrorism and human intelligence.

The committee hired an outside counsel, Michael Stern, to carry out the Cunningham inquiry. Mr. Stern's specific findings are not known, although some Congressional officials have suggested that his report, which was completed in June, is critical of

DOJ_NMG_0078599

Mr. Cunningham for using the committee's secrecy to conceal his efforts on behalf of friends to insert spending items into classified bills.

The skirmishing over the subpoena and the Cunningham report, as well as its possibly embarrassing conclusions, reflects the erosion of bipartisanship that once flourished on the intelligence panel but has frayed over the years, with the rancor seeming to grow as the November elections approach.

A spokesman for Mr. Hoekstra, Jamal D. Ware, said Mr. Hoekstra wanted to obtain Mr. Cunningham's testimony, which he said was crucial to the inquiry. But Mr. Ware said that issuing a subpoena would not force Mr. Cunningham to testify because the former lawmaker had said he would cite his constitutional right against compelled self-incrimination to refuse to appear before the panel.

Ms. Harman's office declined to comment on the confidential letter, a copy of which was provided to The New York Times by a Congressional official who insisted on anonymity.

In the letter, Ms. Harman also expressed dismay over another issue. She said Mr. Hoekstra wrote her last month saying that he had been in direct contact with Mr. Cunningham — apparently to seek informally his appearance before the committee.

"I am deeply disappointed that you contacted him unilaterally without notifying me," Ms. Harman wrote.

In her letter, Ms. Harman also said, "I again urge you to reconsider your decision not to subpoena him."

She also wrote about her concern that Mr. Hoekstra might try to visit Mr. Cunningham in prison, saying, "I believe this would be highly inappropriate."

Ms. Harman said the report should be released now because it was an unclassified document.

Mr. Ware said the report was not meant to be public. He said it had never been assigned a security classification because it had not been reviewed to determine whether it contained classified information.

Cunningham's Wife To Pay U.S. $1.6 Million (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

SAN DIEGO, Oct. 6 -- The estranged wife of disgraced former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham will pay $1.6 million in back taxes and penalties for her role in the bribery scandal that landed him in prison, according to a settlement filed Friday.

The federal government sued Nancy Cunningham last year. The settlement means she will not be prosecuted for any charges relating to her husband's activities, according to papers filed in federal civil court.

Duke Cunningham resigned from Congress and was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison. The eight-term Republican admitted last November that he took $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors in exchange for government contracts and other favors.

The couple separated in July 2005, when FBI agents raided their home in ritzy Rancho Santa Fe, seizing rugs, furniture and jewelry.

Nancy Cunningham's attorney, Douglas Brown, called the deal "a compromise settlement" and said his client intends to file for divorce soon.

Spouse Of Lawmaker Agrees To Penalties (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

The estranged wife of disgraced former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham has agreed to forfeit $760,000 to the IRS from the sale of the couple's Rancho Santa Fe home, acknowledging that they had financed the house, in part, with more than $1 million in bribe money, authorities said Friday.

Additionally, Nancy Cunningham signed an agreement admitting that she had tax violations and will pay $1.6 million in taxes and penalties.

Her husband, a former eight-term Republican congressman from Rancho Santa Fe, pleaded guilty in November to taking $2.4 million in bribes and evading more than $1 million in taxes. In March, he was sentenced to serve 100 months in prison.

An investigation by the FBI and IRS determined that Cunningham bought the home after a defense contractor, Mitchell Wade, paid an inflated price for the Cunninghams' former home in Del Mar Heights. Wade pleaded guilty to federal charges earlier this year.

This week's actions came more than a year after the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego filed a civil forfeiture action against the Cunninghams, declaring that the home had been financed with significant proceeds from a bribe.

DOJ_NMG_0078600

Coupled with the $1.2 million already turned over to the IRS from the home's sale, U.S. Atty. Carol Lam said the new court order "returns nearly $2 million to the public … and ensures that the Cunninghams in no way profit from the sordid conduct that occurred in this case."

The most recent payment to the government leaves the Cunninghams with about $900,000 in outstanding tax liability.

In exchange for her acceptance of responsibility in the case and continuing cooperation with an ongoing federal investigation, authorities say they have not filed criminal charges against Nancy Cunningham.

greg.krikorian@latimes.com

Dialing For Dollars: A Lobbyist's New Twist (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

October 7, 2006

PAGE ONE

DOW JONES REPRINTS

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. To order presentation-ready copies for distribution to your colleagues, clients or customers, use the Order Reprints tool at the bottom of any article or visit:

www.djreprints.com.

· See a sample reprint in PDF format.

· Order a reprint of this article now.

Wins Government Contracts

Boosting Contributions to a Key Senator

By BRODY MULLINS

October 7, 2006; Page A1

Huntsville, Ala.

AS A GRADUATE STUDENT in political philosophy at the University of Virginia, Stewart Hall grew a beard, rented a house in the woods and lived what he calls the "hippie lifestyle."

In 1991, after earning his Ph.D., he set off down a different path. He shaved, squeezed into his only sport coat and drove to Washington to seek a job with Sen. Richard Shelby, a fellow Alabaman. Mr. Shelby hired him as a legislative assistant.

So began Mr. Hall's second education -- in the ways that politics and private enterprise intersect in modern Washington. After working for nearly five years on Capitol Hill, he left government and became a lobbyist.

Stewart Hall in his Washington office

Then, a few years ago, Mr. Hall went one better than the other former aides who prowl the halls of Congress on behalf of government-contracting clients. Mr. Hall, 40 years old, set out to become the client himself. All he needed was a company.

"Business is business, whether it's a government-relations firm or a coffee shop," says Mr. Hall. "You learn lessons in business and life, and you apply those lessons to other ventures."

He decided to create a government contractor nearly from scratch. He assembled a group of investors, many of them fellow lobbyists. Together they bought a 25% stake in Huntsville, Ala.-based Digital Fusion Inc., a small technology-consulting company on the verge of bankruptcy. It did little business with the government, so Mr. Hall set out to beef up its defense-contracting business. Today, it mainly helps government agencies use computer technology for tasks ranging from budget analysis to missile engineering.

That happens to be a growing part of the government's large defense operations in Huntsville, the home terrain of Sen. Shelby.

Mr. Hall hired a slew of people with connections to Congress, the Pentagon and the Department of Homeland Security, including former generals -- unusual star power for a company of its size. Digital Fusion and its officials and investors became the No. 2 financial supporter of the political action committee of Sen. Shelby, a top lawmaker on the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Since then, Digital Fusion has cashed in on the post-9/11 boom in defense and homeland-security spending. It has snagged more than $85 million in federal software contracts. In the two years since Mr. Hall invested in the company, revenue tripled to $20.9 million. The stock shot up as high as $3.75 earlier this year from a low of 15 cents before Mr. Hall showed up.

Friday it closed at $1.50 a share in trading on the OTC Bulletin Board, a market for small stocks. In two years, the value of Mr. Hall and his lobbyist friends' stake has jumped 50% to $3.2 million. Mr. Hall, who sits on the company's board, and one of his investors are entitled to 20% of the company's profit.

DOJ_NMG_0078601

AS THE NOVEMBER elections draw near, lobbyists are under more scrutiny than ever. A sweeping Justice Department probe into bribery by lobbyists has netted guilty pleas from a half-dozen of them, including lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and cost three House members their jobs. The scandal gave currency to the view that money and connections can be used to manipulate the appropriations and legislative processes, and that lobbyists are in the thick of such dealing.

Mr. Hall seems to have found a new and legal twist in the lobbying game. There is no evidence that Digital Fusion did anything improper to get its contracts, nor are there any rules against lobbyists like Mr. Hall going after government contracts themselves. Mr. Hall, who is still a lobbyist, says he simply took what he knew about Washington spending and positioned Digital Fusion to benefit.

Neither Mr. Hall nor representatives of most of the federal agencies that awarded contracts to Digital Fusion will discuss in detail how decisions about the contracts were made. Mr. Shelby, 72, says he hasn't lifted a finger to help Digital Fusion or Mr. Hall. "How he does in his private business? Gosh, I don't know," Mr. Shelby says. "My interest is what's best for the nation and how it can help Huntsville."

Mr. Hall, who holds power of attorney for his investment group's stake, says he never asked Mr. Shelby for help, even though he frequently lobbies his former boss on behalf of other government contractors. "I don't think Richard Shelby even knew the name of this company until a few weeks ago," Mr. Hall said in a recent interview.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration, which has awarded work to Digital Fusion, said the company simply won a competitive-bidding process, with no outside help from anyone. Spokespersons for the White House, the State Department, the Homeland Security Department and the Army declined to comment on their decisions to hire Digital Fusion.

Financial ties between lobbyists and their clients are unusual but are no longer unheard of. Over the past few years, some cash-poor companies have paid lobbyists with stock. Mr. Hall received 50,000 shares of Flight Safety Technologies Inc. as compensation for lobbying on the aviation company's behalf as it sought contracts from the Transportation Department and NASA. It is unclear whether Mr. Hall still holds that stake, which would currently be valued at about $93,000.

AT 6 FEET 4 INCHES TALL and more than 250 pounds, Mr. Hall looks more like an offensive guard than a lobbyist. As students at the University of Alabama, he and his wife volunteered for Mr. Shelby's successful 1986 campaign for the U.S. Senate. At the time, Messrs. Shelby and Hall were Democrats.

Mr. Shelby says he thought Mr. Hall would "wind up as a professor." But Mr. Hall says he didn't think he would fit in with the liberal academic world, so he took a job with Mr. Shelby.

When Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994, Mr. Shelby switched parties and became a Republican. So did Mr. Hall. Republicans gave Mr. Shelby a coveted seat on the Appropriations Committee, which funds every program in the federal government. Mr. Hall became his boss's top legislative aide and his envoy to the appropriations panel.

With Republicans in control of Congress for the first time in decades, demand shot up almost overnight for lobbyists with connections to key congressional Republicans. In early 1996, at the age of 30, Mr. Hall left government and founded his own lobbying outfit: G. Stewart Hall & Associates.

The following year, Mr. Shelby became chairman of an appropriations subcommittee that funds highways, bridges and other transportation projects. Later, he snagged top positions on panels allocating money for defense and NASA. Since 1998, Mr. Shelby has issued more than 1,000 press releases touting his success steering billions of federal dollars to Alabama.

Mr. Hall billed $1 million in lobbying fees in his first year, and the next year, he hit $2 million, according to public records. Eventually, his clients included AT&T Inc., FedEx Corp. and Philip Morris, now called Altria Group Inc. A proposal his firm sent to one client touted his connections. With an "especially close relationship with Senator Richard Shelby and his staff," it said, Mr. Hall has "successfully secured millions of dollars in appropriated funds" for clients.

After renaming his firm the Federalist Group, he began hiring other lobbyists, primarily young, Southern Republicans with ties to the top lawmakers. Eventually, he merged with a firm run by Wayne Berman, a top fund-raiser for Mr. Bush whose wife is currently the White House social secretary.

In 2003, Mr. Hall wanted a new challenge, he says, and decided to try to get into the government-contracting business. "I never let a lot of grass grow under my feet," he says.

IN THE MONTHS after the 9/11 attacks, Congress had created the Department of Homeland Security and funded it with a budget that is now $35 billion a year. Wars in Afghanistan and Iraq drove up defense spending to $500 billion last year from $300 billion in 2001. "Money poured into security and defense," says Mr. Hall. "The government as a market became very attractive....We felt like the time was then to start a new business opportunity."

Mr. Hall figured that Huntsville, one of the nation's defense-contracting hubs, would be a beneficiary. At a gated military compound stretching across 60 square miles of former cotton fields, more than three dozen federal agencies conduct research into defense, space and homeland security. Researchers at the Richard C. Shelby Center for Missile Intelligence analyze foreign missile systems and help U.S. pilots evade enemy attacks. A huge office park across the street is home to more than 200 defense and aerospace contractors. All told, Congress funds about $20 billion in research and development in Huntsville each year, accounting for half the area jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0078602

In the fall of 2003, Mr. Hall flew to Huntsville to meet Gary Ryan, a man with a lifetime of experience in Huntsville's contracting business. The two had met a decade earlier when Mr. Hall was an aide on Capitol Hill. When Mr. Hall arrived in Huntsville, he told Mr. Ryan that he could raise the money to buy a small government contractor in Huntsville if Mr. Ryan agreed to run it.

The government tries to help small businesses by setting aside some contracts for them. Within a few months, Messrs. Hall and Ryan had set their sights on Digital Fusion, which had been founded in New Jersey as Internet Broadcasting Systems during the technology boom. The company had struggled to find its niche. Initially it planned to deliver television content over the Internet. Then it shifted to computer networking and Internet services for businesses, then to hosting Web pages and providing Internet service.

It went public in March 1998. In 1999, its shares began plummeting as the dot-com bubble burst. The company shifted course yet again, buying a small Internet consulting firm in Tampa, Fla., and taking the name Digital Fusion. By the end of 2003, its market capitalization had shrunken to $2 million, its revenue was only $6 million, and just a few dozen employees were left.

Only a small portion of Digital Fusion's revenue came from government contracts. Mr. Hall figured it could do more, so he set out to buy a big stake. First, he started an investment fund, named after Madison County, which surrounds Huntsville. He chipped in about $300,000. Mr. Berman, his lobbying partner, invested. So did Ray Cole, another former aide to Mr. Shelby who worked at a competing lobbying firm, and Tom Young, Mr. Shelby's chief of staff for 12 years, then a political adviser to Sen. John McCain. Other investors included onetime top aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott.

Eventually, Mr. Hall raised $2.1 million. Between May and October 2004, Digital Fusion sold his group new stock and warrants that gave it a 27.7% stake, making it the largest single shareholder.

Not long after the deal was completed, the company won a $277,596 contract from the White House to install a customized software program to manage assets.

MUCH OF THE government's missile-defense research and development takes place in Huntsville, so one way to win contracts there is to bid for modeling and simulation work on the systems. Digital Fusion didn't have such a business, so it paid $2.7 million to buy Summit Research Corp., a smaller defense contractor that did, and hired an engineer with three decades of experience in Huntsville's defense industry. Days after the deal was struck, Summit won a $24.4 million Defense Department contract to help design and test software related to the missile-defense shield. John Cummings, a spokesman for the Space and Missile Defense Command, said the contract was awarded after a competitive bidding process.

To help land more contracts, Digital Fusion hired Mr. Shelby's appropriations aide, Joseph Summers. In a press release, Digital Fusion said his "considerable understanding of federal programs and processes will assist us tremendously in our pursuit of opportunities in markets such as NASA, Homeland Security, Intelligence and Defense."

In March 2005, Lt. Gen. Frank Libutti, a former top official at the Department of Homeland Security and a onetime Marine known for doing one-armed pushups during meetings, was hired to find homeland-security contracts. The following month, the company added to its board both Mr. Libutti and former Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, once the Bush administration's reconstruction czar in Iraq.

At about that time, Mr. Shelby became chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that funds science programs, including NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville. Mr. Shelby also served on the defense-spending committee.

Business has rolled in: $49 million to help NASA with accounting and procurement; $11.7 million to help integrate the missile-defense system; $12,554 to install software for the State Department's Baghdad annex; $2,522 to update computer software for the secretary of the Homeland Security Department; and $13,000 to configure computer equipment for the Army.

Although funding for all contracts comes from congressional appropriations committees, bid winners are generally chosen by the government agencies and departments for which the work will be done.

Digital Fusion secured the NASA contract, for example, through a competitive-bidding process run by the space agency's Huntsville-based Marshall Space Flight Center. A report prepared by an agency procurement director said that Digital Fusion's proposal was better than those of two other bidders, and that it "was not a close competition." Mr. Ryan, the seasoned defense-contracting executive recruited early on by Mr. Hall, had once performed similar work for another company. A spokesman for the flight center says the selection of Digital Fusion was based on the recommendation of a committee of experts, including procurement specialists. "No one tried to influence [the] decision in any way," the spokesman says.

Mr. Hall declines to detail how the company goes about winning contracts. The company noted in its 2005 annual report that the "relationships and reputation that many members of our senior management team have established and maintain with government personnel contribute to our ability to maintain good client relations and to identify new business opportunities."

DOJ_NMG_0078603

BECAUSE CONGRESS controls the purse strings, lawmakers can deny funding for projects they oppose or beef up spending on pet projects. In the five years before Mr. Hall invested, Digital Fusion executives made a total of $2,250 in political donations to all candidates. Although Mr. Hall says he has never lobbied Mr. Shelby on behalf of Digital Fusion, the company's executives and investors have contributed $60,500 to Mr. Shelby's Defend America PAC. Lawmakers use money from leadership PACs to help colleagues in other races.

Mr. Shelby says he is proud of the amount of defense-contracting money that he has helped bring to Huntsville, although he says he hasn't helped Digital Fusion get any of it. "I work for the community," he says. "It's very important to my state."

Last fall Mr. Hall and his partners sold their lobbying firm to Ogilvy Public Relations Worldwide, part of WPP Group PLC, for more than $20 million. Under the terms of the deal, he will continue to work there for a few more years.

The year Mr. Hall invested in Digital Fusion, it lost $1 million. Last year it reported net income of $7,000, its first profit ever. In September, it said it would deregister its common stock, freeing it from the obligation to file regular financial reports with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The company said doing so would save time and money.

The government accounted for nearly all of its business last year. This summer it opened a Washington office. "If you're not here, you're absent," says Mr. Libutti, the former Marine general, who now serves as the company's chairman and chief executive. "You have to physically be there … . You have to walk the hallways."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Disabled Can't Use Park's Restrooms (APP)

By Bob Cullinane, STAFF WRITER

Asbury Park (NJ) Press, October 7, 2006

Feds: That's an ADA violation

By locking the front door of the Visitor Center in Thompson Park on weekends but leaving the back door open for restroom access, the Monmouth County Park System is likely violating federal law, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said Tuesday.

That's because the back door of the Middletown park building is at the top of an eight-step stairway, making the restrooms inaccessible to some people with disabilities, especially those in wheelchairs.

The park system cannot open the facility on weekends — the busiest visiting days in summer — "yet close the only accessible entrance to it" without violating standards of the federal Americans with Disabilities Act, said Eric Holland of the U.S. Department of Justice. His is the agency that enforces the regulations of the disability act.

Holland said that in order to comply with the law, the Park System must provide an entrance accessible to all visitors if it opens the building at all.

The front entrance has a ramp.

Policy not changing

Laura Kirkpatrick, the parks' public information officer, said there are no plans to open the front entrance on weekends.

"There are restroom facilities at the Craft Center (in the park) that are handicapped-accessible," Kirkpatrick said of another park building at the park's western end.

However, there is no sign at the Visitor Center advising people about the other location. And there are no paved public roads connecting the two buildings. Visitors would need to drive outside the park and re-enter at a different entrance on Newman Springs Road.

Kirkpatrick added that since the Visitor Center also houses park employee offices on the second floor, there are security concerns with opening the front entrance on weekends.

"You can't just open and let people walk through," she said of the building, which was recently renovated by the county at a cost of $3.6 million.

"County officials should know better," said Carolyn Schwebel, a Middletown resident who uses both a cane and a wheelchair to get around.

Schwebel, who recently filed a lawsuit charging that Monmouth County violates ADA access regulations at seven other county buildings, said she checked out the VisitorCenter last weekend after an Asbury Park Press story reported the building is closed on weekends. In addition to not having a ramp, "there are also supposed to be two handrails along the stairs," she said of the back entrance. There's only one handrail.

Park officials "probably just didn't think about wheelchairs when they decided to leave the back door open," said Jim Marzano, 70, of Union Beach, who has used a wheelchair his entire life.

DOJ_NMG_0078604

"Why don't they just unlock the front door on weekends? That would fix things."

Kirkpatrick, the parks spokeswoman, said that won't happen until sometime in October, when the park celebrates Thompson Park Day with an exhibit in the Visitor Center.

And there's no guarantee that after that, the park will keep the Visitor Center open on weekends.

"We plan to monitor attend-ance and see what kind of visitation we have," she said. "We may just open it seasonally."

"Internal" decision

Kirkpatrick said park officials did not consult with the director of the county's Office on Disabilities, Alexander Buono, about access to Visitor Center on weekends. Buono could not be reached for comment.

Kirkpatrick said park officials also did not contact federal authorities to see if the practice of leaving the center's back door open complied with ADA regulations.

Instead, she said, an "internal committee" made the decision that the park system was not violating ADA guidelines.

Dave Yanchulis, an accessibility specialist with the Access Board, a federal agency that maintains accessibility design standards, agreed that weekend access at the Visitor Center is likely in violation of federal law.

Stan Soden, a coordinator for Moceans, a "center for independent living" in Long Branch, said he is surprised by the county's noncompliance.

"I've been to a number of county parks, and they are relatively accessible in terms of the restrooms," said Soden, who uses a wheelchair.

Pat McShane, the executive director of Moceans, said the organization may contact both the county and the Department of Justice about the issue.

"We'd just like to make sure (the county) is in compliance" with ADA regulations, she said.

Justice Department May Investigate Case Against Sheriff's Office (DAYBNJ)

By Kenya Woodard, Staff Writer

Daytona Beach (FL) News-Journal, October 7, 2006

PALM COAST -- The Flagler County Sheriff's Office could face an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice after a federal commission found "reasonable cause to believe" the office discriminated against an employee who was fired in May.

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said it found "reasonable cause to believe" the Sheriff's Office discriminated against former victim's advocate Vicky Peppin because of her Cuban background, according to a letter dated Aug. 31 from Federico Costales, director of the commission's Miami District.

In addition, the commission determined "that there was reasonable cause to believe" the Sheriff's Office retaliated against Peppin after she filed her complaint with the EEOC in November 2005, Costales said in a separate letter dated Aug. 31.

In a telephone interview Wednesday, Peppin said she felt compelled to file the complaint to fend off allegations of a poor work performance and to combat the harassment and discrimination she faced.

"The only thing I have is my name," she said. "All I wanted to do was my job."

The EEOC's ruling is the latest controversy involving the Sheriff's Office. The agency is still under a shroud of scandal following the May indictments of six deputies and the former jail director following investigations of inmate abuse. One of those investigations involved State Attorney John Tanner's daughter Lisa being strapped into a restraint chair at the jail. Two deputies were charged with abuse in that incident.

The EEOC's nine-month investigation began when Peppin filed a complaint with the commission in which she stated that she was being "discriminated against, harassed and retaliated against on a daily basis by the new sheriff and his staff."

In addition to the EEOC complaint, Peppin filed a lawsuit this summer in circuit court against the Sheriff's Office alleging wrongful termination.

In her EEOC complaint, Peppin, 45, also charged she was a victim of sex and age discrimination.

However, Costales told Peppin in a letter dated Aug. 31 that evidence obtained by the commission was "insufficient" to support those claims.

Costales told Peppin in a letter dated Sept. 18 that the commission's efforts to settle the case had been "unsuccessful" and it will forward the matter to the Department of Justice "for whatever action is deemed appropriate on this charge."

Peppin voluntarily turned over copies of the commission's ruling and other documents related to the investigation to The Daytona Beach News-Journal.

Sheriff's Office attorney Wayne Helsby said Thursday the EEOC passing the case along to the Department of Justice for review was "just part of the process."

"It doesn't signal anything," he said. "(Department of Justice) may or may not investigate."

Peppin was the former director of the Victim's Services Unit and began working in the Sheriff's Office under former Sheriff Bob McCarthy in 1999.

On Wednesday, Peppin said she never experienced any mistreatment while working under McCarthy or Jim Manfre, who became sheriff in 2000.

But things changed when Sheriff Don Fleming took office in January 2005, she said.

According to Peppin's complaint, Fleming demoted her as director of the victim's services division and cut her salary shortly after taking office. In September 2005, Peppin was formally stripped of her title and the victim's services unit was split between the Sheriff's Office in Bunnell and a precinct in Palm Coast. When Peppin asked about the changes, Look told her it was "due to a perception that we were not doing our jobs" and that "a division with three people did not need a director," the complaint said.

At that time, there were several departments operating with three or fewer people and white directors at the helm, Peppin said in her complaint.

Peppin said Wednesday she was fired from the Sheriff's Office because she filed the EEOC complaint.

But sheriff's officials dispute Peppin's claims in documents obtained by The News-Journal through a public records request.

In a statement to the EEOC, Helsby said Peppin's salary was readjusted after an evaluation found it to be "significantly inflated."

Peppin was "earning the salary of a 10-year supervisor" although she only had seven years of experience, Helsby said.

Peppin's title change was made to comply with the terms of a state grant that financed the victim's services division, Helsby said.

A supervisor also found that Peppin had mismanaged cases and that the Sheriff's Office had received complaints about her job performance from the Department of Children & Families and Diane Christen, director of the Family Life Center, a Flagler County women's shelter, Helsby said.

Peppin was fired in May after an internal investigation found she had violated agency policies and procedures, Helsby said in the statement.

Feds Clear St. Landry Elections (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess, Advocate Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, October 7, 2006

OPELOUSAS — Federal observers found no irregularities in recent elections in St. Landry Parish, federal and state officials said Friday.

But a losing candidate in the town of Washington's mayoral race said he plans to file a legal challenge alleging widespread voter registration fraud.

A team of observers with the U.S. Department of Justice kept watch on last Saturday's elections in St. Landry Parish after complaints of possible racial intimidation of voters, particularly in the sheriff's race.

"They gave us a clean bill of health," said St. Landry Parish Clerk of Court Charles Jagneaux.

Justice Department observers are expected to return to the parish for the Nov. 7 election, which includes a runoff in the sheriff's race between Laura Balthazar and Bobby Guidroz and the general election for U.S. Representative in the 7th Congressional District.

U.S. Atorney Donald Washington said the concern over voter intimidation arose during a routine pre-election meeting between state election officials and Justice Department.

Though federal observers noted no complaints on election day, Washington mayoral candidate Anthony James Soileau said he plans to file a lawsuit Monday to challenge the qualifications of at least 40 voters.

Incumbent Joseph "Joe" Pitre retained the mayor's seat with 299 votes to Soileau's 217. A third candidate, Thirkield Smith, received 58.

Soileau said he began working to verify voter registration records before the election. He alleges that dozens of out-of-towners registered to vote in Washington using the addresses of abandoned houses or the names of dead people.

He also claims that felons who had lost their right to vote were allowed to cast ballots.

"I was amazed how easy it is to commit voter fraud," Soileau said.

Soileau said he does not have evidence linking his opponents to the alleged voter fraud.

Washington, the U.S. attorney, said he has heard second-hand of the complaints of voter fraud in the Town of Washington.

"We do want to take a look at those issues," he said.

An investigation of similar complaints in the 2002 St. Martinville elections resulted in the conviction of a former city councilwoman for falsifying voter registration information to allow people who lived outside of her district to vote there.

DOJ_NMG_0078606

Same-sex Rite Stalls Judge Nomination (AP)

By Sam Hananel And Ken Thomas

AP, October 7, 2006

A judge's elevation to the federal bench could be derailed because she helped preside over a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple four years ago.

Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas has placed a hold on the nomination of Michigan Court of Appeals Judge Janet T. Neff, saying her presence at the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony raises questions about her judicial philosophy.

"It seems to speak about her view of judicial activism," Brownback said Friday. "It's something I want to inquire of her further."

Brownback, a vehement opponent of gay marriage who has presidential ambitions, said he wants to know whether Neff might have presided over "an illegal marriage ceremony" that skirted Massachusetts law. He has asked the Justice Department for a formal legal opinion on Neff's conduct.

Ceremonies marking the union of same-sex couples are usually symbolic events that carry no legal benefits and require no government approval. Massachusetts did not recognize gay marriages in 2002 but legalized same-sex marriage two years later after a ruling from its highest court.

Conservative activists expressed concerns about Neff after seeing her name in a September 2002 New York Times "Weddings/Celebrations" announcement. It said Neff led the commitment ceremony for Karen Adelman and Mary Curtin with the Rev. Kelly A. Gallagher, a minister of the United Church of Christ.

Both women are former employees of the gay rights group Human Rights Campaign in Washington.

"When she did the commitment ceremony, she was doing it in her role as a judge, and that draws up a serious question," said Tom McClusky, a spokesman for the Family Research Council, a conservative group. "She would be more sympathetic to an activist on the issue of homosexual marriage."

The Senate Judiciary Committee last week approved Neff for a seat on the U.S. District Court in Michigan's Western District, and the nomination is pending before the full Senate. A single senator can block a nomination from moving forward by placing a hold on it.

Neither Neff nor a White House spokesman returned calls seeking comment on Friday.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who learned about the ceremony this week, said based on the newspaper announcement it didn't sound like Neff did anything illegal.

"There's no reason why two people can't stand up and exchange commitments with each other provided they don't do anything illegal," Levin said.

Brownback cited recent instances in California and New York where local officials issued marriage licenses to same-sex couples contrary to existing laws.

"I don't know what she did," Brownback said. "That's why there's a factual question."

Gay activists call Brownback's inquiry a publicity stunt that is irrelevant to Neff's qualifications.

"This has got nothing to do with legal or ethical concerns by Sam Brownback and everything to do with him finding another opportunity to show himself to be the mean-spirited bigot that he is," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign.

Neff, 61, has served on the Michigan Court of Appeals since 1989. She was nominated by President Bush in June — along with Grand Rapids attorney Robert Jonker and Berrien County Circuit Judge Paul Maloney — to fill three vacancies on the district court.

Levin said Neff was nominated along with Jonker and Maloney as part of an agreement he and Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., reached with the White House. Brownback said Neff has a more liberal reputation while Jonker and Maloney are considered conservatives.

McClusky said he doesn't understand why Bush struck a deal to appoint Neff and said the president is going back on his promise to appoint judges in the mold of Supreme Court Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

Bush has long advocated a ban on gay marriage. In July, a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage failed to win the needed two-thirds support in both the Senate and House.

Forty-five states have either constitutional amendments banning gay marriage or statutes outlawing same-sex weddings. Twenty states, including Michigan, have approved bans on same-sex marriage, and eight states are considering similar measures in November.

DOJ_NMG_0078607

ANTITRUST:

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Looking Sweeter (AJC)

By Scott Leith, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 7, 2006

Federal regulators are still weighing their approval of AT&T's deal to acquire BellSouth. But the buyout, as it draws close, has earned the blessing of Wall Street.

Slowly but surely, shares of AT&T and BellSouth have climbed since the companies announced their deal March 5. As a result, the value of the transaction has spiked by about $10 billion, to a total of about $99 billion at the moment. AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is easily the most expensive acquisition involving a Georgia company — ever.

BellSouth shares, which closed at $31.46 just prior to the news that AT&T would buy the company, have been trading in the mid-to-low $40s lately. Shares topped $44 on Sept. 25, their highest level in five years but still well below the all-time peak of $52.31 on April 11, 2000.

The jump is particularly noteworthy in Georgia, home to a high concentration of BellSouth shareholders — about 50,000 of them. After the deal closes, those shareholders will get AT&T stock, which has traded upward in tandem with BellSouth.

AT&T shares, meanwhile, have partly recovered from their malaise. AT&T, formerly known as SBC Communications, reached a high of $33.49 on Sept. 25, which put shares in territory not seen since the middle of 2002.

The spike in share prices means the value of the deal has jumped, given that AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is an all-stock transaction. At current prices, the deal is valued at about $77 billion in stock and $22 billion in BellSouth debt.

Announced deal put worth at $89B

When the deal was announced, the price tag was $67 billion in stock plus $22 billion in debt, for a total of $89 billion.

BellSouth shareholders will receive 1.325 shares of AT&T for each share of BellSouth.

Analyst Tim Horan, of CIBC World Markets, recently raised his targets for AT&T performance. He thinks the deal will help earnings next year instead of causing a slight drag.

But analysts differ on AT&T's expected performance. The consensus estimate is for shares to be trading at about $33 a year from now. But Horan, who is bullish, believes AT&T will climb to $40.

Though BellSouth Chairman and Chief Executive Duane Ackerman was criticized at times for not pursuing deals that could have expanded the company, spokesman Jeff Battcher said the results show the sale to AT&T was the right move.

"With a 60 percent increase in our stock price in the last 12 months, it is clearly obvious that shareholders overwhelming approve of the direction that Duane Ackerman has put BellSouth on," Battcher said.

Before the deal can close, AT&T needs approval from the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission.

The DOJ could announce a decision at any time; the FCC is scheduled to vote on the issue Thursday, although meeting times have been known to change.

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Criticized For Not Toughening Soot Law (LAT)

By Janet Wilson

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Up to 24,000 lives could be saved annually in the U.S., and savings on healthcare and in other areas would outweigh the costs, a panel says.

As many as 24,000 lives — a large number of them Californians' — could have been saved each year if the head of the Environmental Protection Agency had tightened soot standards by one microgram per cubic meter annually, according to an analysis released Friday.

The cost-benefit analysis also shows that although the tab for power plants, refineries, auto manufacturers and other industry for such a change would be about $1.9 billion a year — or about $15 per household — the savings in healthcare costs, work and school attendance and other benefits would be between $4.3 billion and $51 billion.

Exposure to soot, or fine particulate matter, has been repeatedly linked to respiratory and cardiac illness and premature death. Southern California and the San Joaquin Valley have the worst fine particulate pollution in the nation, largely because of diesel-powered vehicles. The estimates found as many as 6,400 lives would be saved annually in California.

DOJ_NMG_0078608

By law, the EPA is not allowed to consider the costs of a new regulation. But it, along with all other federal agencies, is required to calculate them. The agency is required to consider health benefits.

EPA administrator Stephen Johnson has been harshly criticized by medical groups, environmentalists and his own science advisors for his Sept. 21 decision to retain a standard allowing annual exposure of 15 micrograms per cubic meter, rather than tightening it to 14 micrograms or fewer.

The American Medical Assn., the American Lung Assn., pediatric and environmental groups and scores of doctors and academics who specialize in heart and lung disease had asked Johnson to set a standard of between 12 and 14 micrograms per cubic meter of air for fine particulates, saying that study after study had shown a correlation between increased exposure to soot and higher numbers of illnesses and deaths.

Friday's online posting unleashed a new round of criticism.

"It's pretty sobering and shocking stuff to realize the agency concluded the human cost of refusing to strengthen these air quality protections was going to be [thousands of lives] lost each year," said attorney John Walke, the clean air director for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Walke said that although the cost to industry "is not insignificant … it pales in comparison to the $50 billion annually that they project will be incurred in healthcare costs as a result of the failure to upgrade the standards."

"It's pretty darned obvious that better standards would mean fewer premature deaths," said Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch.

Industry representatives could not be reached for comment late Friday.

Johnson did significantly tighten daily exposure amounts to soot, cutting the allowable level from 65 to 35 micrograms, which electric industry representatives in particular had criticized as being of unproven need and costly. The same analysis released Friday shows as many as 13,000 lives will be saved as a result of that change, at a cost of $5 billion annually, with $9 billion to $76 billion in social benefits. Johnson was not available for comment Friday. He said at the time of his decision that "reasonable minds can disagree" and that there was disagreement among scientists on the evidence concerning annual particulate exposure.

But the analysis released Friday shows that every member of a 12-member panel of scientists convened at the request of the White House Office of Management and Budget and National Academy of Sciences found that thousands of additional lives could be saved if the tougher annual standard were adopted.

The panel was made up of authors of the studies that Johnson used and specialists picked by their peers as the leading experts in particulate pollution. All reviewed the available literature on soot illness and death and primarily relied on the same two studies that Johnson did in making their estimates.

"I feel that he didn't really take into account the best available science, which is now saying very clearly that there are very significant health effects related to this longer-term exposure," said Dr. Bart Ostro, one of the 12 panelists and chief of the air pollution epidemiology section for the California EPA.

Ostro said the science panel had set risk percentages of increased illness and mortality, which the EPA then converted into possible deaths based on U.S. population and total death rates. Under a limit of 14 micrograms, those estimates found a range of lives saved from 2,200 to 24,000, or an average 13,000 annually. In all cases, the highest number of deaths avoided would be in California.

Ostro said that because California has the most fine particulate pollution and a large population, "we would see a large chunk of the benefits" if the standard were set at 14 micrograms.

"We're talking about … hospitalization and emergency room visits, asthma attacks and work loss as well as mortality," he said.

Acting assistant EPA administrator William Wehrum, who worked with Johnson on the new rules, said Friday that the new analysis was not ready when Johnson made his decision, so it was not included as part of that process. But it would be helpful in future regulations, he said, adding that Johnson and agency staff "absolutely considered impacts to human health."

janet.wilson@latimes.com

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Indicts 56 On Drug, Laundering Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Federal authorities yesterday announced the indictment of 56 persons on drug-smuggling and money-laundering charges, 27 of whom were arrested for their purported links to international drug cartels.

The arrests were part of "Operation Watusi," coordinated by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), along with the FBI's "Operation Green Traketon" -- operating under the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force.

The investigations focused on drug cartels that operated in Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Martin, Netherlands Antilles, the U.S. Virgin Islands, the British Virgin Islands and the Dominican Republic.

ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said simultaneous arrests took place in several countries. Numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts were seized, along with $3.1 million cash, about 4,000 pounds of cocaine and six boats.

According to one of the indictments, a purported leader of one of the organizations, Luis Pena-Pena, coordinated the kidnapping of an undercover ICE agent in Medellin, Colombia, in December. The indictment also said a ransom of $2 million was requested for the release of the undercover agent.

The purported drug traffickers, who thought they were dealing with a drug smuggler, later discovered the kidnapped man was a U.S. drug agent and he was released.

"We will leave no stone unturned in hunting down those that kidnap and threaten undercover ICE agents. In this case, our agent was fortunate to escape with his life," said Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie B. Myers, who heads ICE.

Two of eight indictments in the probe said the cartel members and their co-conspirators coordinated the transportation of multimillion-dollar shipments of cocaine from South America to Puerto Rico via boat. Seven of the eight indictments accused cartel members of laundering the narcotics proceeds through various financial transactions.

Mr. Boyd said the cash was laundered through a complex money-laundering scheme known as the "Black Market Peso Exchange."

During the investigation, Mr. Boyd said federal agents were able to infiltrate money-laundering and drug-trafficking organizations, identifying the source of the drugs, the foreign and domestic drug transporters, a distributor and money launderers. As a result of the simultaneous arrests, he said, federal agents dismantled several drug-trafficking and money-laundering organizations.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Pushes Guest Worker Program (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 7, 2006

President Bush on Friday shoehorned a plug for his guest worker program between making a joke about an award winner and listening to love songs Friday at a White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month.

Bush said that as lawmakers debate immigration policy, they need to remember that while enforcing U.S. borders is important, it is only one step in the struggle to stop illegal immigration. He pressed Congress to pass his guest worker program to legally bring in new foreign workers and give some of the country's illegal immigrants a shot at U.S. citizenship.

"We must understand that you can't kick 12 million people out of your country — that we must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship," Bush said.

"Nobody in our land wants to grant automatic amnesty. But everybody in our land understands these people must be treated with respect and dignity," he continued. "There are citizenship lines for people from our neighborhood. People ought to be given a chance to get at the back of the citizenship line and have a chance."

Latin pop singer Ana Christina closed the event in the East Room with three love songs, singing one in English and two in Spanish.

Bush opened the event with a few jokes.

"I am proud to be here with Lt. Col. Consuelo Kickbusch," Bush said about an influential Hispanic motivational speaker and the highest ranking Hispanic woman in the Army, who won the 2006 Hispanic Heritage Award.

"Interesting name: Kickbusch," Bush said. "Sounds like a political campaign."

President Touts Alien Citizenship (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078610

On the heels of signing a bill to boost border security funding, President Bush yesterday said immigration reform requires granting citizenship to current illegal aliens.

"You can't kick 12 million people out of your country," Mr. Bush said at the White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month. "We must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship."

Since this spring, Mr. Bush has been a supporter of allowing some illegal aliens to earn citizenship, and he backed a Senate plan that divided immigrants, giving longtime illegal aliens a chance for citizenship while withholding that chance from less-entrenched illegal aliens.

Any action on immigration will have to wait until Congress returns, either during a lame-duck session after next month's elections or next year, when a new Congress is sworn in.

But in the meantime, Mr. Bush will soon sign a bill authorizing 700 miles of fence to be built along the U.S.-Mexico border. This week he signed a spending bill that included the first installment of money for that fence, as well as for other infrastructure such as vehicle barriers and ground-based radar.

The fence is already stirring the political pot, even before construction begins.

Mexican officials sent a diplomatic protest to the Bush administration this week and have said they doubt the fence will ever be built. A report in The Washington Post yesterday seemed to concur, stating that the wording of the fence and spending measures gives the Bush administration so much leeway that it is unlikely the 700 miles will be completed.

But Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, who wrote the fence provisions that passed last year as part of the House's enforcement-only bill, said yesterday that building the fence is not optional.

He held a press conference yesterday on the U.S.-Mexico border to address the report and said the language in the bill means the administration "shall" build it.

During the celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month Mr. Bush praised U.S. troops who are Hispanic, noting that more than 200,000 are in uniform now.

He also urged that the immigration debate not turn nasty.

"We are a land of immigrants, and as we debate immigration policy, we must always keep that important fact in mind," Mr. Bush said.

It is the first time the president has used the phrase "earn citizenship," a description popular among groups that lobby for granting rights to illegal aliens. But many critics, including Republican leaders, equate that concept with amnesty.

Mr. Bush had some fun with one of yesterday's visitors to the White House, retired Lt. Col. Consuelo Kickbusch, winner of the 2006 Hispanic Heritage Award for leadership.

"Interesting name, 'Kickbusch' -- sounds like a political campaign," the president said.

This article is based in part on wire service reports

Silencing Of A Speech Causes A Furor (NYT)

By Karen W. Arenson And Damien Cave

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

When protesters stormed a Columbia University stage on Wednesday evening, shutting down a speech by the head of a fiercely anti-immigration group, they not only stopped the program, but also hurtled the university back into the debate over free speech on campus.

The fracas, which came just weeks after the president of Iran was invited to speak at Columbia and then told not to come, was captured live by Columbia's student-run television station, CTV, as well as by two commercial stations. It was shown repeatedly on television in New York yesterday and was widely available on the Internet.

Yesterday Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg chastised Columbia for the disruption. "I think it's an outrage that somebody that was invited to speak didn't get a chance to speak," he said in response to a question on his weekly radio program.

"Bollinger's just got to get his hands around this," Mr. Bloomberg added, referring to Columbia's president, Lee C. Bollinger. "There are too many incidents at the same school where people get censored," he said, using Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as an example.

This time the speaker, invited by a campus Republican group, was Jim Gilchrist, the head of the Minuteman Project, which assembled hundreds of volunteers last year, some armed, to patrol the Arizona-Mexico border for illegal immigrants.

Mr. Bollinger, a legal scholar whose specialty is free speech and the First Amendment, quickly condemned this week's disruption.

DOJ_NMG_0078611

"Students and faculty have rights to invite speakers to the campus," he said yesterday in an interview. "Others have rights to hear them. Those who wish to protest have rights to do so. No one, however, shall have the right or the power to use the cover of protest to silence speakers."

He added, "There is a vast difference between reasonable protest that allows a speaker to continue, and protest that makes it impossible for speech to continue."

Monique Dols, a senior in history at Columbia's School of General Studies, said she had mounted the stage in protest and unfurled a banner but that at such events in the past the speakers had kept going.

"We have always been escorted off the stage and the event continues," she said, adding that this time the protesters were attacked.

"We were punched and kicked," she said. "Unfortunately, the story being circulated is that we initiated the violence."

While college campuses have long been battlegrounds for freedom of speech issues, Columbia seems to attract more attention than most when such problems arise, perhaps because of its location in New York and its history of political protest.

Mr. Bollinger, who has held high-level positions at the University of Michigan and Dartmouth, said he did not believe that Columbia was unusual in the number of disputes over free speech. Officials are studying whether disciplinary steps are warranted, he said.

On campus yesterday, many people condemned the silencing of Mr. Gilchrist.

"I think it was really wrong not to let him speak," said Anusha Sriram, 18, a Columbia freshman studying political science and human rights, who moved to the United States from Mumbai five years ago. "He wasn't being violent. He was giving his view peacefully."

She said she was upset that by keeping Mr. Gilchrist from speaking, the protesters had unwittingly turned the tables of the discussion against themselves.

"That just undermined the entire protest," she said. "Now everyone looks at the protest in a bad light instead of him in a bad light."

She added, "They should invite him back and maybe set up a debate."

The program was sponsored by the Columbia University College Republicans, a five-year-old group that says on its Web site that it has 600 members. Its president, Chris Kulawik, a junior, is described on the site as a "staunch conservative" who "endeavors to attain the cherished title of 'Most Despised Person on Campus.' "

He said he was "very much surprised" by Wednesday night's events.

"We always understood that this is a very left-wing campus," he said. "But to see your peers resort to physical violence because they disagree with you is very frightening."

He said he had been working to ensure there is more campus security next week when his group has three more potentially controversial speakers, including Walid Shoebat, a former P.L.O. member, and Hilmar von Campe, an author who fought for Germany during World War II.

When asked how he chooses speakers, and whether he tries to stir up controversy, he said he chooses people that his group's members request.

Wei Wei Hsing, 20, is a junior at Columbia and general manager of the Columbia Political Union, which has frequently co-sponsored events with the College Republicans, including a lecture by John Ashcroft last year. She criticized both Mr. Gilchrist's supporters and the protesters for yelling and shouting before the lecture started, setting a tone of intolerance. But she said the controversy simply reflected the political mood. "The polarization of the country in general is reflected in the microcosm of Columbia," she said. "And because people here happen to read the news more, and talk about politics, it's expressed more outwardly."

The Minuteman Project, which calls itself a "citizens' vigilance operation," featured photos, video and news accounts of the Columbia events yesterday on its Web site and said they amounted "a riot."

"At Columbia University free speech took quite the hit," it said. "At an event hosted by the college Republicans at Columbia we were reminded that the left advocates free speech only for those who regurgitate the same tripe that they spew."

Columbia officials said yesterday that while there had been pushing and shoving on stage, as protesters surrounded Mr. Gilchrist and others tried to defend him, there were no reports of injuries.

Mr. Bollinger said he believed that the importance of free speech must be reinforced repeatedly. He said he hoped to do "a number of things" over the next several weeks to accomplish that on campus.

Donna Lieberman, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union, said yesterday, "Academic freedom thrives when all ideas, including racist ideas, have the opportunity to be aired."

DOJ_NMG_0078612

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Budget Deficit Drops To $250 Billion (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 7, 2006

The federal budget deficit estimate for the fiscal year just completed has dropped to $250 billion, congressional estimators said Friday, as the economy continued to fuel impressive tax revenues.

The Congressional Budget Office's latest estimate is $10 billion below CBO predictions issued in August and well below a July White House prediction of $296 billion.

The improving deficit picture — Bush predicted a $423 billion deficit in his February budget — has been driven by better-than-expected tax receipts, especially from corporate profits, CBO said.

The 2005 deficit registered $318 billion; the record $413 billion deficit was posted in 2004.

At $250 billion, it would be the lowest since the $158 billion figure in 2002, the first deficit following four years of surpluses.

The CBO estimate continues a positive trend on the deficit after a grim deficit performance during President Bush's first term, and comes despite soaring war costs and $50 billion in emergency spending for hurricane relief.

House Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, credited the improving deficit numbers to "a responsible budget blueprint and pro-growth policies," even as Democrats pointed out that at $250 billion, the deficit is still one of the largest in history.

"Though today's estimates for 2006 are not as pessimistic as some earlier estimates, it is clear that the budget remains on the wrong track," said top budget panel Democrat John Spratt Jr. of South Carolina. "The Congressional Budget Office and even the Bush administration are estimating that deficits will be even larger next year."

White House budget chief Rob Portman said the economy's current performance, with the unemployment dropping to 4.6 percent in September and the Dow Jones industrial average hitting record highs this week, provided more evidence that the president's economic policies are working.

"This economy is strong and growing," Portman told reporters at a briefing. "This is a very strong indication that the president's tax relief program is working."

But when measured against the size of the economy, which is the comparison economists think is most important, the deficit picture looks even better.

At 1.9 percent of gross domestic product, the 2006 deficit registers far below those seen in the 1980s and early 1990s. The modern record of 6 percent of GDP came in 1983 and deficits greater than 4 percent in 1991 and 1992 drove Congress to embark on a 1993 deficit-cutting drive.

Still, the long-term deficit picture remains bleak due to the looming retirement of the Baby Boom generation, which threatens to swamp Social Security and the Medicare health care program for the elderly.

The CBO estimates reflect actual government revenues and expenditures through August and estimates for September. The Treasury and the White House budget office are expected to release official deficit numbers next week.

Tax receipts are up $253 billion, a whopping 12 percent over last year. That's the thirds consecutive year of strong revenue growth after a dismal performance in the early part of the decade. Revenues dropped three years in a row after fiscal 2000 but picked up again in 2004.

Taxes paid quarterly on corporate profits and by wealthier people and small businessmen were especially strong in 2006. Corporate income taxes rose 27 percent over 2005 while nonwithheld receipts increased 19 percent.

In contrast, income taxes and payroll taxes for Social Security, Medicare and unemployment insurance grew by only 7 percent. Critics of GOP economic policies say that's a sign that lower- and middle-income people aren't getting as much of a lift from the current recovery.

"The benefits of the economic expansion have not been equally distributed," said Jim Horney, a budget analysts for the liberal-leaning Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

Budget Deficit Progress Will Be Tough To Sustain (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

THE WHITE HOUSE, eager to share some good news before the November elections, will release next week the final deficit tally for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30. The news will be good: The deficit is likely to come in well below the previous year's $318 billion, perhaps as low as $250 billion if the Congressional Budget Office's guess is right.

DOJ_NMG_0078613

That will allow President Bush to boast that he has met his goal of halving the deficit, measured as a share of the gross domestic product, ahead of schedule. "The president's goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009, which drew the scoffs of many, is now likely to be reached before that date," Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, told the Senate Budget Committee the other day, a preview of what's to come next week. There's even talk that the president will set a new headline-grabbing goal: balancing the federal budget by the end of the decade.

That would require a major change in fiscal policy, such as spending cuts or tax increases. Despite the good news about last year -- largely the result of a remarkable 12% surge in tax receipts from individuals and corporations that overwhelmed a nearly 9% increase in spending -- the smart money says the deficit is very likely to get deeper from here. "The world doesn't end, but the deficit goes in the other direction next year," says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former CBO director. Interest rates are rising, adding to the government's annual interest tab. Iraq continues to be costly. The revenue surge already is beginning to fade. And a slowing economy is likely to restrain revenue growth even further. A one-percentage-point drop in economic growth for a full year increases the deficit by about $35 billion.

Pleasant-looking projections that suggest a happier near-term deficit trend obscure two big items: They assume that Congress will resist intense lobbying by the American Medical Association and allow an existing law to take effect that would slice Medicare doctors' fees by 5%. Just delaying the cut by one year would add $11 billion to the deficit over five years. And then there's the pesky Alternative Minimum Tax, which needs another adjustment to stop it from reaching further into the middle class, one that would cost nearly $50 billion a year.

Budget wonks on Capitol Hill fret that these short-term deficit "improvements" will lead their bosses to conclude that they needn't make major changes to Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security spending, thereby precipitating even tougher choices in the future. New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, echoing his predecessor's warnings of a demographic time bomb, said this past week: "At the heart of the choices our elected representatives will have to make...will be an issue of fairness: What responsibility do we, who are alive today, have to future generations?"

FDA Budget Malnourished (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

A study of ADHD drug risks may be halted as the agency struggles to keep up with demands.

WASHINGTON — When scientific advisors urged the Food and Drug Administration in February to put a strong warning about suspected cardiovascular risks on attention-deficit drugs taken by millions of children and adults, agency officials said more clinical evidence was needed.

Now, the FDA-funded study meant to authoritatively answer questions about the drugs for attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder may be halted in midstream. The reason: The agency doesn't have the money to finish it.

The threat to the study, as revealed in documents and interviews, stems from chronic shortchanging of the nation's drug safety program. It is one symptom of a federal agency increasingly constrained by a budget that has failed to keep up with costs. This crunch is even more dire in the food division, which tries to keep tainted foodstuffs from supermarket shelves.

Even as concerns grow, the agency has budgeted only $1.6 million for such safety studies of medications already on the market, and that number is scheduled to drop to $900,000 in the coming year. Outside experts estimate that the agency needs $20 million to $100 million a year to conduct such studies.

Recently, three former secretaries of Health and Human Services sounded a public alarm about what they saw as a dangerous squeeze on the overall FDA budget. Tommy G. Thompson, who served in President Bush's first term; Donna Shalala, who served under President Clinton; and Louis W. Sullivan, who served under President George H.W. Bush, joined consumer and industry groups in calling on the administration to substantially boost — perhaps double — the agency's $1.5-billion annual budget, which has increased only modestly in recent years.

FDA officials declined to discuss problems with funding for drug safety, saying the issue was under internal review. In a statement, the agency acknowledged that more money was needed for safety and noted that funding to complete the ADHD study had "not yet been identified."

A special fact-finding panel of the Institute of Medicine recently put the troubles in blunt terms in a report that called for significant FDA changes. Funding for drug safety is "especially inadequate [and] resource limitations have hobbled the agency's ability to improve and expand this essential component of its mission," the panel concluded.

FDA officials estimate the study of ADHD medications, including such well-known brands as Ritalin and Adderall, will cost $2 million to $3 million. About $1 million has been committed.

By analyzing the records of thousands of individuals, outside medical researchers have been trying to determine whether the medications predispose patients to heart attacks and sudden death.

DOJ_NMG_0078614

Most ADHD drugs are derived from powerful stimulants. They help patients concentrate, but they also raise blood pressure, a major risk factor for heart disease and stroke. The medications, once given primarily to children, are increasingly prescribed for adults — a population more susceptible to heart problems. About 2.5 million children and 1.5 million adults now take such medications.

"If the FDA lacks the resources to complete the study of cardiovascular risks of ADHD drugs, the consequences can have a profound adverse impact on public health," said Dr. Steven Nissen, chairman of cardiovascular medicine at the Cleveland Clinic.

"The makers of these agents have no incentive to study the hazards of their own drugs. Therefore, the FDA will likely represent the only entity capable of objectively assessing the safety of the ADHD drugs."

The ADHD study is not the only example of a patchwork system.

The FDA bought — at a cost of $500,000 a year — a British database that is considered a state-of-the-art tool for drug safety research.

The General Practice Research Database contains complete medical records on 4 million patients that can be mined for information on reactions to drugs.

But the FDA has acknowledged that its drug safety office doesn't have enough professionals — epidemiologists, biostatisticians and computer programmers — to take full advantage of the database.

Meanwhile, the 90-person drug safety office is reeling from a surge in reports on medication side effects. The number of such "adverse event" reports jumped from about 250,000 in 2000 to more than 450,000 in 2005.

The trend reflects greater use of prescription drugs, growing awareness of their risks and improvements in the reporting system.

"We have to do difficult triage about which ones we are going to follow up on," said an FDA official closely involved with the agency's budget who asked not to be identified because of the sensitivity of discussions within the Bush administration. "Our funding is just not robust enough for scientific research."

Fully funding the ADHD risk study would mean "we wouldn't be able to do too many other studies," the official added.

The FDA's budget crunch has also hurt its ability to safeguard fresh produce, some critics say. That has become an issue in the aftermath of the E. coli outbreak traced to California spinach. The number of inspectors and field office staffers has been cut from 2,217 in 2003 to about 1,960.

"The agency is like a fire department running around with a little fire extinguisher," said Michael Jacobson, director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a nutrition advocacy group. "The money situation for foods is probably worse than it's ever been."

Earlier this year, the FDA's food division announced that budget pressures had forced cuts in its headquarters workforce from 950 in 2003 to fewer than 850, with further reductions expected.

The FDA has "been presented with unique challenges, and we will not be able to take on the same large number of objectives we have identified in previous years," Robert E. Brackett, director of the food division, wrote in an unusually candid letter to consumer and industry groups. "The challenges are likely to continue [in 2007] and beyond for domestic agencies in the federal government."

The agency's budget challenge has three facets, outside experts and agency officials say.

First, modest annual increases for the FDA have not kept up with escalating salaries for its doctors, pharmacologists, epidemiologists and other professionals. For example, experts in the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research made an average of $70,000 in 1997, but now command salaries of $140,000 to keep up with industry.

A recent internal FDA analysis estimated that the 2006 budget would have needed to be $2.2 billion — not $1.5 billion — just to keep pace with increases in personnel costs.

Second, the post-market drug safety program — with a few exceptions — is not allowed to tap into user fees that pharmaceutical companies pay the agency for the review of proposed new drugs. The user fees add about $400 million a year to the FDA's $1.5-billion budget.

Finally, compared with funding for the National Institutes of Health, which sponsors cutting-edge medical research, securing more money for the FDA has been a low priority for the administration and Congress. The NIH budget has increased from $20.5 billion in 2001 to $28.6 billion.

"There has been a dramatic increase in the attention focused on NIH, and we believe similar attention needs to be given to the FDA," said Sheila Burke, chairwoman of the Institute of Medicine panel that recently reported on drug safety. "The center of that effort has to be an increase in resources. There is no question that it needs to be done."

Meanwhile, despite the uncertainty over funding for the ADHD study, researchers are continuing work on it.

DOJ_NMG_0078615

They plan to use several medical databases to try to address three key issues: whether there is a link between ADHD drugs and higher rates of heart attack and sudden death in children; whether such a risk exists for adults; and whether there is a link between ADHD drugs and heart-rhythm abnormalities in children.

They have designed the study, but without more money won't be able to determine whether these popular drugs can lead to heart attacks.

"That's a very important question," said Laurel Habel, an epidemiologist at the Kaiser Foundation Research Institute in Oakland, which is participating in the study.

"These drugs are being prescribed for a large and growing number of children, and they are also being prescribed to a growing number of adults. And, in general, they are medications that are taken for the long term."

ricardo.alonso-zaldivar@
latimes.com

President Bush To Honor His Father At Ship Christening (VAPILOT)

By Jon Glass

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 7, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS - Today's christening of the aircraft carrier George H.W. Bush may be wet and windy, but workers building the $6 billion warship say they'll be shining.

"This will be a national asset, and I take a lot of pride in that," said Kevin Green, a construction superintendent at Northrop Grumman Newport News, on Friday afternoon. "This is our moment as a company to show off - this is our ship right now."

The massive gray CVN-77 towered 20 stories behind Green as work crews in hard hats and storm gear made final preparations for today's 10 a.m. ceremony in chilly, wind-driven rain. The National Weather Service forecast calls for light rain and 15 to 20 mph northerly winds this morning.

"It's going to be a wonderful day, regardless," said Scott Stabler, vice president of the company's CVN-77 program. "There are a handful of truly great days in shipbuilding, and the christening is one of them."

President Bush will give the keynote address in honor of his father, the carrier's namesake and the nation's 41st president, who will be present.

Construction on the ship, which began in 2001, is about 60 percent completed and is slated for delivery to the Navy in late 2008. The christening is open to the public.

Mr. Fixit (NYT)

By Jacob Heilbrunn

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

One of George W. Bush's most remarkable accomplishments has been to burnish the reputations of his Republican predecessors. The longer Bush is in office, the better they look by comparison. Even realist foreign policy doctrine, revered by Richard Nixon and George H. W. Bush and scorned for decades by the right as a synonym for pusillanimity, has begun to make something of a comeback within the ranks of the party, as William F. Buckley Jr. and George F. Will, among others, look askance at the neoconservative crusade that has issued in the Iraq imbroglio.

It would hardly be surprising if James A. Baker III felt a certain measure of vindication about this unexpected turn of events. Though the ruthlessly efficient Baker preserved — or, if you prefer, secured — Bush's victory in Florida during the contentious 2000 presidential election, he has always been condemned by the right as a moderate. Like many officials from the first Bush administration, including the former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft, Baker was exiled to the sidelines as the younger Bush embraced the right. Unlike Scowcroft, however, Baker has maintained a studied silence about the current Bush administration.

That doesn't change in " 'Work Hard, Study ... and Keep Out of Politics!' " (written with Steve Fiffer). Anyone looking for yet another Republican apostate to denounce Bush should look elsewhere. But there's no need to worry: the stiletto once wielded so deftly by Baker in Washington has not gone dull. Baker, who has already discussed the end of the cold war in an earlier book called "The Politics of Diplomacy," here offers a more personal account that implicitly contrasts the past with the present, and is the more telling for its restraint. He focuses on his years as a political operative and official in the Ford, Reagan and Bush 1 administrations to draw lessons about the importance of planning ahead in running political campaigns and governments. Though his memoir may at some points envelop the Reagan years in a nostalgic haze, it provides an extraordinarily illuminating account of the decades-old Republican feud between old-money power brokers and true believers. Ultimately, it shows how he successfully kept the right in check — and what happens when someone doesn't.

DOJ_NMG_0078616

Baker's pragmatic approach can probably be traced to the fact that money, not the political barricades, was what always interested his forebears: the title of his memoir was the motto of James Addison Baker, his grandfather and the family patriarch, who ran a law firm in Houston and helped transform that city into the capital of the American oil industry. The young Baker dutifully followed in the legal footsteps of his elders, but after the sudden death of his first wife, he was eager for a distraction. In 1970, he dropped out of the Democratic Party and signed on with the Republicans in order to join his longtime tennis doubles partner's campaign for the United States Senate. It failed, but "from that time forward," Baker writes, "I was hooked on politics and forever linked with the candidate, George Herbert Walker Bush." Baker, who chafed at continuing to work as a corporate lawyer, didn't get his big break until 1975, when Bush helped him land his first Washington job as under secretary of commerce in the Ford administration. Soon enough, the political smarts Baker displayed in dealing with unions and trade issues caught the eye of the White House, which tapped him to lead the hunt for swing delegates during the 1976 Republican primary fight against Ronald Reagan, who depicted Gerald Ford and Henry Kissinger as soft on the Red menace.

Baker sent out biographical questionnaires to the delegates and relentlessly stalked the uncommitteds, convinced "the contest would go to the outfit that did the best job of corralling its own herd while picking off strays from the other side." He picked them off. A grateful Ford promoted Baker to run his campaign against Jimmy Carter, but no amount of political savvy could rescue Ford from his serial self-inflicted wounds.

When Bush ran for the Republican presidential nomination in 1980, Baker was in his element. As his campaign manager, Baker drew on a network of contacts to raise money and, in an imitation of the 1976 Carter strategy, plotted to reduce the cluttered field to Reagan versus Bush as rapidly as possible. He succeeded. By sending out one million pieces of mail in the final week before the Iowa caucuses and making thousands of telephone calls, Baker outfoxed the Reagan forces, allowing Bush to score an upset victory. "Hell," said Charles Black, a Reagan political operative, "I didn't know it was gonna be a primary." But the tidal wave of the resurgent right soon washed over the Bush forces, and Bush's only political life preserver was to accept Reagan's offer of the vice-presidential nomination. It was a telling moment. Where Dwight Eisenhower had deigned to offer the vice presidency to Richard Nixon, now the right was the master and the Eastern Establishment the supplicant.

Still, Baker, against all the odds, managed to insinuate himself into the Reagan camp by offering unsolicited advice about the coming election to Reagan's campaign manager, William Casey, and to the Gipper himself. Even though Baker had led primary battles against him, Reagan recognized his talents and named him White House chief of staff. The right was apoplectic: it accused Baker of being a Trojan horse for the Eastern Establishment and of selling out its social agenda on abortion, school prayer and other hot-button issues. Baker knows better: he quotes Reagan as telling him, "Jim, I'd rather get 80 percent of what I want than to go over the cliff with my flag flying." Together with Michael Deaver and Ed Meese, Baker formed a "troika" that exercised firm control. According to him, this system gave Reagan "a functional administrative system to keep things moving, plus a useful way to hear competing views on important issues."

It was no accident that after Baker left to head the Treasury Department, Reagan's second term almost ended in disaster. Had Baker remained in the White House and become national security adviser, he would have unquestionably quashed the cabal that ended up hijacking Central American and Middle Eastern policy. Reagan wrote in his memoir, "My decision not to appoint Jim Baker as national security adviser, I suppose, was a turning point for my administration, although I had no idea at the time how significant it would prove to be." Instead, the lunatics took charge of the asylum, dragging a befuddled Reagan into the arms-for-hostages deal, which turned into the Iran-contra affair — a reckless endeavor prefiguring, in many ways, the ideological zealotry that, on a far grander scale, has mired the United States in Iraq.

As George H. W. Bush's secretary of state, Baker remained the object of the right's ire. Bush's refusal to continue on to Baghdad, reluctance to intervene in Bosnia and criticism of Israel were laid at the doorstep of realists like Baker, whose record was, in truth, not unblemished. Baker's realpolitik could curdle into cynical indifference when it came to the Balkans. But there is a difference between making mistakes and wholesale ineptitude. Only recently has George W. Bush reached out to Baker, acceding to his appointment as co-chairman of a high-level nonpartisan commission on Iraq. By now, however, it's unlikely that even this faithful retainer can once more pull Bush's chestnuts out of the fire.

Kicked While Down (NYT)

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

In a blow to labor unions, the National Labor Relations Board recently expanded the pool of workers exempted from union membership. Specifically, the labor board found that registered nurses who assigned others to some shifts or tasks were supervisors, and thus not eligible to join unions. It was a bad decision, not only because of the specifics of the case, but also in its broader ramifications.

There are good reasons to bar managers from unionizing. It is extremely difficult to run a large organization efficiently if the people at the top are unable to easily hold their managers accountable for overall success or failure. But responsibilities like making out a schedule do not amount to management. If they did, interns would be the only non- managers in many of today's workplaces.

DOJ_NMG_0078617

Companies facing unionization drives have long found it convenient to discover that employees who are basically rank-and-file workers are actually managers. That seems to be the case with the nurses. The board's decision opens the door for possibly millions of health-care workers and other professionals to be disqualified from the option of union protection.

This is one more step curbing the power of organized labor since President Bush came to office. The administration's philosophical vendetta against unions has come at a time when their power is already on the wane. Membership has fallen to 7.8 percent of the private work force in this country, from over a third in the 1950's. Far from balancing the scales, the anti-union drive comes when workers are already at a historic low in bargaining strength. Despite a growing economy and rising productivity, hourly wages adjusted for inflation have declined 2 percent since 2003. Corporate profits, meanwhile, are at their highest share of gross domestic product since the 1960's.

We are getting closer and closer to a work force with no benefits and no substantive protections. Some unions succumbed to corruption and contributed to their own decline. But their role in giving common workers a voice is essential to a functioning society.

The Kennedy Court? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

The Roberts Court started its second term this week, but to read the coverage you might think that the nine-member Supreme Court has been reduced to Justice Anthony Kennedy's single vote.

Of course, Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts are the new members, and it remains to be seen how they'll vote on some of the hot-button issues the court will hear this term. But in replacing Sandra Day O'Connor and William Rehnquist on the court, Messrs. Roberts and Alito have thrust Justice Kennedy onto center-stage, as he now stands squarely between the four liberal and four conservative Justices on a number of issues. We had a foretaste of this last term, with Justice Kennedy playing kingmaker in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld and Rapanos v. U.S. In both cases, the vote was effectively 4-1-4, with Justice Kennedy controlling the outcome and muddying the jurisprudence.

Hamdan dealt with the design of military commissions for trying detainees in the war on terror. Justice Kennedy mostly sided with the liberal minority in the case, turning the liberal bloc into a Kennedian majority and forcing Congress to write a set of rules by which some detainees may soon, finally, be tried. In Rapanos, an environmental-regulation case, Justice Kennedy more or less sided with the conservatives on the Court, but on idiosyncratic grounds that caused the Chief Justice to lament the resulting muddle.

It's unlikely we've seen the last one-man majority from Justice Kennedy. This possibility is not lost on the political left, which explains the current publicity given to Justice Kennedy's role. The hope seems to be that Justice Kennedy can be conditioned with carrots and sticks to make him the next Blackmun or Souter -- earning praise for his "moderation" if he votes with the liberal wing, but earning obloquy if he tacks right.

Thus, we can expect a good deal of hand-wringing about whether Justice Kennedy will take an "activist" view in the partial-birth abortion case docketed for November. Here the Court will weigh the constitutionality of the 2003 Partial-Birth Abortion Act. In 2000, the Court struck down a Nebraska law banning partial-birth abortions by a 5-4 vote. Justice Kennedy vigorously dissented from that decision, writing that the majority had misinterpreted Planned Parenthood v. Casey, the 1992 decision that Justice Kennedy helped write. This would seem to offer Justice Kennedy a clear rationale for upholding the federal ban on partial-birth abortions, which may be why pundits are already wondering aloud whether Justice Kennedy will adhere to his "strong respect for stare decisis."

In December the court will hear two consolidated race-related cases; both deal with the use of race in assigning public-school students to classrooms. In the 2003 University of Michigan affirmative-action cases, Sandra Day O'Connor cast the deciding votes. The Court upheld the Michigan law school's racial-preference program. Justice Kennedy dissented from that decision, but did so on the grounds that the decision didn't give judges adequate authority to review racial-preference programs in the future. Given this judicial-supremacist line of reasoning, it is difficult to know how Justice Kennedy will approach the racial-preference cases the Court will hear this term.

What is clear is that Justice Kennedy enjoys being in the position of he who decides. It seems this term will offer him ample scope to play Solomon. The problem with this "swing-vote" theory is that it trivializes the Court into a results-based political body when there are real judicial disputes to settle. The Court would be best helped if Justice Kennedy pointed it toward clarity rather than judicial confusion.

DOJ_NMG_0078618

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Job Numbers Remain Strong (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Unemployment went down and paychecks went up last month, the government said yesterday, and it added that job growth for the year ending in March may have been far stronger than previously thought.

The announcements were greeted warmly by the White House -- and less so by the financial markets. Stock and bond prices fell amid fears the tight job market, by adding to inflation, will compel the Federal Reserve to hold interest rates steady or even raise them to slow economic growth. Many traders had convinced themselves that the Fed would cut rates early next year, but that looks increasingly unlikely.

President Bush traveled yesterday to a FedEx sorting facility to tout the job numbers and the rest of the Republican economic record a month before congressional elections.

"I'm pleased with the economic progress we're making," he said as other White House representatives used multiple briefings and statements to highlight yesterday's news.

The Labor Department's employment report -- and other figures released last week -- depict an economy that remained generally healthy in September outside of the slumping housing market. Workers found jobs and got paid more, while consumers hit the stores and auto showrooms to spend some of the extra cash gained from falling gasoline prices.

The unemployment rate fell to 4.6 percent in September from 4.7 percent in August, which was down from 4.8 percent in July. The jobless rate has varied from 4.6 to 4.8 percent all year. Considering that a few workers have such poor skills as to be nearly unemployable, many economists consider a rate below 5 percent to constitute full employment, meaning just about every worker with the skills and desire to work can find a job.

Demand for labor helped drive workers' average hourly wages, not including those of most managers, up to $16.84 last month. That's a 4 percent increase from September 2005, the fastest wage growth in more than five years.

But other details in the Labor report bolstered some economists' expectations that unemployment will rise as the housing downturn drags on, cooling economic growth to a below-average pace for many months.

The number of jobs on employers' payrolls rose only slightly in September, as employers turned more cautious in their hiring. Retailers, temporary employment agencies and manufacturers cut nearly as many jobs as other employers added. And a measure of the number of hours worked across the country slipped slightly last month, as it did the month before -- a tentative sign of softening labor demand.

The major stock indicators all fell yesterday, with analysts seeing the weak job growth as further evidence that economic growth is slowing while inflation pressures remain high. The Dow Jones industrial average, which had hit new records on three consecutive days last week, lost 16.48 points yesterday, or 0.14 percent, to close at 11,850.21.

The report reflects "an economy with a solid labor force," said Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research Corp. But with low unemployment and rising wages, he said, "there's simply no way you can paint this report other than inflationary."

The Bush administration emphasized the positive. The president's advisers have been frustrated that he gets little credit for an economy that remains healthy by many measures. Just 39 percent of those questioned in the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll in August approved of Bush's handling of the economy, compared with 59 percent who disapproved.

"This economy is strong and growing," White House budget director Rob Portman said during a meeting with reporters. "The president's pro-growth policies, including the tax relief, are working."

Democrats rejected the administration effort as spin. "Under their economic policies, the rich are getting richer, the poor are getting poorer and the middle class is getting squeezed," Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement. "President Bush may be 'pleased' with what his economy has done, but hard-working families know America needs a new direction."

Bush decided to highlight economic issues yesterday by spending part of his morning at the FedEx facility in Northeast Washington. He conducted an hour-long roundtable with business executives who described how they got started, and he used their stories to emphasize his tax cuts and other initiatives.

Bush also said he sees increasing protectionism and isolationism among the American people. When Clifton Broumand, who owns a Maryland company that makes keyboards and computer mice, complained that China rips off designs for his products, Bush shared the lament. "This is the problem," the president said.

DOJ_NMG_0078619

Democrats sought to shift attention to slowing economic growth, which has cooled from a torrid 5.6 percent annual rate in the first three months of the year to a pace closer to 2 percent in the second half of the year, by many estimates.

"Slower economic growth is taking its toll on job creation," declared Jack Reed (R.I.), the ranking Senate Democrat on Congress's Joint Economic Committee.

Though unemployment dipped, yesterday's data showed that employers added just 51,000 new jobs in September, a negligible number in an economy with 135.6 million payroll workers.

Labor analysts also released a preliminary finding that the economy may have added 810,000 more jobs than previously tallied in the 12 months that ended in March. If that estimate holds, it would mark a much bigger revision than usually occurs during a lengthy process of gathering information from unemployment insurance filings. And it would help explain why tax revenue surged so unexpectedly this spring and why consumer spending has held steady even as the cooling housing market has slowed the nation's economic growth.

The employers that added jobs last month included doctor's offices, hospital, insurers, lenders, restaurants and businesses that needed accountants and managers.

Employment related to housing has flattened, according to the Economic Policy Institute, which focuses on labor issues. Last year, housing-related industries -- construction, real estate and lending -- added 321,000 jobs, according to the institute's calculations. This year, they've added 6,000.

Another sign of potential weakness is the continuing decline in temporary service agency jobs, which have fallen by 36,000 since December. Employers tend to add temps as the economy gains momentum, waiting to see if the growth continues before adding permanent employees. Conversely, during a slowdown, "when layoffs may become necessary, the contract or temp workers are the first out the door," said Ray Stone, of Stone & McCarthy Research Associates.

US Labour Market Tighter Than Estimated (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington And Daniel Pimlott, Michael Mackenzie And Richard Beales In New York

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

The US economy added many more jobs than previously estimated in the later stages of the current cycle, dramatic new data revealed on Friday, raising the prospect that the labour market today may also be tighter than previously thought.

According to the new figures, the economy added 810,000 more jobs than earlier estimated between April 2005 and March 2006, an average of 67,500 more jobs every month over that period.

The upward revision – the biggest in a quarter of a century – casts the expansion in a new light, leaving it less “jobless” than before, though the rate of job creation since the 2001 recession remains low by historic standards.

Friday’s employment report also showed the unemployment rate fell from 4.7 per cent to 4.6 per cent in September.

The latest non-farm payroll numbers offered a mixed picture, with only 51,000 jobs added in September – well short of analysts’ estimates of about 125,000 – but a combined 61,000 upward revision for July and August.

The job market data sent stocks and bonds lower as the signs of unexpectedly high employment outweighed the weak headline growth in September.

Meanwhile, the Congressional Budget Office announced that it was cutting its estimate for the federal budget deficit by another $10bn to $250bn, down from $318bn the previous year.

Bush administration economic officials seized on the jobs and deficit numbers to try to draw political debate away from the scandal in Congress on to the economy ahead of mid-term elections next month.

“We now find we created not 5.7m new jobs but 6.6m new jobs since August 2003,” Rob Portman, director of the office of management and budget, said on Friday. “That happens to be about the time when the president’s tax relief was fully implemented.”

Mr Portman said the official figures for the deficit, which will be announced next week, will also be better than forecast in July, with tax revenues higher than their historic average of 18.2 per cent of gross domestic product. Some analysts said that the employment report vindicated the Federal Reserve’s continued focus on inflation in spite of signs of slowing economic growth in the US.

“A few key aspects of the report are strong and will add to fears that labour market resources are tight and will keep the pressure on the Fed to err on the side of tightening,” said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Hourly wages rose by 0.2 per cent, bringing the year-on-year increase to 4.0 per cent.

“The 810,000 upward revision was far larger than typical, and implies an increment of almost 70,000 to monthly payroll gains in the year ending in March,” said Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America.

Joshua Shapiro, chief US economist at MFR, said the revisions pointed to “a much more vibrant labour market in the not too distant past than had been reported earlier”.

DOJ_NMG_0078620

Stocks were lower on the news after three days of multi-year highs. Treasuries also fell on fears the report made it less likely the Fed would cut rates next year.

"The bond market was looking for further signs of moderation and didn't get it," said Kevin Flanagan, fixed income strategist at Morgan Stanley.

He said the upward revisions and wage growth did not support the market perception the Fed could cut rates soon.

But other economists questioned the reliability of the data.

"We are skeptical, given the quality of the data," said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics.

The US jobs report also indicated that people evacuated as a result of Hurricane Katrina are still struggling to find work a year on.

The unemployment rate for evacuees was 8.3 per cent in September.

But the rate was much higher for evacuees who were not living in their old homes.

Job Growth Was Slack Last Month (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

For American workers, the job market is starting to look a lot less inviting.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that employment grew by just 51,000 jobs in September, adding slack job growth to the emerging tableau of an economy gradually slowed by higher interest rates, expensive energy and a sputtering housing sector.

In the last three years, the American economy has added about six million jobs. Unemployment, which dipped to 4.6 percent last month, has fallen to the lowest point since early 2001. And in recent months, the wages of ordinary workers have finally started to increase enough to slightly outpace inflation.

But the new government data, said Joseph LaVorgna, chief United States economist at Deutsche Bank, suggests that "the best news on job creation is behind us."

The payroll growth recorded in September — culled from a survey of some 300,000 businesses that is seasonally adjusted in an effort to factor out normal variations — was the weakest since October of last year. And even though job growth for the previous two months was revised up significantly, it now appears that payroll growth has decelerated sharply.

From March 2005 through March 2006, according to new information from the Labor Department, job growth averaged 236,000 a month. For the last three months, it has averaged just 121,000.

Analysts said the downshift puts the Federal Reserve and its chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, in a good position to keep interest rates steady.

"The slowdown the Fed wants to engineer is clearly in the data," said Robert J. Barbera, chief economist of ITG Hoenig. "This is just what the doctor ordered if the doctor is Ben Bernanke."

Still, the job market may not be quite as weak as the monthly number suggested. Not only did unemployment — based on a separate survey of households that showed more robust employment gains — fall slightly to 4.6 percent from 4.7 percent in August, but paychecks also recorded some of their biggest gains so far this year.

Hourly wages for regular workers, excluding managers, rose 4 percent in September compared with a year earlier. This was the same as in August but higher than any other month since June 2001 —when workers were still benefiting from inertial wage gains coming out of the Internet-fueled economy of the late 1990's.

The mixed signals left financial markets divided, with the bond market falling while stocks mostly treaded water.

Contributing to the confusion was an unusually large annual revision of payrolls, with the Labor Department now saying that it had undercounted employment growth by 810,000 jobs from March 2005 to March 2006.

In surveying employers in September, though, the government found that most were being much more cautious than earlier in the year.

Health care providers added 24,000 jobs. Hotels and restaurants increased employment by 19,000. Manufacturers cut 19,000 jobs in September; retailers shed 12,000.

And while construction companies unexpectedly added 8,000 jobs, experts do not think they will be hiring much in the future, and many may soon be shedding workers.

"It's going to be a teeter-totter," said Kenneth Simonson, chief economist of the Associated General Contractors of America. "I would expect construction growth over the next 12 months to be minimal, perhaps less than 1 percent."

Over all, the index of total hours worked in the private sector, the broadest measure of demand for labor, declined from 105.1 to 105.0 in September. But some economists, looking at other evidence like healthy consumer spending and the recent decline in gasoline prices, predicted that the current slowdown in employment will not last.

DOJ_NMG_0078621

"If you were a lawyer, you would have no problem prosecuting this for reasonable doubt," said John Ryding, chief United States economist at Bear Stearns. "I would prosecute that any day."

He added that he expected the tight job market to put further pressure on the Fed to raise interest rates again soon.

President Bush pointed to the decline in unemployment as evidence that his economic policies are working, urging Congress to extend his tax cuts beyond their planned expiration at the end of the decade.

"Today we got more good news," President Bush said in a speech at a Federal Express operation in Washington. "I'm pleased with the economic progress we're making."

Still, most economists see a slowing economy taking its toll on hiring, with many now predicting that the Fed's next interest rate movement will be down, as it moves next year to try to revive growth.

"The Fed now has less justification to raise interest rates in the future," said Anthony Chan, chief economist at J. P. Morgan Private Client Services.

Mr. Bernanke, in a speech in New York on Wednesday, said that he also foresaw slower growth. He predicted that the falloff in the housing market would shave output in the second half of the year by about one percentage point.

By and large, economists are not uncomfortable with the gradual deceleration of economic growth recorded to far. "The trend doesn't appear to be that alarming at all," Mr. Chan said.

But the changing condition of the labor market may not be so benign for workers. "The data is consistent with stable to modestly rising unemployment," Mr. Barbera said. "Roughly 4.5 percent unemployment is as tight as it's going to get. I see no obvious additional increases in workers' bargaining power."

Sluggish Job Growth Could Affect Elections (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. economy added a disappointing 51,000 jobs last month, the government said Friday, and although hiring in July and August was revised sharply higher, lackluster employment growth is still expected to dog Republicans in upcoming midterm elections.

The economy is slowing from last year's pace but has proven to be resilient, weathering a housing slowdown while providing modest wage gains in recent months. Falling energy prices have also helped. On Friday, investors pushed up bond yields, signaling faith that the economy won't slow as much as they once believed.

But President Bush and his party have struggled to capitalize on such gains, analysts and polls say. Even with the Federal Reserve pausing its campaign to raise interest rates, Republicans face voters worried about jobs and the possibility of a recession.

As a result, Republicans could lose several seats in both houses of Congress, analysts say.

"There's an uncomfortable problem for Republicans right now — which is the economy is headed toward slower growth in response to Federal Reserve policy," said Kevin Hassett, director of economic policy studies at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

"The economy has been doing well in recent years and Republicans may not have received enough credit, but that's all going to become irrelevant in November because we're getting all this disappointing data," Hassett said.

Analysts had expected 120,000 new jobs for September, and instead saw the slowest monthly job growth since October 2005, according to data from the Labor Department on Friday.

The economy has added an average 137,000 jobs a month this year versus 165,000 last year. Employment grew 1.2% this year, down from 1.5% last year and 1.6% in 2004, according to the Labor Department.

Offsetting the disappointing September data were revised Labor Department figures showing that 188,000 new jobs were added in August, 60,000 more than originally reported. July hiring was also revised higher by 2,000 jobs, to 123,000. That brought the average monthly jobs gains to 121,000 this quarter.

The Labor Department also revised upward by 810,000 its estimate of the number of new jobs added in the 12 months ended in March, bringing that period's monthly average up to 200,000. A final estimate is expected in February.

The unemployment rate fell to 4.6% in September from 4.7% in August.

Some analysts pointed to September wage gains as a sign of increasing economic strength. Average hourly and weekly earnings rose 0.2% last month, and both are up 4% for the year. Analysts said that could lead to wage gains beating inflation if oil prices don't rise again soon.

"There are risks to the economy going forward, but I don't think this particular report shows risks," said Ethan Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Bros. in New York. "I think this shows an economy that's doing well."

DOJ_NMG_0078622

Still, Democrats continued to seize on sluggish job creation and wage gains. Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), ranking Democrat on the congressional Joint Economic Committee, released a statement Friday berating the administration for creating fewer jobs than in past recoveries.

"Job growth has been quite modest and wages have not kept pace with high energy prices and soaring healthcare costs," Reed wrote.

Bush touted Friday's job numbers during a morning visit to a FedEx Corp. office at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., and deployed Cabinet members to spread the message nationwide.

"Wages are going up, energy prices are falling, which means people are going to have more money in their pocket to save, invest or spend," Bush said.

Californians were almost evenly divided on the economy in the coming year, with 45% expecting good times, 43% expecting bad times and 12% undecided, according to a poll released last week by the nonpartisan Public Policy Institute of California in San Francisco. Likely voters were more optimistic: 48% expected good times ahead; 40%, bad times; and 12% undecided.

One reason for increased consumer confidence may be lower gasoline prices, which dropped to a national average of $2.31 this week, according to the Energy Department.

"The easing of gas prices is one of those signals in the economy that tells people they don't have to worry about inflation and rising prices as much as they might have been feeling," said Mark Baldassare, the institute's research and survey director.

Homeowners who have seen the value of their homes double in recent years have reason to feel encouraged too, said Dean Baker, co-director of the left-leaning Center for Economic and Policy Research in Washington. Employment was up last month in construction, and the sector added 36,000 jobs during the last three months. Real estate held steady, employing 2.1% more workers than this time last year.

But homeowners who have borrowed heavily against their homes now worry that, as housing sales and starts fall, prices will nose-dive, Baker said. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke warned earlier this week that housing is likely to undergo a "substantial correction."

"Certainly in large chunks of the country — the East Coast, California, Florida, Seattle — housing has been going up and now that they see a turn. That has to be kind of scary," Baker said. "People's confidence about the future is limited. We've sort of been treading water but there's a lot of bad signs on the horizon."

Manufacturing and retail both shed jobs last month: 19,000 in manufacturing, including 3,800 at textile mills, and 11,900 in retail. Manufacturing has lost 12% of its workforce during the last year.

Harris, the Lehman Bros. analyst, predicts that the economy will weather the housing slump and add an average 100,000 jobs a month during the next year, growing at an annual rate of 2.5% during the next three to four quarters as it coasts toward the Fed's intended soft landing. The economy grew 2.6% in the second quarter after posting a 5.6% rate in the first three months.

On Friday, Harris joined the consensus among analysts, who expect the Fed to pause again at its next meeting Oct. 24 to see how much the economy is slowing, rather than raise interest rates to combat signs of wage inflation in the jobs report.

"They've got a tough choice" between fighting inflation and preventing a recession, Harris said. "You can't fight both wars at the same time."

molly.hennessy-fiske@latimes
.com

Jobs Report Shows A Mixed Picture (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

Job creation sputtered in September, in a sign that the economy is cooling, but other data suggested that the labor market is still producing enough jobs to boost wages.

The Labor Department Friday released the mixed data, which economists said made any interest-rate changes by the Federal Reserve unlikely before year's end. Speaking ahead of congressional elections next month, Bush administration officials said the figures pointed to a healthy economy.

Payrolls of nonfarm employers increased by 51,000 in September after a gain of 188,000 in August, according to the data. Last month's tepid pace of hiring -- the weakest since the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina last fall -- is fresh evidence that the economy is still slowing under the weight of higher interest rates and a weakening housing market.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez2 comments on the jobs data and the state of the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0078623

President Bush speaks3 on the new economic data, stressing that entrepreneurs are helped low taxes and intellectual property rights.

Journal reporter Lee Hawkins says4 that one of the reasons for disappointing September job numbers are the massive layoffs in the automotive sector.

Council of Economic Advisors chairman Edward Lazear explains5 the revisions in job data, which he says suggest balance and robustness in the economy, including growth in non-residential construction.

DESKTOP NEWS ALERTS

6

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.7

At the same time, though, unemployment dipped to 4.6% in September from 4.7% the previous month. Hourly pay for workers occupying production or nonmanagerial positions rose 0.2%, putting the average hourly wage 4% higher than a year ago.

And revisions of previous data showed that employers added 60,000 more jobs in August than initially estimated. The Labor Department said it expects upcoming revisions to show that the economy created roughly 70,000 more jobs per month in the year that ended in March than initially estimated.

Economists said the latest data suggest that the Federal Reserve is unlikely to change interest rates before year's end. "We continue to see the [Fed] on hold for the time being," said Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America Corp.

The Fed halted its rate-raising campaign in August in hopes of easing inflation through slower economic growth.

A main reason it may not feel the need to raise rates further to stem inflation, besides the recent drop in oil prices, is that wage growth isn't putting the kind of upward pressure on prices that it has in past economic expansions.

"Wage pressures are cresting," said Zoltan Pozsar, an economist at Moody's Economy.com9. He said average hourly earnings expanded at a 4.5% annual rate in the second quarter, but then grew at a slower pace of 3.9% in the third quarter.

Bond investors focused on the upward revisions to earlier months' employment and other signs of job market firmness in the report, and drove down bond prices. As a result, the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.7%.

The decline in the politically prominent unemployment rate, the upward revisions to last year's payrolls and the modest acceleration in wage growth could help the Bush administration's efforts to play up the strengths of the economy heading into next month's congressional elections. "The labor market to my mind is still very tight," Edward Lazear, chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, told reporters Friday.

Mr. Lazear also highlighted that construction employment has held up despite the continuing decline in home building. The Labor Department said employment in residential construction and trade contractors fell by 15,600 jobs last month but rose by 15,800 jobs for nonresidential construction. He said that was evidence that the economy is in transition to greater dependence on business investment and exports, from its reliance on housing and consumer spending. "I like the fact the economy is becoming more balanced," he said.

Employment even picked up at some building-equipment and garden-supply stores last month. Home-improvement chain Lowe's Cos. said it employs 25,000 more workers now than it did a year ago.

Elsewhere, there are signs that the housing slump is hitting the labor market. Wood-product and furniture manufacturers cut a total of 7,700 positions in September and have trimmed jobs compared with a year ago, according to the Labor Department. Real-estate employment has flatlined since June.

Mortgage banking titan Countrywide Financial Corp. said it is in the process of eliminating between 5% and 10% of nonrevenue-generating positions as part of a plan to trim its budget by $500 million this year.

One bright spot for the labor market has been the stock-market rally. Financial-services firms added 16,000 jobs in September and roughly 170,000 positions over the past year, the Labor Department said.

St. Louis brokerage firm Edward Jones said it hired 289 future investment representatives last month, its second-highest monthly intake ever.

Price Woodward, who oversees recruiting for the company, said Edward Jones increased broker compensation by roughly 25% this year after several years of holding pay steady. The typical first-year broker at the company will earn $54,000 in annual compensation, Mr. Woodward said, although 60% of that is from commissions and bonuses.

Separately, the Federal Reserve said consumer credit rose at a 2.6% annual rate in August against 4.3% in July, another sign of slowing economic activity. The data do not include mortgages.

-- Greg Ip contributed to this article.

DOJ_NMG_0078624

Unemployment Falls; Wages Up 4 Percent (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

The nation's unemployment rate fell to 4.6 percent last month, down from 4.7 in August, and average wages rose by 4 percent over the previous year -- the best performance for both measures in five years.

The monthly Labor Department report released yesterday revealed that 51,000 new jobs were reported last month, a disappointing figure, but job gains were stronger than reported earlier for the previous year and a half.

"The economy is actually stronger than these employment numbers suggest," said Bernard Baumohl, executive director of the Economic Outlook Group, a Princeton, N.J., economic-advisory firm. The figures were mixed and elicited widely varying reactions from financial markets and analysts.

The stock market declined after focusing on the weakness in job growth, which was the lowest new-jobs figure since Hurricane Katrina blew a hole in the economy last year, and included sizable job losses in manufacturing and retail trade as factories and stores continued to retrench.

A revision in the number of jobs created in August, to 188,000, and a huge revision adding 810,000 to the number of jobs created between March 2005 and March 2006 sparked fears of inflation in the bond market and suggested an underlying strength in the labor market that is unlikely to dissipate anytime soon.

"At the very least, this shows the soft landing is still on course," Mr. Baumohl said. "There is little to suggest that we are on the precipice of a recession."

Roger M. Kubarych, economist at HVB Group, said the report was "mixed," but the downtrend in job growth is likely to continue this fall and raise further concerns about economic weakness.

"Announced job cuts in the motor vehicles and computer industry will be taking effect in the next few months, so payroll gains will likely subside further," he said. Since workers laid off in those industries tend to be highly paid, their job losses "may temper wage increases" later this year, he said.

Dean Baker, economist with the Center for Economic and Policy Research, said that while the report showed some hidden strengths, the continued addition of jobs in housing-related construction and finance seems unlikely to continue, given the big drops in home sales and mortgage financings in the last year.

"With housing data showing a sharp downturn, it is implausible that employment in the sector will not soon be affected," he said. "Given that employment elsewhere is already weak, when the downturn in the housing-related sectors begins to show up, the prospects for employment will be bleak."

Embattled House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert sought to highlight the good news as he and other Republican leaders struggle to maintain their majority in Congress.

"September's lower unemployment rate, steady job growth and increased hourly earnings comes on the heels of a record-setting week on Wall Street," the Illinois Republican noted.

Peter Morici, a former chief economist at the International Trade Commission, said the Federal Reserve should be pleased with the soft growth shown in the report.

"Subpar jobs-and-wage growth indicates the economy is slowing significantly and underperforming its potential. In the months ahead, loosening labor-market conditions will put a lid on wages and help contain inflation," he said. "Along with lower gasoline and natural-gas prices, modest wage pressures will keep prices in check and the Federal Reserve will have no cause to raise interest rates."

For workers, the picture is decidedly mixed, Mr. Morici said. Those with more education and skills in professions like health care, finance and information technology have little trouble finding jobs, while those with only a high school education face higher unemployment rates around 6 percent.

Displaced manufacturing workers are having a particularly difficult time, as factories continue to shed jobs despite growth in exports and big-ticket capital goods.

"Had the current economic expansion followed the pattern of past recoveries, 2 million manufacturing jobs would have been regained" instead of lost, he said. The layoffs in manufacturing have been concentrated in the Rust Belt and are having an impact on the upcoming elections.

"Much of the stress in the jobs market falls in contested congressional districts in western Pennsylvania, New York and the lower Midwest," he said. "This combination of economics and geography explains why Republicans are in danger of losing control of the House of Representatives."

Shares Rest After A Record Week (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0078625

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

Wall Street ended a record-breaking week quietly yesterday, edging lower after the Labor Department said employers added far fewer jobs than expected last month. The major indexes all scored big gains for the week.

While the jobs report gave investors further confirmation that the economy was slowing — employers created just 51,000 new jobs last month, well off the 120,000 Wall Street expected — the market is now concerned that the economy might be moderating too much.

Even the prospect of a rate cut by the Federal Reserve came as little comfort yesterday.

"We've had a market that wants to see bad news as good news with respect to the Fed," said Bryan Piskorowski, a market analyst at Wachovia Securities. Now, he said, the economy is slowing, the housing market is slowing, and consumer spending is starting to slow. "You run that tight wire where bad news eventually becomes bad news," he said.

Investors concerned about the jobs report yesterday were also disappointed by news of the resignation of a General Motors board member who had lobbied unsuccessfully for an alliance with other automakers.

Still, hopes for a Fed rate cut as well as a further decline in oil prices helped drive the Dow Jones industrial average to three consecutive record closes this week. The blue chips also set new intraday highs. Broader indexes showed robust gains, though remained well below their records.

The Dow fell 16.48 points, or 0.14 percent, to 11,850.21 yesterday, slightly below the record close of 11,866.69 set the day before. For the week, the Dow was up 1.47 percent.

Broader stock indicators also fell yesterday. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was down 3.64 points, or 0.27 percent, to 1,349.58, and the Nasdaq composite index fell 6.35 points, or 0.28 percent, to 2,299.99. For the week, the S.& P. gained 1.03 percent, while the Nasdaq gained 1.84 percent.

Light crude oil settled down 27 cents at $59.76 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Investors are still paying close attention to oil prices, as their decline has helped drive the market's upward rise in recent months. Crude prices are down sharply from their trading high of $78.40 a barrel set in July.

G.M. was down $2.08, or 6.3 percent, to $31.05 after Jerome York resigned from the automaker's board after the company's failure to form an alliance with the Nissan Motor Company of Japan and Renault of France.

In other corporate news, Micron Technology fell $2.40, or 13.7 percent, to $15.14 after issuing a profit report that disappointed investors. Lackluster sales of flash memory chips raised questions about the company's efforts to diversify.

Crown Castle International, which builds signal towers for mobile phones, declined $1.65, or 4.7 percent, to $33.10, after agreeing to acquire a rival, Global Signal, for $4 billion in cash and stock. Global Signal rose $3.84, or 7.7 percent, to $53.94.

Chattem rose $9.77, or 28.4 percent, to $44.20 after it agreed to buy five over-the-counter products, including mouthwash and a sleep aid, from Johnson & Johnson and Pfizer.

Bonds fell, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note losing 21/32, to 10113/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.69 percent, from 4.60 percent late Thursday.

Wall Street Dips But Finishes Week Higher (FT)

By John O'doherty In New York

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

US stocks dipped on Friday, but finished the week higher after three consecutive days of record closing peaks for the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

Aerospace group Boeing led gainers on the Dow, up 6.1 per cent over the week to $83.68. On Tuesday, EADS, the parent of Boeing's rival Airbus, issued a €4.8bn ($6bn) profit warning and said delivery of its A380 superjumbo would be delayed by a further year. Christian Streiff, chief executive of Airbus, said it could take a decade for Airbus to catch up with Boeing.

The blue chip index was also buoyed by gains in chemicals group Dupont, which added 4.9 per cent to $44.95. Industrial products group Honeywell gained 3.4 per cent to $42.31.

Coffee chain Starbucks jumped 12.8 per cent to $38.41 – its best week in six years – after it said September same-store sales had risen 6 per cent, almost double analysts' estimates. The company raised its growth target to 40,000 outlets worldwide.

Investors in casino operator Harrah's Entertainment hit the jackpot after private equity groups Apollo and Texas Pacific made a $15bn offer to take the company private, pushing its shares up 15 per cent to $76.41. The Dow Jones Wilshire Gambling Index has gained 17 per cent in the past eight weeks.

Sovereign Bancorp added 12 per cent to a three-year high of $24.10 after reports that the bank's board could terminate the contract of the chairman and chief executive, potentially opening it up to takeover bids.

At the close, the Dow was up 1.5 per cent over the week, but down 0.1 per cent or 16.48 points on the day, at 11,850.21.

DOJ_NMG_0078626

The S&P 500 was up 1 per cent for the week, but down 0.3 per cent or 3.64 points on the day, at 1,349.58.

The Nasdaq Composite gained 1.8 per cent over the week to 2,299.59, a loss of 0.3 per cent or 6.35 points on the day.

Equities were supported by hopes that the outlook for the economy was improving.

"I think a soft-landing is absolutely what's going to happen," said Fritz Meyer, senior investment officer at Aim Investments.

"Sentiment has been increasing that there is more momentum in the economy than we thought, and the inflation statistics continue to look good."

General Motors dropped 6.6 per cent to $31.05 after Kirk Kerkorian said he would not buy additional stock in the company following its rejection of an alliance with Renault and Nissan. Mr Kerkorian's Tracinda investment group holds a 9.9 per cent stake in GM.

Recruitment and advertising website Monster Worldwide leapt 10.5 per cent to $39.98 after positive analyst comment on the stock. Morgan Stanley said Monster was well-positioned to benefit from the shift to online job listings.

There were mixed fortunes for makers of medical equipment. Quest Diagnostic, maker of medical testing equipment, tumbled 16.1 per cent to $51.30. On Tuesday, the company said it had lost its contract with health insurer UnitedHealth, a contract that accounts for 7 per cent of Quest's revenues.

St Jude Medical was more fortunate, jumping 8.9 per cent over the week to $38.43, after two of its implantable heart devices were approved by European regulators.

Falling crude oil prices depressed energy stocks in the first part of the week, although an informal agreement on a production cut by the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries mitigated some of the losses. The S&P Energy Index finished the week down 1.3 per cent.

Hess slid 5.6 per cent to $39.12, while National Oilwell Varco sank 6.6 per cent to $53.88 after JPMorgan lowered its rating on the stock from "overweight" to "neutral", citing earnings risk in North America.

Retailers were in focus after mostly reporting better-than-expected sales in September.

Circuit City gained 8.4 per cent to $27.21, and Nordstrom rose 5.7 per cent to $44.69. Department store Dillards sank 6.8 per cent to $30.49 after it disappointed analysts with flat same-store sales in December.

Drugstore CVS lost 8.7 per cent to $29.32 as Wal-Mart announced it was expanding its discounted sales of generic drugs.

Micron Technologies, the maker of computer memory chips, slumped 13 per cent to $15.14 after its 47 per cent increase in fourth-quarter profit fell short of estimates.

Economy For Bellwether GE, A Big Report Card (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

Investors will be watching anxiously Friday when General Electric Co. reports third-quarter financial results. The industrial and financial giant disappointed investors with both its first- and second-quarter results. And the U.S. economy, for which GE has long been considered a bellwether, appears to have cooled in recent months.

This is a "critical quarter" for GE, says Ann Duignan, an analyst with Bear Stearns, noting investors' earlier disquiet. GE shares are up 13% in the past three months, but still trail the Dow Jones Industrial Average for the year.

Beyond GE, Ms. Duignan says, investors will "try to read into GE's comments what could follow for other companies." GE's far-flung operations touch much of the economy, from power turbines and media to aircraft engines, consumer credit and corporate financing. GE's plastics unit sells to the auto industry, and its appliance business is a barometer of housing. Ms. Duignan says orders for GE's aircraft engines, turbines, rail locomotives and oil-and-gas equipment look strong.

But a growing share of GE's business now comes from outside the U.S., which could help the company bridge a U.S. slowdown. International sales are projected to account for 49% of GE's estimated $163 billion of revenue this year, up from 40% five years ago.

Its airline-engines unit, for example, landed September orders from Qatar Airways, China Eastern Airlines and Ireland's AerVenture, with a combined value of nearly $15 billion. The transportation unit signed a $650 million contract for 310 new locomotives from Kazakhstan's national railroad. GE's energy unit recently opened a technology center in Warsaw to help develop coal-gasification equipment intended to reduce emissions that contribute to global warming.

Analysts estimate GE will post third-quarter revenue of $39.9 billion, down about 5% from a year ago, reflecting the sale of most of GE's insurance business. They peg earnings at 49 cents a share, up 11%.

GE rarely misses those targets. But analysts and investors sometimes fret about the "quality" of GE's posted numbers. In the second quarter, that meant concerns about an unexpectedly low tax rate at GE's financial units and an unexpected gain from the sale of a portion of GE's stake in Penske Truck Leasing. To minimize future complaints, GE has since outlined potential future gains from small sales, which the company says will be offset by increased pension and restructuring costs.

DOJ_NMG_0078627

One critical unit to watch: the energy unit that makes power-plant turbines, which is recovering from a long slump that followed the collapse of Enron Corp. GE told investors this summer that operating profit at the unit would rise 25% to 30% in the second half of the year after falling 6% in the first half of the year.

Dow Set A Record In Height, But Weight Had A Lot To Do With That (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

Averages can be deceiving, as many investors can attest.

The Dow Jones industrial average, the best-known stock index in the United States, broke through its old high this week, for the first time exceeding the level of 10,722 set on Jan. 14, 2000. But only 10 of the 30 stocks in the index are higher than they were then.

By contrast, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was 9 percent lower than it was in January 2000, and even farther below its level when it peaked in March of that year. But most stocks in that index are higher than they were in 2000.

The Nasdaq composite index, which a decade ago was often cited as an indicator of small-stock performance, is still more than 40 percent below its high levels of 2000. But the Russell 2000, also viewed as an indicator of small-stock performance, is up more than 40 percent since January 2000.

How can that be? It relates to how the indexes are computed, and to what they capture. The Dow never had the technology representation of some other indexes, which held it back in the old days and holds it up now. Moreover, it is calculated on a price-weighted basis, so that high-priced stocks have larger influences than lower-priced ones.

The S.& P., like most indexes, is calculated on a market capitalization basis, which means the most important stocks are the ones with the highest market value. Many of those stocks were swept up in 2000, as conservative investors bought the big-cap stocks, and are still recovering from that overvaluation.

The Nasdaq composite was, and is, heavily influenced by technology stocks. But the Russell 2000, which is periodically reconstituted to include the stocks with market capitalization ranks from 1,001 to 3,000, dropped many of those overvalued stocks as they grew larger, and thus was not as hurt in the bubble's aftermath.

As the graphic shows, the markets to invest in since 2000 have not been the ones most investors were comfortable with then. Most European markets are shown as being higher than they were in early 2000, but most or all of those increases reflect the fact that the moves are based on dollar performance. The CAC 40 in France, for example, is shown as being up 13 percent, but it is down almost 10 percent in euros. The gain came solely from the dollar's weakness.

The big winners were in emerging markets, often ones that investors had good reasons to avoid after the 1998 currency crises. A major Russian index is up 651 percent. Hungary, where there have been recent riots after the prime minister admitted lying to win re-election, is up 161 percent. (All figures are from Jan. 14, 2000, to Oct. 3, 2006.)

Peru is up nearly 500 percent, and Mexico has risen 150 percent. The Prague stock index in the Czech Republic is up almost 350 percent, but that performance seems poor next to that of the Slovak index next door, which has risen more than 600 percent.

Even Lebanon, whose economy and political situation have not exactly been good of late, is up 84 percent.

Can this continue? The tech stocks kept rising long after some warned they were ridiculously overvalued. But when they fell, they fell far and fast as owners found that no one wanted to buy them. That could happen to some of today's favorites as well.

To Muted Cheers, The Dow Climbs Past A Record (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

STOCKS shattered records. Corporate profits soared. Economists waxed about a so-called Goldilocks economy — not too hot, not too cold. Sound familiar? That was the siren song of the 1990's economic boom, and there was an eerie echo on Wall Street this week.

The only thing missing this time was the mirth. A wary sense of relief greeted a record for blue-chip stocks. Robust profit reports came with warnings of weak numbers to come. A fingers-crossed optimism underpinned economic forecasts.

And then there was another echo of the boom: a new round of criminal indictments of senior corporate officials. This time the charges were not for fraud or theft, but for spying.

A RELUCTANT RECORD After flirting with the record for several days running, the Dow Jones industrial average of 30 major stocks cracked the record closing high it set in January 2000 amid a technology-driven boom.

DOJ_NMG_0078628

The rally, which peaked for the week on Thursday with a record close of 11,866.69, was driven not by expectations of rapid economic growth, as it was seven years ago, but by a rapid fall in energy prices caused in part by expectations that global economic growth is slowing.

Some economists interpreted lower oil prices and a cooling housing market as signs of more-stable growth rather than a slump. Others, however, noted that the Dow is a narrow measure of the market and that other closely watched benchmarks, including the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and the Nasdaq composite index, are still well below their tech-bubble records.

More information on the economy's direction will come on Friday, when retail sales figures are released.

SPYING CHARGES California authorities indicted Patricia C. Dunn, the former chairwoman of Hewlett-Packard, and four other people on criminal charges in the corporate espionage case that has rocked the company.

In addition to Ms. Dunn, the indictment named Kevin T. Hunsaker, a former senior lawyer at H.P.; Ronald DeLia, a private detective from Massachusetts; Matthew DePante, manager of the Action Research Group, a Melbourne, Fla., information broker; and Bryan C. Wagner, a Colorado man who is believed to have obtained private phone records while working for Mr. DePante.

All five defendants were charged with using false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access to computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. All of the charges are felonies. Lawyers for Ms. Dunn and Mr. DePante said their clients were innocent. The other defendants and their lawyers did not immediately respond.

California's attorney general, Bill Lockyer, filed the charges, which stem from an internal H.P. investigation into leaks of confidential discussions among its directors. As part of the investigation, private investigators working for the company apparently used deception to obtain the private telephone records of company officials and others.

The United States attorney's office for Northern California is also conducting its own investigation, and could file federal charges in the case soon.

BIG BET A pair of private-equity firms teamed up to offer $15 billion in cash for Harrah's Entertainment, the country's largest casino operator. Combined with Harrah's long-term debt of $10 billion, the buyout would be worth more than $25 billion, making it one of the largest leveraged buyouts ever.

Private equity firms have raised billions of dollars this year to buy publicly traded companies, improve their management or financing, and then sell them or take them public to realize a profit. Until now, they have rarely tapped the gambling industry, and the offer sent the shares of other casino operators soaring. Harrah's operates Harrah's, Caesars and Horseshoe casinos in Las Vegas, Atlantic City and elsewhere.

Casino takeovers require buyers to be approved by gambling regulators in each state where the company operates, to make sure that organized crime does not infiltrate the industry.

STOCK CAR RACE Led by the introduction of its new pickup truck, Toyota said its sales in the United States jumped 20 percent last month and the company closed in on Ford as the No. 2 car company in America.

Toyota's gains came even as receding gasoline prices and generous manufacturer rebates propped up sagging sales of pickup trucks and sport utility vehicles, normally a field dominated by General Motors, Ford and Chrysler.

Ford increased its market share slightly, to 17.3 percent, but Toyota expanded faster and accounted for 16.5 percent of the market. Sales at G.M. fell almost 7 percent and its market share slipped to 21.6 percent.

With large inventories of unsold 2006 models, automakers plan to offer bigger incentives, including no-interest financing or thousands of dollars in cash rebates.

JUMBO PROBLEM Persistent assembly-line problems will further delay the first deliveries of the A380 superjumbo jet by Airbus, perhaps by as much as one more year, pushing the program off by a full two years.

The European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company, the parent company of Airbus, also warned that the delays would cut earnings over the next four years by 4.8 billion euros ($6.1 billion), more than double the amount forecast in June.

Compounding the problem, Emirates, the largest customer for the A380 plane, signaled publicly that it might cancel part of its multibillion-dollar order for the superjumbo jet. Emirates, which hopes to expand its long-haul international airline service through its base in the Middle East, was originally scheduled to receive its first planes this year; now the earliest it would receive its first jetliners is 2008.

EADS and Airbus said the first A380 would be delivered next year, to Singapore Airlines in October, down from nine that had been promised as recently as June.

OPEC's Oil-Price Line In The Sand Cartel's Effort To Maintain $60-a-Barrel Seems Doable, But Only For The Near Term (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078629

OPEC announced Thursday that it intends to steady the oil price at something like the current level of about $60 a barrel. It may be able to defend this level in the months to come, but over the long haul this effort is doomed.

It certainly sounds ambitious by the standards of two years ago. The price then was $45 a barrel, and most experts and exporters thought that was too high to last. But experience changes standards. After more than a year of $60-plus prices, the level seems more plausible.

Plausibility matters, because the price defense is going to require some production cuts, at least for the short term. OPEC needs a target that its swing producers, especially Saudi Arabia, are willing to defend. Otherwise the group won't be able to stop squabbling over who should take the pain. At least for now, it looks like the will to succeed is there.

There are other trends working in OPEC's favor. The balance of supply and demand is still pretty tight. Although higher prices have slowed demand growth, the direction remains positive. That's largely because of the emerging markets, which accounted for 90% of incremental demand growth in 2005. And while new sources of oil eventually will come onstream, it's a slow process. For the moment, OPEC members control marginal supply. Outside of the cartel, production hasn't budged since 2004.

Second, financial conditions remain supportive of a high oil price. Low real interest rates and the recycling of petrodollars by oil exporters have mitigated the pain of higher oil prices. American households have blithely borrowed to fill the tanks of their SUVs.

But OPEC faces one huge obstacle. The cost of producing oil is much less than $60. Even Canadian oil sands, which require expensive and energy-intensive processing, are profitable at something like $50. Eventually, the lure of profits will bring on new supply, damping the price.

Fortress Within

Wall Street firm Morgan Stanley is hunting for a hedge fund manager. FrontPoint Partners, with whom it danced in the past, might be a good fit. But there are more ambitious targets to consider, such as Fortress Investment Group.

The Wild West era of the alternative asset-management industry is coming to a close. As a result, its practitioners are considering ways to cash out and grow like any normal business. Their options include going public and selling to bigger financial institutions.

But the first avenue looks more difficult today than it did just a few months ago. The implosion of Amaranth Advisors, troubles at other big funds like Vega and continued middling performance across the industry are making investors wary of the industry. RAB Capital, for example, a U.K.-listed hedge fund manager, has seen its stock plunge by a third in the past month. Even a Fortress, with $24 billion in hedge-fund and private-equity vehicles, would find it difficult to withstand these market pressures.

That may be one reason the firm has yet to file for an IPO despite months of contemplation. At RAB's valuation of 15% of assets under management, Fortress would be worth about $4 billion. But to Morgan Stanley, Fortress might be worth more. It would jump-start the Wall Street firm's attempts to gain a foothold in hedge funds and private equity, where it considerably lags behind chief rival Goldman Sachs. The two sides know each other a bit: top Fortress and Morgan Stanley honchos dined last week.

Of course, to entrepreneurs, going public and selling out aren't interchangeable outcomes. But a flirtation with the public markets is clearly a step closer to the exit than sitting still. Morgan Stanley has gotten its mojo back of late. Its stock price is up, risk-taking is being rewarded and talent has returned to the firm. To complete the turnaround, it needs to build a fortress in asset management. It might be quicker to buy one.

Private-Equity Eye?

The blow-up of Amaranth and a few cases of outright fraud have spurred calls for more oversight of hedge funds. Private equity, however, which has also attracted billions of dollars of pension money in recent years, has largely avoided the regulators' spotlight. Still, it may only take a few buyout scandals for this to change.

Like hedge funds, larger private-equity managers have to register with the SEC as investment advisers. But small buyout funds avoid all scrutiny. And even the registered funds have minimal disclosure requirements. Yet the private-equity world is growing rapidly. Investors have poured $172 billion into 253 funds in the U.S. so far this year, according to Dow Jones Private Equity Analyst (a publication owned by Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal). With all that money sloshing around, it would be surprising if there were no bad eggs.

AA Capital, a $194 million fund that was spun off from the Dutch bank ABN Amro in 2001, could be one. The Securities and Exchange Commission has accused the fund of misappropriating nearly $11 million of its clients' cash. The SEC complaint charges that the firm's president, John Orecchio, put some of this money into a Michigan horse farm and slipped a wad to the manager of a Detroit strip club. Calls to AA Capital weren't returned.

DOJ_NMG_0078630

Questionable use of limited partners' funds may not be the only type of abuse going on in private equity. There could also be inaccurate valuations. The longer lock-up periods and lack of a market price for private-equity investments make that relatively easy to practice and hard to detect. Some buyout firms are no doubt pushing the envelope when it comes to valuing portfolios. It's even conceivable that the increasing number of transactions between buyout funds have led some to swap favors in order to boost reported returns.

The leading private firms have lobbied hard to avoid getting caught up in hedge-fund regulation. These efforts could be thwarted if there's any more mischief among the minnows of their industry.

--Martin Hutchinson, Rob Cox and Lauren Silva

Wetterling Goes National With Her Call For Foley Inquiry (MINNST)

By Bob Von Sternberg

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 7, 2006

She delivered the Democrats' weekly address after drawing wide attention. Bachmann calls it opportunistic.

Sixth Congressional District candidate Patty Wetterling said on Friday that if a "full and complete investigation" finds that any congressmen covered up the Mark Foley scandal, they should be expelled.

Her comments were taped for the Democratic Party's five-minute response that will be broadcast nationally this morning after President Bush's weekly radio address.

It was a publicity coup for Wetterling in her campaign against state Sen. Michele Bachmann and came at the end of a week in which Wetterling pushed to link outrage over Foley's sexually explicit e-mails with teenage congressional pages with her work as a children's safety advocate since her son, Jacob, disappeared.

"For 17 years, I have fought for tough penalties for those who harm children," she said. "Members of Congress are not and should not be above the law."

Wetterling said Foley "sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug."

She repeated many of the points she raised in her latest TV ad and in a long string of interviews with national publications that turned their attention to her almost immediately after the scandal broke.

Bachmann has said Wetterling's focus on the issue has been opportunistic and called the ad "a rush to judgment."

Bachmann said on Friday that Wetterling's radio comments "are reminiscent of her TV ad, which even the Star Tribune called misleading. The investigation of this matter by the FBI and the ethics committee is already underway and was called for by the leadership."

Wetterling said on Friday that Bachmann's criticisms "are appalling."They show an insensitivity to the victims," she said. "To not respond to this would have been wrong. This is something I know an awful lot about."

She said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called her earlier this week and asked her to present the radio address. "I wrote my own words," she said. "It's daunting, but it's an honor."

She said she had met Foley several times as her work crossed paths with his role as chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children. In July, Foley and Wetterling attended a signing ceremony at the White House for the Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006.

"I know Mark Foley, and he's done good things," she said. "It's a betrayal and hits me at a personal level."

When Wetterling arrived at KSTP's recording studio in St. Paul on Friday afternoon, she was met by four television cameras and nearly a dozen local journalists. "Holy moley," she said, startled.

Bob von Sternberg · 612-673-7184 · vonste@startribune.com

In House Races, More G.O.P. Seats Are Seen At Risk (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — At least five more Republican Congressional seats are now in serious contention, analysts said Friday, an unwelcome development for Republicans as they begin to confront a political environment further darkened for them by the Congressional page scandal.

The fury over sexually charged messages sent to male teenage pages by Representative Mark Foley of Florida is undercutting Republican support among elderly voters, suburbanites and women, analysts from both parties said.

More immediately — and more alarmingly for Republican strategists who have looked to the party's powerful voter turnout operation to save the party this year — there are signs that the furor is sapping the enthusiasm of a group essential to Republican victories in 2002 and 2004: religious conservatives.

DOJ_NMG_0078631

"The social conservatives are frustrated with what's going on," said Saulius Anuzis, the chairman of the Republican Party in Michigan, where, he said, one-third of his volunteers are social conservatives. "We have heard disappointment and disenchantment. The level of commitment isn't as fierce as it ought to be."

The political uproar is playing out in races across the country and comes with Republicans already struggling against the political weight of more bad news from Iraq. The page scandal has left leaders and candidates in both parties to come up with new strategies a month from Election Day.

Democrats placed advertisements linking embattled Republican incumbents to Mr. Foley, including spots in Ohio and Indiana that began broadcasting Friday. Democratic House and Senate candidates pressed Republican incumbents to say whether they thought Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who along with other senior members of the Republican leadership has come under fire as failing to act on early signals that Mr. Foley was sexually harassing teenagers, should stay in power.

In New Jersey, Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican Senate candidate, called on Mr. Hastert to step down.

The Democratic response to President Bush's radio address on Saturday features a Democratic House candidate, Patty Wetterling of Minnesota, attacking House Republican leaders as ignoring warnings about Mr. Foley's behavior, according to excerpts released Friday.

"Foley sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of Congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug to protect their political power," says Ms. Wetterling, a Democrat whose 11-year-old son was kidnapped 17 years ago and has not been found.

Republicans and their allies, including conservative talk radio hosts, have responded by rallying around Mr. Hastert and blaming Democrats and the news media for the frenzy.

Talk radio hosts, working off a list of talking points distributed by Republican Party officials, recounted how two decades ago, House Democrats stood behind Representative Gerry E. Studds, Democrat of Massachusetts, after he engaged in sex with a male page.

In upstate New York, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, who is trailing his Democratic challenger according to two new polls, planned to go on television to defend himself after a labor union began broadcasting a 30-second radio advertisement questioning whether he had done all he could after hearing a complaint that Mr. Foley was harassing teenagers.

"Nobody's angrier and more disappointed than me that I didn't catch his lies," Mr. Reynolds said in advertisements scheduled to begin over the weekend. "I trusted that others had investigated. Looking back, more should have been done, and for that I am sorry."

George Rasley, an aide to Representative Deborah Pryce, Republican of Ohio, who was linked to Mr. Foley in a Democratic advertisement that began running Friday, said the Foley investigation further soured an already tough environment for Republicans in Ohio, a state hammered by corruption investigations this year.

"This is one more thing that makes people wonder about politicians and politics," Mr. Rasley said. "It reinforces this notion of Washington being a place that bears no resemblance to real America."

The page scandal is part of a run of difficult tidings for Republicans, including a stream of bad news out of Iraq, disclosure of an intelligence report that found that the invasion might have worsened the threat of terrorism and Mr. Bush's continued unpopularity.

In the White House, aides have watched with frustration as campaign appearances by Mr. Bush, in which he hammers Democrats on national security, receive little coverage, subsumed by the Foley case.

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said he believed that Republicans turned a corner when Mr. Hastert accepted responsibility for the mishandling of the page scandal after days of being pressed to take action by restive Republicans.

"I'm looking at every single bit of public and private data," Mr. Mehlman said. "So far, I have seen a minimal effect of this particular situation, which is not to say that I don't take it seriously."

Democrats need to capture 15 House seats to take control of Congress; until the last week or two, about 40 Republican seats had been judged in play, of which 20 had been considered highly competitive. But analysts said at least five more Republican seats, and as many as eight, that had once been considered relative long shots for Democrats had now swung firmly into play.

At least two of those seats are directly related to the Foley scandal. One is held by Mr. Reynolds, who as chairman of the House Republican campaign committee had entered this election cycle as a prohibitive favorite for re-election. Republicans in Florida do not plan to spend any money to defend the seat once held by Mr. Foley, effectively conceding it to the Democratic challenger, Tim Mahoney, who, not taking any chances, is running advertisements in which he pledges to return "moral values" to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0078632

In other races, the Foley case has created an unfavorable backdrop for Republicans. In Pennsylvania this week, Representative Don Sherwood, a suddenly endangered Republican, bought time on television to offer an apology in response to allegations that he had abused his mistress. Analysts for both parties said the sweep of outrage over Congressional misbehavior had weakened Mr. Sherwood and forced him to deal directly with the issue.

Beyond that, analysts said the page scandal had raised new concerns about ethics in Congress, an unwanted focus for Republicans in races where Democrats have sought to make an issue of what they have called a Republican culture of corruption.

Those include re-election races by Representatives Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle, both of California, who have been touched by the fallout from the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, as well as the contests to fill two seats vacated by Republicans who have quit the race, Tom DeLay of Texas and Bob Ney of Ohio.

"I would think the Ney seat is more of a problem because of another round of ethics problems," said Stu Rothenberg, an independent analyst who studies Congressional races.

Amy Walter, an analyst who follows Congressional races for The Cook Political Report, said the Foley inquiry was having an indirect effect on races in which corruption might be an issue. "When the spotlight is where the spotlight sits right now," Ms. Walter said, "on scandal and dysfunction in Congress, then people like Pombo and Doolittle suffer."

Mr. Pombo has also been the target of advertisements by the Sierra Club and the League of Women Voters criticizing his record on environmental issues.

Other races that have become increasingly competitive are the one to replace Representative Katherine Harris, a Florida Republican running for the Senate, and the challenge to Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr., also a Florida Republican. Party officials said polls showed the two races were tight.

Officials in both parties said it was not the Foley scandal alone as much as the accumulated weight of problems for Republicans these past two weeks that was giving them concern.

"We're working to redirect the debate back to national security and lower taxes," said Brian Jones, the communications director for the Republican National Committee. "But this week that's proved to be a difficult task."

Republican pollsters said their first concern was that the page scandal could discourage Republican voters from turning out.

"We're not seeing it affecting voter behavior; we are seeing it affect voter intensity," said Glenn Bolger, a Republican pollster. "It's more of a deflation effect among Republicans than it is a motivator for Democrats. Does that change in the next 34 days? That's part of our job."

Meanwhile, Democrats were pushing hard to make sure the Republicans' troubles stayed in the public consciousness. On Saturday, Democrats plan to run an advertisement against Mike Whalen, a Republican running for an open House seat in Iowa, picturing him alongside Mr. Hastert.

Democratic advertisements are linking Mr. Foley to both Ms. Pryce of Ohio and Representative Mike Sodrel of Indiana. Ms. Pryce once described Mr. Foley as a friend, one advertisement says, while Mr. Sodrel is criticized as taking a campaign contribution "from the House leadership, who knew about it but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley."

A fund-raiser for Mr. Sodrel headlined by Mr. Hastert was postponed this week. Mr. Sodrel's campaign manager, Cam Savage, said that was only because of a scheduling conflict.

Mr. Savage described the Foley scandal as an issue in Mr. Sodrel's district, but not an overwhelming one. "It's not the No. 1 priority on people's minds," he said, "but it does have some resonance to it."

Democrat Ads Attack GOP Over Scandal (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 7, 2006

More Democrats went on the attack Friday with campaign ads linking Republican candidates to the Mark Foley House page scandal while GOP candidates moved to distance themselves from embattled Speaker Dennis Hastert.

On Saturday, Democrat Patty Wetterling, a candidate for an open House seat in Minnesota, will continue the attack in the Democratic response to President Bush's weekly radio address as the party looks to reap political gains in coming midterm elections.

"Foley sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug to protect their political power," Wetterling said in the prerecorded address. "We must hold accountable all those complicit in allowing this victimization to happen."

DOJ_NMG_0078633

Republican New Jersey Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. Friday became the first major GOP candidate to call for Hastert to resign, while additional campaign appearances by Hastert for House GOP candidates got canceled. Hastert has come under heavy attack within his party's rank and file for damage inflicted on the party just weeks before the Nov. 7 elections.

"Hastert should resign as speaker," Kean said. "He is the head of the institution and this happened on his watch."

Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, a Republican write-in candidate in the race to replace Tom DeLay in Texas, decided not to pursue plans to invite Hastert to raise money for her campaign after the Foley scandal broke.

"We just made a decision not to have" a fundraiser with Hastert, said Sekula-Gibbs' campaign manager, Lisa Diamond.

Democrats stepped up their attacks.

"What is going on in Washington? ... Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages. Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert looked the other way," says an ad for Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy, challenging seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, the No. 4 Republican in the House in a particularly competitive race.

And in culturally conservative southern Indiana, former Democratic Rep. Baron Hill took to the airwaves Friday with an ad attacking freshman Republican Mike Sodrel for taking thousands of dollars in donations from House GOP leaders, "who knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator congressman Foley."

At the same time, Hastert canceled plans to raise money for Sodrel on Tuesday.

Earlier, Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., a Baptist preacher and social conservative, canceled plans for a fundraiser with Hastert, who also dropped an appearance with Ohio GOP candidate Joy Padgett, who is in an uphill race to replace the disgraced Rep. Bob Ney.

The nonstop news cycles for over a week have been filled with details of Foley's lurid messages to former pages and accusations by former top Foley staff aide Kirk Fordham that top GOP aides, including some in Hastert's office, knew about Foley's problems and the issue of the pages years ago.

But with no significant developments Friday, GOP strategists hoped the party could catch its breath and gain traction on issues like lower gas prices, the peaking stock market and the economy. Great skittishness remained about unforeseen developments in the Foley saga, nevertheless.

Democrats are increasingly optimistic that they will retake the House and possibly even the Senate. Even a prominent Senate Republican, John Cornyn of Texas, seemed pessimistic about his party keeping its hold on the House.

"It's happened in the past that we've had divided government in terms of the House and Senate," Cornyn said. "I'm sure we'll do our best to work together to try to address the nation's problems."

Democrat Christian Radio Ad Slams Foley (AP)

By David Hammer

AP, October 7, 2006

A Democratic candidate accuses her Republican rival of not doing enough to stop disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley and his salacious messages to teenage males in an ad for Christian radio stations.

Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy is challenging seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce, a member of the GOP House leadership, in one of the more competitive races. Kilroy's weeklong ads begin Saturday.

"What is going on in Washington? ... Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages," says the ad, which will air on Christian and Clear Channel Communications Inc., stations in central Ohio.

The spots cost Kilroy's campaign $5,000.

Foley, a former Florida congressman, helped Pryce get elected Republican Conference secretary, then Conference chairwoman — the No. 4 position in the House leadership. Pryce mentioned five friends in Congress in an article last month in Columbus Monthly magazine and Foley was one of them.

Pryce said she was out of the loop about complaints that Foley had sent improper messages to teenage male pages until after the congressman resigned Sept. 29.

"I was dumbfounded," she said.

Pryce held a news conference in Columbus, Ohio, to respond to the ad. She accused Kilroy of smearing her and gay-baiting, although Kilroy never mentioned homosexuality.

"She implied that since I knew him, I knew that he was a predator and I asssume there's only two conclusions you can draw from that: that I knew because I knew him, that he was a predator, or that I knew that he was gay because I knew him, that he was a predator," Pryce said.

Kilroy spokeswoman Amanda Wurst said the campaign chose Christian and conservative radio stations because their listeners are concerned about values.

DOJ_NMG_0078634

The ad also blames Pryce for standing by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill, complaining that he looked the other way when warned of Foley's behavior.

Hastert said Thursday he did not know about the sexually explicit messages sent by Foley until last week, but he also took responsibility for the matter.

Standing Apart From His Party, Kean Calls For House Speaker To Step Down (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 6 — Breaking ranks with President Bush and his party once again, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican candidate for United States Senate in New Jersey, called Friday for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to resign in the aftermath of the Mark Foley scandal.

Mr. Kean did so without consulting any of the six Republicans in New Jersey's Congressional delegation, according to two Republicans involved in New Jersey politics.

"Hastert should resign as speaker," Mr. Kean said in a two-paragraph statement. "He is the head of the institution and this happened on his watch. I urge House leaders to go further by appointing an outside panel to review the matter immediately."

Mr. Kean has made ethics the central plank in his campaign to unseat the Democratic incumbent, Senator Robert Menendez. And although he has staked out reliably Republican positions on most issues, like Mr. Bush's tax cuts and the war in Iraq, Mr. Kean has also bucked party orthodoxy on occasion.

He was one of the first Republicans to call on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign over his handling of the war in Iraq. He has also criticized Mr. Bush for his handling of Hurricane Katrina and the ballooning federal deficit.

But Mr. Kean has never taken so unequivocal and so contrarian a position at the hottest political moment: the widening scandal in which Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, is accused of having sent sexually suggestive electronic messages to underage Congressional pages. Mr. Foley resigned from the House last Friday after the existence of the messages was disclosed.

Mr. Menendez's campaign expressed skepticism over Mr. Kean's comments.

"This is Tom Kean Jr. running scared because New Jerseyans are just starting to understand he is just another Bush Republican, and a vote for him keeps all these guys in power," said Brian Fallon, a spokesman for Mr. Menendez.

GOP Leaders Rally To House Speaker's Defense (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Republican leaders closed ranks yesterday around House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, while candidates facing election in November continued to distance themselves from Mr. Hastert for his handling of a scandal that could cost Republicans control of Congress.

Several top Republicans, including President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, have rallied behind Mr. Hastert in recent days after the speaker and other House Republicans were criticized for not responding more aggressively when they learned of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's "over-friendly" relationship with a congressional page.

But in a clear indication of the damage the scandal could cause the Republican Party in November, some candidates continue to distance themselves.

State Sen. Tom Kean Jr., New Jersey Republican, who is running for the Senate, called yesterday for Mr. Hastert of Illinois to step down.

"He is the head of that institution, and this happened on his watch, and Kean urges House leaders to go further by appointing an outside panel to review the matter immediately," said Jill Hazelbaker, Mr. Kean's spokeswoman.

Mr. Kean hopes to unseat Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and pushed for a broad investigation of anyone in leadership who knew about the concerns involving Mr. Foley.

"This disturbing situation is another reason why the public holds the Congress in such low esteem. The culture of protecting each other has eroded Congress and the public's faith in government, and the system needs reform," Ms. Hazelbaker said.

In Kentucky, Rep. Ron Lewis this week canceled a fundraising appearance with Mr. Hastert.

Even candidates who aren't explicitly chiding Mr. Hastert are at least denouncing the Republican Congress for the scandal and casting doubt that an independent investigation can be conducted by the House ethics committee, which Thursday opened a probe into the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0078635

"To assure that this grievous behavior does not occur again in the halls of Congress, an independent investigation is necessary," said Michael Bouchard, the Republican challenging Sen. Debbie Stabenow, Michigan Democrat. "The investigation must be taken out of the hands of politicians and put into the hands of trained investigators."

But Mr. Bouchard, the sheriff of Michigan's second-largest county, was quick to say that it's not a partisan issue.

"This is not about Republicans and Democrats. This is about right and wrong, cracking down on criminals, and protecting victims," he said yesterday. "An independent investigation will take politics out of the process."

Conservatives, for the most part, have toned down the calls for Mr. Hastert to give up his leadership post.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III said yesterday that Mr. Hastert should not become "a sacrificial lamb."

Mr. Baker warned on CBS' "The Early Show" yesterday that dumping Mr. Hastert would not bring an end to the scandal.

"If they throw Denny Hastert off the sled to slow down the wolves, it won't be long before you'll be crying, 'Hey, you've got to throw somebody else over because they knew about it, too,' " Mr. Baker said.

And while the conservative publication Human Events stopped short of calling for Mr. Hastert to resign, an editorial yesterday said he should quit his speaker post before the next Congress is seated in January.

"Conservatives differ on whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert ought to resign right now, but it cannot be reasonably argued that Hastert is the best possible choice to lead Republicans in the next Congress," the publication said. "He is not."

Republicans Rally Round Hastert (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

It was Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the House and Republican leader, who best summarised his party's response to the scandal over a lawmaker's lewd internet messages to teenage interns. "There's a certain stench of hypocrisy," he said in reference to past sex scandals among Democrats.

For the time being, top Republicans are rallying behind Dennis Hastert, the current speaker, who on Thursday rejected calls to resign and who denied allegations that he knew of congressman Mark Foley's behaviour as early as 2003, when members of his staff on Capitol Hill were apparently informed.

But Mr Hastert also raised eyebrows when, by questioning the timing of the scandal, he hinted at a leftwing conspiracy to derail his party's mid-term election chances. The story hit the front pages last week, at a point when Republican chances appeared to be on the mend for the first time in more than a year.

Still, for many social conservatives, whose support has been critical to Republican election success ever since Mr Gingrich led the party to control of the House in 1994, the Foley scandal could prove to be the final straw. In the 2000 presidential elections, many Christian Republicans abstained from voting for George W. Bush when it was revealed he had once been caught driving under the influence of alcohol. In contrast, many analysts attributed Mr Bush's clear – although narrow – victory in the 2004 presidential election to his success in motivating socially conservative voters.

According to polls, that "intensity" of support app-ears to be falling off. Among voters who go to church once a week, only 44 per cent now lean towards the Republicans, compared with 58 per cent in 2004, according the Pew Research Center. For those who attend church more than once a week, the proportion has dropped from 64 to 56 per cent.

Although the mid-term elections have been dominated until now by other themes, such as the "war on terror", the war in Iraq and the state of the economy, moral issues often sway Christian voters on polling day. "Mid-term elections are all about motivating your party's base," said David Keene, the president of the Amer-ican Conservative Union. "There is no doubt about it, the Foley scandal has been very bad for Republican motivation."

The contrast could not be more stark with the 1994 elections, when Democrats stayed at home in droves, permitting Republicans to capture the House for the first time in a generation. Mr Gingrich's "contract with America", which helped deliver the Republican victory, was dominated by two pledges: to reduce the size of government and to restore ethics to Washington.

On both counts, large numbers of Republicans feel betrayed. Many traditional Republicans have been alienated by the growth in "K Street" lobby groups over the past decade and the accompanying rise in federal spending, which has grown at almost three times the rate of inflation since 2001.

Many social conservatives have grown disillusioned with their party's relative lack of success in pushing forward a moral agenda to restrict abortion, oppose gay marriage and rein back the culture of permissiveness. Just under a quarter of American voters describe themselves as "evangelical".

However, with more than a month to go before polling day, Republican leaders believe there is plenty of time for the scandal to blow over. They also believe that their party's larger campaign war chest and the fact that voters remain concerned about national security could still prove decisive in the build-up to voting.

DOJ_NMG_0078636

"People know there is hypocrisy and double-standards in Washington and they know it falls on both sides of the aisle," said Saul Anuzis, the head of the Republican party in Michigan. "There is a good chance this scandal will be forgotten in a few weeks. The majority of voters aren't paying much attention."

Republicans Hope Hastert's Words And A Committee's Action Can Quell Uproar (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — House Republicans held their breath on Friday and hoped that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's expression of remorse about the page scandal combined with the start of a House ethics investigation would stabilize his grip on power.

"The speaker has taken responsibility and is taking control of the situation," his spokesman, Ron Bonjean, said Friday afternoon.

After a chaotic week that began with the resignation of Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, other lawmakers were assessing whether Mr. Hastert's announcement on Thursday that he would not resign but would punish anyone found to have been derelict in the Foley case would be enough to calm the furor. They were hoping to avoid more leadership turmoil just one month before the midterm elections.

Even as the House ethics committee entered the second day of its inquiry, several contradictions had yet to be resolved, particularly whether Mr. Hastert's staff had been alerted to complaints about Mr. Foley before 2004. Kirk Fordham, a longtime aide to Mr. Foley who resigned this week from the office of another congressman, said he alerted Scott Palmer, the speaker's chief of staff, to Mr. Foley's behavior up to three years ago.

The speaker's office has denied hearing an advance warning from Mr. Fordham, but a senior Republican aide on Capitol Hill, who was close to Mr. Foley, confirmed Mr. Fordham's version of events in an interview on Friday. The aide, who declined to be identified because the matter was under investigation, said Mr. Fordham had alerted Mr. Palmer to concerns surrounding Mr. Foley's behavior with under-age pages.

Another senior Republican official who would speak about internal party matters only without being named said Mr. Hastert in his remarks had accomplished two goals sought by his colleagues: He had accepted some responsibility and had acknowledged that the response to complaints about the initial e-mail sent to a former teenage page in Louisiana had been inadequate.

"I'm hoping this is gone," said the official, who, like others, cautioned that new disclosures could quickly imperil Mr. Hastert and that the coming elections could answer the question of his future regardless.

After Mr. Hastert's remarks, other members of the leadership issued statements backing him, putting aside, at least for now, some of the divisions exposed over the scandal and who was responsible.

Republicans and some Democrats said the ethics committee had bought Mr. Hastert some relief by promising a full and relatively quick inquiry, though it was unclear whether the committee's findings would be known before the election. Aides in leadership offices said Friday that they were not aware of any staff members receiving requests to meet with the panel, which on Thursday approved nearly four dozen potential subpoenas for testimony and documents.

James A. Baker III, a leading Republican and former secretary of state with strong ties to the Bush family, also expressed support for Mr. Hastert on Friday, saying his resignation would do little to stem the uproar.

"If you think that's going to stop the story, you've been smoking dope, because the minute they get Denny, they'll go after the next person who might have known something about this," Mr. Baker said on Fox News. "I think the speaker's done the right thing by calling for an investigation."

In Oklahoma, a lawyer for a former page who has been identified as the recipient of explicit messages from Mr. Foley dismissed reports that the former page, now 21, was engaging in a practical joke. "From what I do know, this was not a prank," the lawyer, Stephen Jones, said on CNN.

The case continued to provoke sharp exchanges between Republicans and Democrats.

Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois and chairman of the board that oversees the page program, said he was outraged at criticism of his handling of the initial complaint against Mr. Foley. Mr. Shimkus said he was the person who questioned Mr. Foley, only to be told by the lawmaker that the initial e-mail communication was innocent.

"I did nothing wrong," said Mr. Shimkus, a former teacher, who on a radio program in his district accused Democrats of questioning his integrity in the matter.

Staffer Cites Earlier Role By Hastert's Office (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

DOJ_NMG_0078637

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's chief of staff confronted then-Rep. Mark Foley about his inappropriate social contact with male pages well before the speaker said aides in his office took any action, a current congressional staff member with personal knowledge of Foley and his behavior with pages said yesterday.

The staff member said Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, met with the Florida Republican at the Capitol to discuss complaints about Foley's behavior toward pages. The alleged meeting occurred long before Hastert says aides in his office dispatched Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.) and the clerk of the House in November 2005 to confront Foley about troubling e-mails he had sent to a Louisiana boy.

The staff member's account buttresses the position of Foley's onetime chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, who said earlier this week that he had appealed to Palmer in 2003 or earlier to intervene, after Fordham's own efforts to stop Foley's behavior had failed. Fordham said Foley and Palmer, one of the most powerful figures in the House of Representatives, met within days to discuss the allegations.

Palmer said this week that the meeting Fordham described "did not happen." Timothy J. Heaphy, Fordham's attorney, said yesterday that Fordham is prepared to testify under oath that he had arranged the meeting and that both Foley and Palmer told him the meeting had taken place. Fordham spent more than three hours with the FBI on Thursday, and Heaphy said that on Friday he contacted the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to offer his client's cooperation.

"We are not preparing to cooperate. We are affirmatively seeking to," Heaphy said.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean declined to directly comment on the second House staff member's assertion, saying that it is a matter for a House ethics committee investigation. "The Standards Committee has asked that no one discuss this matter because of its ongoing investigation," Bonjean said.

The emergence of a second congressional staffer describing such a meeting came on a day that Hastert (R-Ill.) was working to solidify his hold on the speakership. Prominent Republicans, including President Bush, have defended Hastert, saying he should not step down, but the criticism continues to flow.

New Jersey's Thomas H. Kean Jr., whose candidacy offers the GOP its most promising hope to take a Senate seat from a Democrat in November, called for Hastert's resignation yesterday, as did the editorial page of the Los Angeles Times. Democratic House candidate Patty Wetterling of Minnesota, a child-safety advocate and the first to air a television commercial about the Foley scandal, will deliver the national Democratic response to Bush's weekly radio address today.

Hastert maintains that he knew nothing of Foley's actions until last week, when the story first broke and Foley resigned. His stance contradicts that of House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), both of whom said they had informed Hastert this spring.

Palmer has resolutely said he had no earlier meeting with Foley, and other leadership aides have questioned the truthfulness of Fordham. Fordham quit his job as Reynolds's chief of staff last week after acknowledging that he had tried to persuade ABC News not to publish the salacious instant-message exchanges between Foley and two former pages.

Hastert's office contends that the first confrontation with Foley occurred in November 2005, when Shimkus, the head of the House Page Board, and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl took Foley aside to discuss what they termed "over-friendly" e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana boy. Fordham's account not only pushed the matter back at least two years but also indicated that alarms over Foley's behavior had gone well beyond bland e-mails.

Sources close to Fordham say Trandahl repeatedly urged the longtime aide and close family friend to confront Foley about his inappropriate advances on pages. Each time, Foley pledged to no longer socialize with the teenagers, but, weeks later, Trandahl would again alert Fordham about more contacts. Out of frustration, the sources said, Fordham contacted Palmer, hoping that an intervention from such a powerful figure in the House would persuade Foley to stop.

Now, a second House aide familiar with Foley and his actions told The Washington Post yesterday that "Scott Palmer had spoken to Foley prior to November 2005." The aide spoke on the condition of anonymity because the matter is now the subject of a criminal investigation and the House ethics committee inquiry.

Two law enforcement officials said yesterday that the FBI had not yet determined whether a crime had occurred in the Foley case. Justice Department and FBI officials have cautioned that cases involving the enticement of minors are notoriously difficult to prosecute.

On Wednesday night, Palmer was described as highly emotional while aides sifted through e-mails and files to determine whether he had ever spoken to Fordham. Several people who spoke with Palmer said the chief of staff was emphatic in denying that he knew anything about Foley's questionable contacts with young male pages.

Palmer, who shares a townhouse with Hastert when they are in town, is more powerful than all but a few House members. Members know that he speaks for Hastert.

The divergent accounts have highlighted the holes in the public's understanding of Foley's undoing. And they are sure to ratchet up the pressure on Trandahl to come forward with his knowledge of events. As House clerk between January 1999 and November 2005, Trandahl had direct control over the page program.

Pages apparently saw Trandahl as a strict disciplinarian. In one instant-message exchange obtained by The Post, a former page, on his way to his first annual reunion in Washington, told Foley in January 2003 that "everyone is going to be pretty wasted a lot of the time in dc."

He then added, "well we dont have the [expletive] clerk to fire us anymore. . . . we didnt like trandahl that much . . . he isnt a nice guy . . . and he gets really scarey when he is mad."

Trandahl's departure came within days of his confrontation with Foley over e-mails that the congressman had sent a former page. House aides say the circumstances of Trandahl's exit were oddly quiet. The departure of a staff member of long standing, especially one as important as the House clerk, is usually marked with considerable fanfare, said Scott Lilly, a former Democratic staff director of the House Appropriations Committee. Debate is suspended in mid-afternoon to accommodate a stream of testimonials from lawmakers.

Trandahl's departure was marked by a one-minute salute from Shimkus and a brief insert into the Congressional Record.

"My one-hour Special Order changed to a five-minute Special Order, now to a one-minute," Shimkus said. "I just want to say thank you for the work you have done."

Lilly said: "He seemed to suddenly disappear in a puff of smoke."

Trandahl, now the executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, has not returned repeated phone calls and e-mails.

Congressional aides point to another factor that links Trandahl to the Foley matter. A member of the board of the national gay rights group Human Rights Campaign, Trandahl is openly homosexual and personally close to the now-disgraced former lawmaker, who announced through his lawyer this week that he is gay.

SPECIAL REPORT: SEX, LIES AND ELECTION DAY (NATJOUR)

By Brian Friel

National Journal, October 6, 2006

The Law's Long Arms

In March of this year, a federal judge sentenced Dwight Whorley of Richmond, Va., to 20 years in prison after he was found guilty of a variety of child-pornography charges, including receiving 20 obscene Japanese anime cartoons. The case drew attention in child-protection circles because Whorley was the first person convicted under a 2003 federal statute that makes viewing such nonphotographic material a crime.

Whorley was also convicted of sending and receiving 20 obscene e-mails that described sex involving children. He had broken the federal law that prohibits online viewing of "any obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, motion-picture film, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of indecent character."

That federal statute is one of several that could come into play as the FBI's Washington Field Office and the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section run an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., and his online sexual activities with underage boys. The federal investigators, as well as state and local agents who may be brought into the case, will try to determine what Foley actually did, the jurisdiction in which he did it, the age of the boys involved, and what state or federal laws he might have violated. "You've got to look at specifics," said Robert Peters, president of Morality in Media, a New York-based anti-pornography group. "Where did the thing get sent from? If it was all in Washington, that eliminates Florida.... And if it's interstate, then you're back to the federal law."

The federal laws potentially in play include an obscenity statute that prohibits the "transfer of obscene material to minors" and defines a minor as a child age 15 or younger. The youngest alleged recipient of sexually suggestive or sexually explicit messages from Foley was 16.

The statutes that Whorley was convicted of violating are based on the material itself, not on the age of the sender or receiver. Under such laws, juries determine whether community standards were violated and whether the material in question appeals to "prurient" interests.

Also in play are federal and state "coercion and enticement" statutes. Federal law prohibits adults from persuading -- or attempting to persuade -- children younger than 18 to engage in illegal sexual activity. Brian Doyle, a former public-affairs officer in the Homeland Security Department, pleaded no contest in Florida last month after being arrested for engaging in online discussions about a sexual rendezvous with a law enforcement agent posing as a 14-year-old girl.

If Foley attempted to arrange sexual encounters with anyone under the age of consent, he could face enticement charges. The age of consent is 16 in the District and 18 in Florida. If Foley stopped short of arranging physical encounters, his messages still might constitute a sex crime, depending on location. California law, for example, makes it a crime for an adult to send material designed to "arouse" and "seduce" a minor. Florida law prohibits adults from using a computer to transmit a statement "encouraging ... sexual conduct of or with any minor." The federal coercion statute, which could be applied in conjunction with various state laws, carries a mandatory minimum prison sentence of 10 years, according to child-protection expert Mary Leary, a visiting professor at Catholic University of America's law school.

DOJ_NMG_0078639

Leary, who stressed that she wasn't commenting specifically on the Foley investigation, said prosecution of online child sex cases relies heavily on each case's details -- where the activities occurred, when they took place, and who was involved. "It really is a fact-specific, fact-driven inquiry," she said.

Experts in the laws dealing with obscenity and child exploitation generally say that federal and state statutes are adequate for dealing with most online predators. "We have some excellent federal laws," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel for Concerned Women for America, a conservative Washington advocacy group. "They need more vigorous enforcement."

Melanie Sloan, executive director of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, is a former sex-crimes prosecutor. In July, Sloan sent the FBI copies of e-mails from Foley that had "freaked out" a former congressional page -- the first Foley messages that became public last week. At the time, the FBI did not see evidence of a federal crime. "The law is a little tricky," Sloan said when asked how the government will decide whether to bring charges. "The way you do it is, you find out what he did."

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "takes any allegations of child exploitation extremely seriously. And he has directed those in charge of the inquiry to take all appropriate steps to get to the bottom of this unfortunate situation as soon as possible."

For Shimkus, Stain From Foley Scandal Could Linger (MCT)

By Alan Bjerga

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - With more than a million dollars to spend and 69 percent of the votes in his last election, Rep. John Shimkus may well survive the Mark Foley scandal at the ballot box.

But should voters re-elect the Illinois Republican next month, they might be returning to Washington a man whose congressional influence could be diminished permanently by the scandal.

The stain from his role as the head of the House Page Board while former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., was making advances toward pages could trail Shimkus for years, political analysts said. That will make it more difficult for him to rise in the House of Representatives' ranks to top committee or leadership assignments that benefit his district.

"Even being associated with a scandal can irreparably harm a career," said Steven Smith, political science professor at Washington University in St. Louis.

Shimkus is reeling this week from charges that, as the head of the page board, he wasn't aggressive enough in investigating concerns about Foley's conduct.

In a Belleville News-Democrat interview earlier this week, Shimkus defended his actions in 2005, when he reacted to a page's parents' worries over an "overly friendly" e-mail that Foley had sent their son by simply telling Foley to stay away from pages.

Shimkus said that, based on the information he had, his response seemed reasonable. Now that more explicit and damaging messages have been revealed, second-guessing - from himself as well as critics - is to be expected.

"I only tell people what I did with the information I had available, and history will judge that," he told the News-Democrat.

Ross Baker, a longtime Democratic congressional staffer who now teaches at Rutgers University in New Jersey, said it remained to be seen whether the public would view Shimkus as a participant in a cover-up or as someone who was in the wrong place at the wrong time.

"He's clearly not the principal player in this," Baker said.

But whether or not Shimkus' actions are defensible, political damage-by-association appears inevitable.

"This will continue to be a big mark against him," Baker said.

Democrats say Shimkus should lose his seat for his role in the scandal. While his opponent in November, Dan Stover, said he would rather talk about differences on issues other than the scandal, he acknowledges that it's giving his campaign new life.

And after November, assuming Shimkus is re-elected, the scandal could ruin his ability ever to take a bigger role in the House, where he has served since 1997, Smith said.

"Even if it turns out he did everything right, Republicans won't ever want to read news stories that say, `Leader Shimkus, who was involved in the House page scandal ...'

DOJ_NMG_0078640

"Politics is a lot about reputation," Smith continued. "Congress is a competitive place, and there are plenty of other legislators without baggage" competing with Shimkus for more power and projects for their districts.

"Any legislator touched by this will be disadvantaged within the House," Smith said.

Speculation Centers On A Republican Former Page (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Likable and popular with female pages, a committed Republican who even as a teenager knew how to parlay chance meetings into political friendships, Jordan Edmund has emerged as a key figure in the Foley page scandal.

The former House page has been targeted by conservative blogs as the young man on the receiving end of former representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit online instant messages, which have engulfed the GOP in a scandal that could affect the outcome of the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Edmund has hired a lawyer, Stephen Jones, who will not acknowledge whether his client was the one who corresponded extensively with Foley for nearly a year. Jones said he is going public with his client's name to help Edmund fend off conservative attacks and a barrage of media inquiries. He said he will represent Edmund when he is interviewed early next week by the FBI.

"I did not discuss the messages with him," Jones said. "I'm not saying they're his. At this time I don't know."

Jones declined to discuss his client's involvement in disclosing the instant messages to the news media.

"To me that's a side issue," he said. "The issue is whether Congressman Foley or anyone else violated the law, not whether Jordan had good judgment or not."

A student at the University of California at Berkeley, Edmund has taken time off this year to serve as deputy campaign manager on Rep. Ernest J. Istook Jr.'s campaign for Oklahoma governor. Edmund contacted Jones, a well-known Oklahoma City trial lawyer and Republican Party member who was appointed to represent Timothy McVeigh after the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. Jones said he believed fellow Republicans referred Edmund to him.

The message transcripts show a humorous, sometimes self-conscious high school student who showed an easy familiarity with Foley. Engaged in a typical round of teen dances and lacrosse games, he at one point asked the congressman for help getting into a fundraiser for Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.).

Cunningham, who resigned from the House last year after pleading guilty to taking bribes, was Edmund's sponsor in the 2002 page program.

Edmund's MySpace entry, where he goes by "EDMO!," also mentions lacrosse and dancing among his interests. But chiefly, he wrote, "Politics is my passion; I love the game . . . I grew up all over the place but I call San Diego home."

In the instant messages, Foley mentions a San Diego meeting with the former page to whom he is writing.

In the section headed "Who I'd like to meet," Edmund says: "I don't know, but I do know who I don't want to meet. Stupid people, people who don't like politics (politicians make your [expletive] laws)."

Edmund's allegiance to the GOP, say some, raises one of the biggest questions about him: Why would a young man with seemingly such a bright future in the Republican Party save messages so potentially damaging to it?

"He's a very personable guy and . . . certainly a rising star," said one page who served with Edmund in 2002 and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The page said Edmund was known among some fellow pages that year for boasting of his friendship with Foley.

In recent days, some blogs have published reports that the exchanges were a prank and that the teen in the messages, who seems uncertain about his sexual orientation, was actually trying to solicit sexually suggestive messages from Foley.

In daily online exchanges with fellow former pages over the last week, the former page who served with Edmund said, "Someone commented that if it was indeed a prank then it's very upsetting and disappointing that Jordan would do that. It would have been insensitive to Foley's sexual orientation."

Jones, Edmund's lawyer, said: "It was not a prank, not a practical joke, that pages played on a congressman."

Edmund "demonstrated integrity" by agreeing to cooperate in the investigation, Jones said. "I don't think Jordan intended for any of this to become public.

"I think he'd like to have his privacy respected. I told him I thought he was a victim."

GOP Prods Democrats Over Foley Scandal (CNN)

CNN – GOP Dem Foley, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Faced with fending off the backlash from the Mark Foley scandal, House Republicans took the offensive Friday, asking Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and other Democrats to testify about whether they engaged in partisan trickery by releasing Foley's messages weeks before the midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0078641

Top GOP leaders -- including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, of Illinois, and Majority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio -- have accused the Democrats of knowing about Foley's correspondences with teen pages, and waiting to release them until it was politically advantageous.

Foley, a Republican who represented a Florida district for six terms, resigned abruptly September 29 as allegations surfaced that he exchanged inappropriate e-mails and lurid text messages with underage pages. Democratic candidates are using the scandal as fodder in their campaign ads. Candidate Baron Hill, of Indiana, criticized Rep. Mike Sodrel, R-Indiana, for refusing to return contributions "from the House leadership who knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley." (Full story)

Foley's attorney said this week that his client acknowledges inappropriate exchanges with teen pages, but he "never, ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life."

Candidate Patty Wetterling, of Minnesota, who is in a tight race against Republican Michelle Bachmann, also focused on an alleged cover-up, according to a radio address she released.

Suspicion of a cover-up is common across the nation. In a Time magazine poll of 1,002 voting-age adults this week, 80 percent were aware of the scandal. Of those, two-thirds suspected a cover-up by GOP leaders, and only 16 percent approved of how Republicans handled the scandal.

In a letter to Pelosi, which also was sent to Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean, Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Georgia, asked them to disclose whether Democrats played a role in publicizing Foley's correspondences.

"Just as it must be determined whether any Republican members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal Mr. Foley's activities, it must also be determined whether any Democrat members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal these same activities," Kingston wrote in a letter signed by 10 other GOP lawmakers.

Hastert has been on the front line of the fallout since he and other top Republicans were accused of knowing before 2005 about an "overly friendly" e-mail Foley sent to a teenage page. A conservative Washington newspaper even called for the speaker's resignation, a demand Hastert, of Illinois, rebuffed.

In a speech Thursday in Batavia, Illinois, Hastert denied the accusation, said he had "done nothing wrong" and refused to step down. He also suggested the timing of the release of the messages was a Democratic ploy to get the upper hand in November elections.

"Our friends on the other side of the aisle really don't have a story to tell, and maybe they're resolving to another way, to another political tactic," he said.

Hastert has asked the FBI to investigate, and the House Ethics Committee launched its own probe Thursday and authorized four dozen subpoenas. (Watch how the Foley scandal has changed the political landscape -- 2:10)

Top GOP leaders, including Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt, of Missouri, have rushed to Hastert's defense. Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, wrote a letter supporting Hastert, saying it was inappropriate to ask for the speaker's resignation when similar scandals in the 1980s prompted a "dramatically different standard."

Barton was referring to Democratic Reps. Gerry Studds of Massachusetts and Dan Crane of Illinois, both of whom were censured after having sexual relationships with 17-year-old pages. Crane lost his re-election bid, while Studds survived the scandal.

"No Democrat demanded prescience from Speaker Tip O'Neill, and no Democrat shouted for his resignation. Neither did any Republican," Barton wrote. "The focus was on the members who created the problem, as it should have been and as it should be now."

In a statement accompanying his letter to Pelosi, Kingston wrote that the Foley matter "should not be a partisan issue."

"All members of the House, our staff, and members of the public regardless of political party should come forward and provide whatever information they know," he wrote.

Pressure On Republicans Won't Ease (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As House Republicans struggle to contain the fallout from the Mark Foley page scandal, two coming court dates will push long-lingering lobbying misdeeds back into the headlines just before Election Day.

Next Friday, Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney is scheduled to enter guilty pleas to accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of trips, meals and other gifts in exchange for taking official action on behalf of clients of former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0078642

On Oct. 27 -- less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 election -- David H. Safavian, a former White House official and Abramoff ally, is scheduled to be sentenced for his conviction, earlier this spring, on lying and obstruction-of-justice charges. Those also flowed from the Abramoff investigation.

The successive sentencings, combined with the continuing investigations of Mr. Foley -- and how House leaders handled his behavior -- provide "a clothesline" that Democrats can use to drive the scandal issue through the final days of the campaign, says David Gergen, an adviser to Republican and Democratic White Houses, who now teaches at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, dismisses that notion. "I still don't know of any member of Congress who has lost because of what another member did or didn't do," he said. "We believe congressional races are more about local and pocketbook issues."

The blending of the sex and lobbying scandals in the final weeks of the campaign will make it harder for Republican candidates to dismiss them as isolated incidents involving a few bad characters, says Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University. "When you have two or three big scandals going on at the same time, it becomes about the party," he says. "This is now about a broader theme of Republicans misusing their power. That's the link between Abramoff and Foley."

Some Republicans fear that congressional leaders may have made the issue more difficult politically, because they failed to take action on ethics legislation before adjourning this year.

When Mr. Abramoff in January pleaded guilty to attempting to bribe lawmakers with expensive trips, meals and sporting-event tickets, House Speaker Dennis Hastert vowed to pass tough ethics-reform legislation. A succession of guilty pleas in the Abramoff probe by high-level congressional aides seemed to provide some momentum for the push.

But after heavy lobbying from the business community, and a shift in media attention to other issues, the House leadership backed away. House Majority Leader John Boehner called a lobbyist travel ban "childish." That drained energy in April from any significant ethics legislation, including a ban on lobbyist-paid travel, and the creation of an independent Office of Professional Integrity. That office could have been charged with investigating allegations like those that swirled around former Florida Rep. Foley, whose sexually explicit messages to teenage pages set off the current firestorm.

Instead, House leaders threw their weight behind a less-restrictive bill that required greater disclosure of lobbyist gifts but didn't ban them. The legislation didn't match a bill passed by the Senate, and it never became law. "They made a farce out of the whole thing when they should have tightened down and clamped down," said Ed Rollins, a Republican strategist.

In private meetings, House leaders said they didn't feel pressed to pass a tougher measure because the issue didn't show up on public polls as a concern to voters, several lawmakers and aides said.

But in the wake of the Foley scandal, that could be changing. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll conducted in the past week found that about half of likely voters said scandal will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote. And by nearly 2-1, the respondents said they trust Democrats more than Republicans to clean up Congress.

"It was reckless," says Connecticut Republican Rep. Christopher Shays, a key sponsor of the ethics legislation, who is now locked in a fierce re-election campaign. "We were on the edge of a cliff, and they [House leaders] said, 'We're not over the cliff.' The Foley thing has pushed a lot of us over the cliff," he added.

Just months after House leaders took ethics legislation off the agenda, the Abramoff scandal captured its first elected official: Ohio's Mr. Ney. Last month, the Department of Justice announced a plea agreement with Mr. Ney: He will plead guilty to one count of conspiracy and one count of making false statements. He could face 10 years for the charges, but prosecutors are expected to seek a sentence of 27 months.

According to the agreement, Mr. Ney has admitted accepting from Mr. Abramoff free international and domestic trips -- including a golfing trip to Scotland. In exchange, Mr. Ney attached amendments to a bill to help an Abramoff client, and inserted statements beneficial to the lobbyist in the Congressional Record, Mr. Ney admitted.

Mr. Ney dropped his re-election bid in August shortly before the plea deal was announced, but he has not resigned from Congress, and House Republican leaders have refused calls to insist that he do so.

The Scotland trip featured in the Ney plea agreement was also highlighted in the obstruction trial of Mr. Safavian, the former top procurement officer for the White House. Prosecutors charged that Mr. Abramoff floated most of the costs of the golfing trip for Mr. Safavian, and provided other benefits such as free meals and box seats at sporting events. Mr. Safavian was convicted of helping, in exchange, Mr. Abramoff and his clients who were seeking government property. Mr. Safavian, 38 years old, faces as much as 20 years in prison and about $1 million in fines.

Troubled Ethics Panel Tackles Scandal (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

The committee looking at the handling of the Foley case has been under fire for months.

WASHINGTON — The House Ethics Committee has had little to say as one scandal after another has rocked Capitol Hill since early 2005.

Now, can a panel that has been derided as a symbol of congressional dysfunction take up a tough, politically sensitive case a month before an election and produce results within weeks, as promised?

Skeptics abound.

"We don't have a lot of confidence in the Ethics Committee," said James Benton of the public watchdog group Common Cause.

The committee launched an investigation Thursday into the House GOP leadership's handling of a scandal involving sexually explicit communications that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to teenage pages. It has prepared nearly four dozen subpoenas for records and testimony, and its leaders are promising to go wherever the evidence takes them.

But the investigation follows months of attacks on the committee by those who say it failed to aggressively investigate the dealings of lobbyist Jack Abramoff and other scandals.

The committee's last major action — admonishing then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) — was two years ago. Afterward, the Ethics Committee chairman was booted from the panel.

"The last time the committee did its job … it had its head chopped off," Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer, a longtime champion of ethics reform, said Friday, calling it "not exactly a good sign" for the job ahead. He has called for the committee to appoint an outside counsel to investigate.

While the DeLay case was considered politically sensitive, this one could be tougher. It involves looking into what House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other lawmakers knew about Foley's activities, when, and how they responded.

The investigation also is being conducted in the heat of a partisan fight for control of Congress. On Friday, New Jersey Republican Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. called for Hastert to resign as speaker. And Democrats plan to discuss the scandal in their radio address today.

Most of Hastert's House GOP colleagues appear to be standing by him. Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas) sent a letter Friday urging fellow Republicans to wait for the results of the investigations. "Then we can judge everyone's actions for ourselves, based on facts instead of frenzy or ambition," he wrote.

The investigation comes as a new AP-Ipsos poll, conducted after the sex scandal broke, found that about half of likely voters polled thought that recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress would be very or extremely important to their vote in the November elections.

A new poll by the Pew Research Center, however, found that the scandal had not significantly affected the midterm race. In interviews before the scandal broke, the poll found Democrats were favored over Republicans for Congress, 51% to 38%, among registered voters. That was essentially unchanged in the days after Foley resigned.

The congressional probe also comes as the FBI conducts a separate criminal investigation that could affect the willingness of witnesses to cooperate with the Ethics Committee.

On Friday, the lawyer for a former Hill page from California identified as having traded messages with Foley said his client would be willing to answer questions from the ethics panel and the FBI. "Clearly, he wishes he had never been a House page," attorney Stephen Jones told CNN. "Nevertheless, his name has been brought into it. He wants to cooperate with the investigation. Whatever he is asked he will testify under oath truthfully to what he knows. It is up to others to know if it is relevant."

Given the committee's recent track record, few expect results soon. Hardly anyone expects a report before the November election.

"One of the problems is that the Ethics Committee has been somewhat dormant for a while," said Larry Noble, a Washington lawyer who specializes in ethics issues. "So it's hard to have a real sense of what it's capable of doing."

But Rep. Howard L. Berman of Valley Village, the committee's top Democrat, said in an interview Friday that since he rejoined the panel in the spring, "there is a lot more going on" within the committee than people realize, but that he couldn't publicly discuss it. And despite the committee's paralysis for much of 2005, Berman said, "As slow and as torturous as the process appears to be, the fact is if you look at the last 20 years, a number of careers have been ended by virtue of committee actions."

The panel, known officially as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, operates largely in secret. On Friday, committee officials declined any comment, including on whom they planned to summon to the committee's meeting room in the Capitol Hill basement, though it is expected to interview House GOP leaders and perhaps Foley and former pages.

The investigative subcommittee will be made up of committee Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.), Berman and Reps. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.) and Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio). Anyone summoned before the committee may be represented by an attorney and invoke the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

The committee, the only one in the House evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, was paralyzed for more than a year. Rep. Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia stepped down earlier this year as the top Democrat after his conduct came under scrutiny, and ethics watchdogs had new hope for the committee after Berman was named as his replacement.

It was an "honor I could have done without," Berman quipped at the time.

The committee in May launched investigations into the activities of Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.), and into whether other House members were involved in the dealings of now-imprisoned former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe). None of those probes have yet resulted in public reports.

Victim Advocates, Fla. Diocese Urge Foley To Name Alleged Abuser (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

The Roman Catholic diocese of Palm Beach, Fla., and national advocacy groups for victims of sexual abuse called yesterday for former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to give police the name of the clergyman who allegedly abused him as a teenager.

"He should absolutely report the perpetrator, living or dead," said David Clohessy, national director of the 7,000-member Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests. "He should do it now, not when his civil lawyer says it is convenient. Every day that a molester walks free is a day when he can hurt other kids."

Foley's attorney, David Roth, told reporters Tuesday that the former congressman, who was raised as a Catholic, was molested by a clergyman when he was 13 to 15 years old. But Roth did not name the clergyman, and Palm Beach police said they have not received any report of the abuse.

Alexis Walkenstein, a spokeswoman for the Palm Beach diocese, said Foley has not reported the abuse to local Catholic Church officials, either.

"It would be inappropriate to comment, because at this time we've only heard a vague allegation. If Mr. Foley was abused within the Catholic Church, we would encourage him to report it to law enforcement," she said.

Foley, 52, abruptly resigned his House seat a week ago and checked into an alcohol treatment center after lewd electronic messages that he sent to teenage former congressional pages were made public.

Clohessy said Foley "has the same responsibility that every citizen has to report crimes." He said that police and prosecutors have become more aggressive and successful at prosecuting older cases of sexual abuse and that Foley is "in no position to determine whether prosecution is possible."

"Every single day, we tell victims: Tell the police, tell the police. Because every so often, someone provides that extra bit of information that allows a prosecutor to make a case," Clohessy said. "Even if the perpetrator is dead, those who enabled or covered up the crimes might be prosecuted."

William J. Brooks, a Palm Beach Town Council member who is a former Catholic priest and a friend of Foley's, said it was "outrageous" that Roth pinpointed the years of the abuse without naming the abuser. In 1969 and 1970, Foley attended Cardinal Newman High School, a parochial school where Brooks was on the faculty.

"Get the name out there and let the legal process unfold. And clear the names of the other clergy people back in the early 1970s," Brooks said.

Theresa LePore, the former Palm Beach County elections supervisor who designed the "butterfly ballot" that stirred national controversy in the 2000 presidential election, is now director of development at Cardinal Newman High. She was also a classmate of Foley's.

She said she does not remember him and never heard of any molestation cases when she was a student at the school, which at the time was run by a religious order, the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate.

Amid Growing Scandal, Former Pages Defend Program (MCT)

By Kevin Diaz And Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - Andy Brehm's job as a congressional page got him into President Clinton's dramatic 1998 State of the Union speech, at the start of the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal.

Gina Schilmoeller, another former page from Minnesota, went to a party on Randy "Duke" Cunningham's infamous yacht, the "Duke Stir," years before it became a top exhibit in the bribery case that put the congressman in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0078645

Lauren Farrelly and Ashley Foster, former pages from Texas, have their own lasting recollections. Farrelly, who served as a House page this summer, shook hands with the Iraqi prime minister. Foster, a House page in 1999-2000, stood elbow to elbow with political celebrities most Americans see only on TV.

For them and for generations of other pages, the experience was a once-in-a-lifetime chance to get a sneak peek at the backstage of history, sometimes before it was made.

Most regard their service as a life-shaping experience. And they're eager to defend the program in a growing scandal evolving around sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages that disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley exchanged with House pages.

"I just hate that the page program is getting bad press," Foster said. "I don't think there is one member of my page class that would tell you anything negative about the program."

James Kotecki, of Raleigh, N.C., a page from January to June 2003, said that when he heard of the scandal with Foley last week, he was shocked. Then he began to fear what might happen to the program.

"I don't want this to be shining a negative light on this program," said Kotecki, who's now a senior at Georgetown University in Washington. "I felt very, very safe. I was never aware of any inappropriate interaction with members and pages."

Citing concerns over the well-being of the approximately 100 high school pages who work in Washington, some House members have suggested putting the 150-year-old program on hold.

The House Clerk's Office, which runs the program, says it's looking for ways to better protect the pages, who serve as congressional gofers and live in a dorm-style environment near the U.S. Capitol.

"We're going to ... step back and re-examine the program as it stands and decide if they need to make changes," spokeswoman Salley Collins said.

Rep. Betty McCollum, D-Minn., who sponsored a page last year, said new safeguards needed to be put in place: "Parents, before they send their children to Washington, should know that Congress is going to take measures to protect them."

Sex abuse victims' groups question whether congressional leaders in either party, who've been embroiled in a bitter fight for political advantage, are in the best position to propose reforms.

"What leaps out at me is that the oversight body consists of the very officials most apt to abuse and cover it up," said David Clohessy, the national director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, one of the nation's leading sex abuse-victims advocacy groups. "For starters, the ongoing Catholic abuse crisis has taught us yet again that no institution can police itself."

Teenage pages are part of daily life in the Capitol, scurrying along hallways with papers and messages for their bosses, easily identifiable by their neatly pressed white shirts and navy blazers. Nominated by home-state lawmakers, they're often chosen because of outstanding grades or community service.

Dozens of politicians got their start as pages, including Colorado Gov. Bill Owens, Sens. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn. and Mark Pryor, D-Ark., and Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich. Microsoft founder Bill Gates was a 15-year-old House page in 1972 and has described the experience as "an exciting opportunity."

Virtually all ex-pages have stories about their brushes with history, but for sheer drama few can match that of Altho A. Allen, who's now a 71-year-old retiree in San Antonio. He was on the House floor in 1954 when four Puerto Rican nationalists stood up in the gallery and sprayed gunfire into a chamber milling with lawmakers.

Allen, recalling the incident in a telephone interview, said he heard "some popping noises" and saw a congressman fall, one of five who were wounded in the attack. Allen said he then helped House Speaker Joe Martin and the parliamentarian flee the chamber.

Living in triple rooms, pages occupy the very bottom of the political food chain in Washington and generally appreciate any direct interaction with members of Congress, who are the city's rock stars.

"We really didn't have that much unsupervised contact with House members," said Brehm, a University of Minnesota law school student and former press secretary for Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "What little time you spent with them was usually on the House floor."

The daily routine, which includes chaperones, monitored government computers, a buddy system and 10 p.m. weekday curfews, reflects the scandals of a previous generation in Congress.

One involved Rep. Dan Crane, R-Ill., who admitted to sexual relations with a 17-year-old female page. Another ensnared Rep. Gerry Studds, D-Mass., who acknowledged a sexual relationship with a 17-year-old male page.

Beginning with the 6:45 a.m. start of page school, five days a week, and ending with the adjournment of Congress, sometimes late at night, a page's life can be a long grind of schoolwork, running errands and delivering documents.

"You didn't have enough time to get homesick," Farrelly said.

DOJ_NMG_0078646

Even with the restrictions and sometimes menial duties, the rewards of working in the Capitol and watching the nation's political machinery offer once-in-a lifetime advantages, said Foster, who's now a graduate student at George Washington University in Washington.

"I learned what you can't learn from a textbook," she said. "It opened the door to the rest of my life."

Debate Turns To Future Of Page Program (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And Moises Mendoza

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Some call for its end, saying lawmakers can't be trusted. Others, including past pages, defend what has long been a Hill institution.

WASHINGTON — When Republican representatives hooked up for a conference call this week to discuss the political crisis over former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to former pages, the most heated discussion was not over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the matter, but over the future of the congressional page program.

"They all supported the speaker," said one participant in the call. "It got tense over whether the entire page program should be abolished."

A few lawmakers, notably Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), have suggested that the program be scrapped. "Send the pages home," he said, noting at one point that it's "pretty obvious" lawmakers can't be trusted around them.

But after Congress scrubs off the latest tarnish, the venerable program is likely to persevere. For senators and representatives, it's a much-cherished perk that they can bestow on the children of constituents. For former pages, who ardently defend the program, it's an inspirational opportunity to see politicians at work in the cloakrooms of power.

"For every page failed by a congressman, there is a page who turned out to be a congressman," Kevin O'Connor, a Republican page in the summer of 2003, wrote in an e-mail. "I left the page program with a broadened perspective, a wildly diverse array of friends and no regrets."

There are currently 63 House pages and 30 Senate pages, mostly 16-year-olds. They attend high school starting at 6 a.m. and then run errands for Congress — answering phones, taking messages, delivering documents — often late into the night, when they return to secured dorms to finish their homework.

Foley's sexually explicit messages have recalled the program's lowest point, in 1983, when two House members were censured for sexual relationships with pages. A six-member board made up of lawmakers and staffers was then set up to oversee the program. But in this case, only one of the three congressional members was told about Foley's messages.

Hastert has rebuffed calls to suspend or end the program. Instead, he said Thursday that he was looking "for a person of high caliber to advise us." He also set up a tip line to report inappropriate behavior toward pages.

The patronage program has a long history, starting with a 9-year-old appointed by Sen. Daniel Webster of Massachusetts in 1829. It's a favorite of the Capitol's 535 politicians because it allows them to reward promising students — and sometimes the scions of powerful political allies.

For years, Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, visited Gordon Tech High School in Chicago to select two pages to join him in Washington for the school year. On the Senate side, Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), who served the longest in the upper chamber, brought new pages to his office from South Carolina every month.

These days, the page program is more regulated and has strict merit requirements — students can't be appointed unless they have 3.0 grade-point averages and letters of recommendation from community leaders.

But the families of some pages are politically well-connected.

Robert Rose, a Senate page in 2002 and now a senior at Georgetown University, said his mother's cousin was a political memorabilia expert who became friends with an aide to Thurmond, who nominated Rose. "This sort of thing is very typical," he said. "I only knew of one or two people in my page class who did not have some sort of prior connection to somebody in office."

But Shyanna Hughes of Los Angeles said just a few in her class arrived through connections. "It was kind of obvious: 'OK, they have a lot of money. OK, her dad is the governor of a state,' " said Hughes, who was a page in 1997. "You could definitely tell there were some there, but I would say it was a very low percentage."

Most of the pages during the 1992-93 school year had no ties to politicians, said Naomi Wallace, who was appointed by Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles). "I had one roommate from Michigan who competed against 3,000 applicants and another from West Virginia whose family income was $20,000 a year," said Wallace, who is shopping around a book about her year in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0078647

Mindful of the political calendar, Wallace, now a theater arts student in London, dismissed talk of scrapping the program as rhetoric timed for the midterm elections. "In my opinion, 16-year-olds should not be punished because the Republicans are afraid of losing their majority in the House," she said.

Wallace said pages were warned to be wary. "Sexwise, we were constantly reminded about the scandal from a few years prior," she said.

James Kotecki, of Raleigh, N.C., remembers that the pages at his orientation in 2003 were told to address lawmakers formally. But he said the informal conversations the politicians initiated were among the most rewarding experiences. "They just made us love politics even more, to see it at an up-close level," said Kotecki, now at Georgetown University. "If they feel they can't have informal contact with us, the pages would lose a very valuable experience."

The rules on fraternization are so strict that one page said even his mother had to prove who she was to see him.

"When my mom came, she had to sign me out, show ID and talk to my proctor before she could take me out," said Richard Frohlichstein, who served as a page from Missouri. "When someone asks me about the program, I can never think of a negative thing."

The idea that one congressman's lewd behavior toward male pages could jeopardize the existence of the program has alarmed its graduates.

Zack Hall, a University of Texas sophomore who was a House page in 2004, has launched "Save the Congressional Page Program" on the networking site Facebook.com.

"I think getting rid of the page program would be avoiding the problem," he said. "The problem is, members of Congress are powerful people and we need to protect pages, not just get rid of it."

This view is shared by some powerful ex-pages — members of Congress.

"It's just as good a program now as it was for me in 1938," said Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), a former page who was first elected in 1955 and is now the most senior member of Congress. "Asking if we should suspend the page program is the wrong question. We should be asking what has happened to Congress that would bring us to even consider ending this terrific opportunity for talented teenagers."

nicole.gaouette@latimes.com

moises.mendoza@latimes.com

Times staff writers Sandy Banks in Los Angeles and Janet Hook, Johanna Neuman and Maura Reynolds in Washington and researcher Vicki Gallay in Los Angeles contributed to this report.

The Foley Fires (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

We hope that when the Mark Foley story expires, the Washington political community will step back to reflect. It is generally argued that stories such as this gain prominence because the news is slow. But the news cycle is not slow. Russia is imposing trade and travel restrictions on an independent nation (see the editorial on Georgia nearby1). It was possible as we went to press yesterday that North Korea this weekend would carry out an underground nuclear-weapon test; and if it does, how should the U.S. respond? This story was deep inside the major newspapers yesterday, while the Foley flap covered their front pages.

Mr. Foley's activities with congressional pages, described so far as exchanges of sexually explicit emails and instant messages, were vile. The Republicans should have notified the Democrat on the Page Board. Mr. Foley should have been barred from contact with pages. He has resigned. He is being criminally investigated. If, however, the modern media forces in play over the Foley affair can conspire to submerge all other political life, then batten down the hatches for the 2008 presidential election. The 2004 election will look like toy boats on the water.

Sexually Explicit Communications Rock Congress3

Most likely, the Foley fire will burn on. The House Ethics Committee has issued some four dozen subpoenas. They will learn something about who knew what when. This gasoline will be leaked. And given the volatility of the subject, the fire could burn well beyond the Speaker's office.

One useful lesson may be we'll find that the House "system" that should have caught this problem is in fact a bloated bureaucracy of staffs for committees upon subcommittees created to oversee every nook in the federal empire. It is not beyond imagining that the private life of Mark Foley could slip through. Would it be reprehensible if true? Yes. Shocking?

Speaker Hastert should not resign before the election. It would be a disservice to send voters to the polls in five weeks amid tumult over Mark Foley. Those for whom this is a deciding issue should certainly vote on it. Our view is that the country would be better served with a clearer sense of the electorate's sentiment on dealing with the global threat and domestic well-being. Those are fit subjects of a serious national election.

DOJ_NMG_0078648

My Poppy, Mr. President (NSWK)

By Jessica Bennett, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 7, 2006

Doro Bush Koch talks about her new book—and growing up in a presidential family. WEB EXCLUSIVE

As president, George H.W. Bush faced a starkly changing world: the Berlin Wall came down and the cold war ended after 40 tense years. He overthrew the corrupt regime of Panama's Manuel Noriega and invaded Iraq (without ousting Saddam Hussein) to protect Kuwait in a 100-hour war. As a father and younger man, he dealt with the daily challenges of raising five young children, as well as the tragic death of his daughter from leukemia at age 4. Now at 82, a new book—written by the former president's only living daughter—highlights Bush's life beyond his political career.

"My Father, My President" (Warner) takes an inside look at the personal stories, family memories and intimate challenges that remained largely out of the public eye during Bush's presidential years. Dorothy (Doro) Bush Koch, spoke with NEWSWEEK's Jessica Bennett about her father's legacy. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: What does this book tell us about your father than we may not have known?

Doro Bush Koch: My dad reached the highest pinnacle of his career when he became president, but he also had some low points, such as the death of a daughter. We have a firsthand account of when my dad was shot down on Sept. 2, 1944, which I think is very fascinating. But I hope people will learn how he coped not only with the good times but with the bad times with sort of dignity and grace.

What were your family dynamics growing up—did you ever think your father or brother would be president?

I never really thought that—it just sort of evolved and happened. But we have a very close-knit family, my brothers all played Little League, so we didn't ever dream really that anything like that would happen. But when it did happen it wasn't a surprise.

I know your sister died before you were born, but what kind of an impact did her death have on your family.

The thing about Robin, it was obviously very, very sad for my parents. But on the other hand, looking back, they only have happy memories of Robin. Her life has really inspired my parents to do so much for cancer research, so her life has really been a blessing in a way. Many families break apart over the death of a child, but my parents grew stronger and were able to make good out of her short little life.

What does the book say about the relationship between your mother and father?

There's one story in the book that I really love. After he became president, my dad was knighted by Queen Elizabeth. And, my dad said to my mom one day, "What's it like to live with a real live knight?" And my mom turned to him and said, "Make the coffee, Sir George." That's sort of typical of their rapport.

Is there any childhood story you remember that really gives a sense of the type of father George H.W. Bush was?

When I moved to Washington [at age 8] and my dad was entering the House of Representatives, school was starting and my dad brought my two brothers and I to Washington to start school. I was very worried because in Houston, the girls wore short socks, and I wasn't sure if they wore knee socks in the Northeast or short socks. My dad went across the street to the neighbors and rang the doorbell, because he'd heard a little girl there was going to be in my class, and he asked the neighbors if the girls were wearing short or long socks. I love that story because it's just kind of sweet.

Why hasn't your father written his own memoirs?

He has such a full life and he's constantly out there doing things for other people, you've seen him with President Clinton, doing all his work for the tsunami and Katrina [victims], he really doesn't put aside much time for writing a book.

Describe your father's relationship with Bill Clinton, his onetime rival.

A friend of mine told me once, "If your father invites Bill Clinton to Kennebunkport then I'll know he's really lost it." And then sure enough the very next weekend, he got invited up to Kennebunkport, and he's been twice already. They have a genuinely warm friendship based on the bond of both being former presidents and both wanting to get out in the world and do something good. President Clinton is very respectful of my dad. When they traveled [together after] the tsunami, my dad's chief of staff told me that if there were rough roads they were walking on, President Clinton would take my dad's arm and [be] very tender in making sure he was taken care of. That says a lot to me, and I think that's very sweet.

What has it been like, on a personal level, seeing your father and brother picked apart by critics over the years?

It's hard in both cases, as you can imagine, because politics—for someone who's related to a president—is very personal. It's hard, and I talk a lot about that in the book. You know, sometimes the media has a narrative about something, and they decide that someone's going to be out of touch or something like that and they find stories to fill that narrative, and then it becomes sort of a false history.

Was it kind of crazy growing up in such a political family?

DOJ_NMG_0078649

It's kind of amazing when I think about it. I don't think about it very much, I have four children, I'm very busy. I've been able to see history from the front row in many cases, which has been a real thrill for me. I feel very lucky.

Do you call your brother George or Mr. President?

I call him Mr. President, with affection though. He doesn't ask me to, but I do just out of respect for the office, something my dad had taught me early on. He has great respect for the presidency. So it's Mr. President, but with affection.

Was there ever a time when you flatly disagreed with one of your dad's or brother's policies?

Probably.

Was that something you'd raise with them or keep to yourself?

Yeah, sure, we'd talk about all kinds of things. But I don't want to make it news reported in NEWSWEEK.

Your husband is a Democrat. Has that caused political debates over the years?

It's been fine. A lot of Democrats marry Republicans and it works out just fine.

Your father was president, your brother is president, another brother is a governor, and your parents' late dog wrote a best seller. Is that a lot to live up to?

No, not at all. One of the things that I love about my dad is that he loves you if you're a governor, he loves you if you're a mom, he loves you if you're a banker, whatever you are. He really was a father first, so there wasn't any pressure in any way.

What's the one thing you hope people can take away from your father's life?

There's a chapter in the book called "Master of the Small Gesture," that no matter who you are and what you do in life you can always take the time to call someone who's down and out or write a note to cheer someone up. It's the little things in life that make the enormous difference, and that's something my father's very, very good at.

Mrs. Clinton Hits Road To Support The Party (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — Underscoring her national ambitions and the weakness of her opposition in New York as she runs for a second term, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is mounting a major push for Democratic Congressional candidates across the nation during the final weeks of the fiercely contested midterm elections, her aides said on Friday.

Mrs. Clinton, who has been occasionally criticized by liberal bloggers for not using enough of her bulging campaign coffers to help her party, is shipping $1.5 million to two Democratic Congressional campaign committees based in Washington, as well as to the financially strained New York State Democratic Party, her advisers said.

Mrs. Clinton is giving $1.1 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which comes on top of the $1 million that she gave the committee last month. In addition, the senator is donating $250,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and $150,000 to the New York State Democratic Party.

At the same time, Mrs. Clinton also plans to campaign for nearly 20 candidates in about a dozen states, occupying time she could have otherwise used to campaign for herself in New York, where she faces a little known and poorly financed Republican challenger, John Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers.

Among the places where Mrs. Clinton plans to appear are Ohio and Pennsylvania, two important presidential battleground states, where she will campaign for House and Senate Democratic candidates. Mrs. Clinton alsowill be in Virginia, New Jersey, Florida, Nevada, Rhode Island and Minnesota.

But Mrs. Clinton will also be touching her bases in New York, where she will be campaigning and fund-raising on behalf of House candidates in the Albany region, the Finger Lakes region and the Utica region. Mrs. Clinton will also hold a $200,000 fund-raiser for the State Democratic Party in New York City next week.

Her advisers say that Mrs. Clinton is motivated by her desire to bolster her party's political prospects this November. "She is committed to winning back the House and the Senate," said Patti Solis Doyle, the executive director of Friends of Hillary, the senator's political committee.

But for Mrs. Clinton, a possible 2008 presidential candidate, there is an obvious benefit to playing such a prominent role nationally: an opportunity to curry favor with Democratic candidates around the country who can, in turn, be helpful to her in a national campaign. In the case of the Senate Democratic committee for example, Mrs. Clinton has given far more money than any other Democrat who is considering running for the presidency.

Mr. Spencer, who is far behind Mrs. Clinton in public opinion polls and fund-raising, wasted little time in trying to use her efforts on the national stage against her.

Robert Ryan, a spokesman for the Spencer campaign, said Mrs. Clinton had an obligation to level with New Yorkers about the prospect that she might have to cut her second term in the Senate short to leave for the presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0078650

"It's obvious Hillary Clinton is running for president," he said. "She needs to tell New Yorkers if she will serve out her term if she is re-elected. It's a simple yes or no. And voters deserve to know."

The more than $2 million that Mrs. Clinton is donating from her own campaign war chest is on top of the roughly $18 million that Mrs. Clinton's advisers say she has helped individual candidates and party committees raise in the 2005-6 election cycle.

Still, Mrs. Clinton, who has about $22 million in her own campaign account, has been the target of criticism from some liberals who have said she should do more to help the party since her own race is not competitive.

The new round of donations from Mrs. Clinton comes at a time when some national Democratic leaders are openly worried that the huge fund-raising edge that Republicans enjoy could cloud the otherwise favorable political environment that Democrats are facing as Election Day approaches.

In an interview, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is heading the Democrats' effort to win the Senate, said he recently sat down with Mrs. Clinton, his junior colleague from New York, and made a personal appeal for help. "She said, 'I am not going to let you down,' and she sure didn't," Mr. Schumer said. "The money makes a big difference to us and could not come at a better time."

Mrs. Clinton's campaign also reported on Friday that she and her husband raised $2.5 million during a fund-raiser this week that the couple played host to at Whitehaven, their home here in Washington on Whitehaven Street near Embassy Row. The money was for the Democrats' Senate and House committees.

General Endorses Lamont, Faulting Lieberman On Iraq (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

STORRS, Conn., Oct. 6 — Gen. Wesley K. Clark criticized Senator Joseph I. Lieberman on Friday, accusing him of having "rubber-stamped" the Bush administration's Iraq policies, and he questioned Mr. Lieberman's understanding of military issues, during campaign appearances with Ned Lamont, the Democratic nominee for United States Senate.

During a rally at the University of Connecticut, General Clark offered a strong endorsement of Mr. Lamont, saying that he would be "the key to changing the course in this country." General Clark, who is retired from the Army, is one of several potential candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 who has campaigned for Mr. Lamont.

"We're not winning the war on terror," General Clark said during the rally. "George Bush says stay the course; how can you stay the course when you're in a ditch? Joe Lieberman — he's been a part of that ditch. The truth is, he didn't exactly control the steering wheel, but he was sort of supporting the elbow of the guy who drove us into the ditch."

About 300 people turned out for the campus rally, a few waving handmade signs saying "Ned for Change." A few dozen Lieberman supporters also attended, and workers for his campaign passed out large hats in the shape of a light bulb that read "Ned Lamont has no idea."

Mr. Lieberman spent the day in the New Haven area, continuing his efforts to appeal to middle-class voters. He proposed increasing college tuition tax credits, and he promoted two proposals he has introduced in the Senate, which would triple tax deductions for college tuition and more than double the maximum federal Pell Grant award.

Mr. Lieberman said the increases could be paid for by rolling back Bush administration tax cuts.

Earlier in the day, General Clark, who ran against Mr. Lieberman in the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries, spoke to veterans at a McDonald's in Derby. Many of them said they supported Mr. Lamont, but others said they respected Mr. Lieberman's experience.

General Clark recalled that when he was the supreme commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the 1990's, he briefed Mr. Lieberman and other members of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I thought he understood, but he didn't understand," General Clark said of Mr. Lieberman. "All that experience, he still rubber-stamped the Bush administration going into Iraq. I like Joe, but I am very disappointed."

Mr. Lieberman called that characterization "just wrong," saying that he had criticized the Bush administration's handling of the Iraq insurgency since the 2003 invasion.

During the rally, Mr. Lamont cited a recent National Intelligence Estimate that suggested that the war in Iraq was inflaming terrorists.

"They told us this war is weakening America; they told us this war is making us less secure," Mr. Lamont said of the federal report, asserting that the Bush administration has been ignoring growing criticism of the war from military experts.

"Every course must have an end," Mr. Lamont told the crowd, adding: "Only the Iraqis can solve this for themselves. We can't impose this peace in a barrel of a gun. Our troops have done everything you can humanly ask them to do."

Mr. Lamont has said he would support a deadline or a timeline for withdrawing most troops from Iraq, though he says some troops should stay for "humanitarian efforts."

DOJ_NMG_0078651

Mr. Lieberman said he respected General Clark, adding: “We disagree on some things, we agree on some things. Endorsements come and go in politics.” But he questioned whether the general supported Mr. Lamont’s proposal to begin withdrawing front-line combat troops.

Speaking to reporters after the rally, General Clark did not make clear whether he would support a timeline or a deadline, saying there “may be a place for a timeline.” He said that it would not be possible to win militarily in Iraq and that the United States should negotiate with all countries in the Middle East.

Mr. Lieberman opposes implementing a timeline for troop withdrawal, saying that to do so would embolden insurgents. He has said the United States should do more to train Iraqi troops to help bring American troops home more quickly.

Steele's Ad Seemingly At Odds With Fundraising (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

In a recent commercial advertising his bid for U.S. Senate, Maryland Republican Michael S. Steele tells voters that his opponent, Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, has been tainted by contributions from pharmaceutical companies and special interests.

"Congressman Cardin took money from drug companies," Steele says. "I want to ban gifts from special interests."

The ad does not mention that less than a week before the commercial began airing, a top drug company executive and an industry lobbyist hosted a $1,000-a-person fundraiser for Steele at a K Street steakhouse in Washington.

The invitation to the fundraiser, obtained by The Washington Post, says the Sept. 20 lunch reception was to be hosted by Sally Walsh, a director of federal government relations at GlaxoSmithKline, and Michael Carozza, a lobbyist for Bristol-Myers Squibb.

It advises donors to send contributions to lobbyist Frederick T. Dombo III, who identifies himself on his Web site as a Steele campaign volunteer. Federal records show that Dombo represents AmerisourceBergen Specialty Group, one of the largest pharmaceutical services companies in the country.

"I think, charitably, you'd have assume people will look at this and say this guy is being hypocritical," said Donald Norris, a political science professor at the University of Maryland Baltimore County. "How can he slam the other guy if he's doing the same thing?"

Neither Dombo nor Walsh returned calls to their offices. Carozza would not comment.

The Steele campaign rejects suggestions that it was hypocritical, pointing to a line in the ad that draws a key distinction between the candidates. "I support cheaper medicine from Canada," Steele says in the ad. Cardin took the money "and voted against cheaper medicine."

"One of these two candidates does not dance to the tune of Washington special interests, and it's Michael Steele," said Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye.

The reimportation issue is significant to drug industry lobbyists, who vehemently oppose allowing U.S. citizens to purchase drugs from Canada. Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s administration has voiced safety concerns about reimportation. One of the lobbyists who attended the Steele fundraiser expressed surprise that Steele would run an ad supporting the policy.

The lobbyist said he and others had considerable concern about having donated to Steele, only to learn days later of his position. The lobbyist spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid angering Steele.

The lobbyist said Steele's campaign reassured him that his position was consistent with existing law. But Heye said that's not the case.

"He supports the safe reimportation of prescription drugs to reduce the cost," Heye said. "The key word there is 'reduce.' Current law doesn't do that. In his ad, he makes it very clear. If lobbyists or special interests are upset because of that position, so be it."

Cardin spokesman Oren Shur said: "Michael Steele made promises to his special interest friends and pocketed their money. Six days later he told Maryland families something different. Whose side is Michael Steele on?"

The Steele commercial, which aired Sept. 26, marked the first negative turn in his advertising campaign, coming in response to a spot by national Democrats that painted the Republican candidate as being in President Bush's hip pocket.

But the line of attack against Cardin was not new. In news releases and interviews, state Republican Party officials have been criticizing Cardin's financial ties to the drug companies. They gave him heat for asserting in a television ad that he has "taken on the drug companies, the oil companies, the insurance companies."

Records showed Cardin had accepted checks from political action committees representing six large pharmaceutical companies, 22 oil and energy outfits, 27 insurance firms and industry associations, and eight HMOs.

DOJ_NMG_0078652

At last report, Cardin's accounts contained more than $874,826 from political action committees, many of them pushing the interests of large corporations, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which compiles such data. Steele's contributions included $613,578 from PACs.

Attention to the role of special interests escalated yesterday when the state Republican Party issued a news release accusing Cardin of letting lobbyists write key portions of pension legislation he sponsored.

"It is the height of hypocrisy for Congressman Cardin to say he will stand up to special interests -- and claim to oppose special interests' writing legislation -- when his own legislation was handwritten by corporate lobbyists," said GOP Chairman John Kane.

Norris said the conflict between Steele's assertions in the commercial and his fundraising presents a more potent political issue because it compounds a problem that has dogged Steele the entire campaign -- whether he can square his portrayal of himself as a Washington outsider with his long-standing ties to big name Washington insiders.

Although Steele rarely mentions his party affiliation in public, he served as state GOP chairman, spoke at the Republican National Convention in 2004 and campaigned across the country for Bush. Bush, Vice President Cheney, aide Karl Rove and others helped enlist Steele to run and raised more than $1 million for his campaign.

Dean Laments Lack Of Diversity (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday said that Maryland's Democratic ticket should have had a black or other minority at the top, but added that the national party isn't to blame for the lack of diversity.

"I do think there should be more diversity on this ticket," Mr. Dean said during a visit to the Maryland Democratic Party's campaign headquarters in Hyattsville.

However, Mr. Dean said that the national party bears no responsibility for Maryland's Democratic ticket, which offers four white men for the state's top offices -- the U.S. Senate, governor, attorney general and comptroller.

"We don't interfere in primaries," he said of the DNC.

The Washington Times yesterday reported that black business owners and religious leaders have expressed discontent with the Maryland Democratic Party's lack of black statewide candidates and said it will encourage support for Republicans -- especially Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's run for the U.S. Senate.

In addition, the Baltimore Sun reported Thursday that Maryland's 10 black state senators met last week with U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee for the Senate, and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor, to complain about the lack of diversity at the top of the statewide ticket.

State Sen. Ulysses Currie, a black Democrat from Prince George's County, blamed a lack of discipline by the national party for the lack of diversity among the top nominees on Maryland's Democratic ticket.

"The Republican Party made the decision at the national level that they wanted Michael Steele to run for the U.S. Senate," said Mr. Currie, who supported Mr. Cardin over Kweisi Mfume, a past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in last month's primary.

Mr. Cardin beat Mr. Mfume in the statewide contest, but Mr. Mfume trounced the 10-term congressman in the majority-black districts of Prince George's County and Baltimore.

In next month's general election, Mr. Cardin squares off against Mr. Steele, who is the first black to win a statewide office in Maryland.

What's more, the Republican Party offers two women in other top contests -- Anne McCarthy for comptroller and Disabilities Secretary Kristen Cox for lieutenant governor.

Mr. O'Malley's running mate for lieutenant governor -- Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, who is black -- is the only minority at the top of the Democratic ticket.

Mr. Dean, a former Vermont governor whose presidential campaign fell apart in 2004, took issue with charges that Maryland Democrats lack diversity, noting Mr. Brown's candidacy.

"We don't have a lack of diversity. We just don't have as much as I would like," he said. "But we do have some, and Brown is a fantastic candidate, and he's got a great future in Maryland politics.

"Yes, we need more diversity. I'm pushing that very hard. I know [state party Chairman] Terry Lierman's pushing that very hard," Mr. Dean said. "But on the other hand, we've got four weeks left until this election. We need to do what's right for America, and what's right for America is to make sure we get rid of this rubber-stamp Congress."

Mr. Dean toured the basement office, where about 20 Democratic volunteers and staffers were working phone banks and conducting surveys.

DOJ_NMG_0078653

He took questions from the volunteers, and a few expressed anxiety about the upcoming election.

One said many people she had called "don't seem to know a lot about the Democratic Party" and asked if there would be a "concerted effort to get the party message out before the election."

"That's really up to the individual candidates to do that, and I think they will," Mr. Dean said. "It's hard to do it, frankly, with all the scandal stuff that's coming out of Washington. It's hard for anybody to get their message out."

He pointed to a monthlong voter-turnout effort that the Democratic Party is kicking off today, saying that activists plan to knock on 3 million doors.

Mr. Dean's strategy to invest money and resources in all 50 states has angered other national Democratic leaders who say the party needs to focus on states with close races.

Webb Shifts Debate To Iraq, Urging Diplomacy To End War (WP)

By Tim Craig And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate James Webb said yesterday that it is time for the United States to seek an end to the fighting in Iraq through diplomacy, citing a new and dire assessment of the war effort by Virginia's senior senator, John W. Warner (R).

Webb sought to capitalize on Warner's appraisal of the war to highlight what Webb called the failure of his GOP opponent, Sen. George Allen, to face reality about the worsening situation in Iraq. Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Thursday that the United States should reconsider its approach if the violence does not subside soon.

"They have a victory quite frankly in military terms," Webb said of soldiers in Iraq. "What we have to do is to move this into the political, diplomatic environment. All I've heard from Senator Allen is that we need a victory in Iraq, whatever that is."

Allen, who is battling Webb for a second term, shot back that Webb's comments at a news conference yesterday in Richmond were turning Iraq "into some sort of political game." Allen's campaign quickly organized a conference call for reporters with Warner as a show of Republican unity.

"The bottom-line goal that Senator Warner and I share is that we cannot leave Iraq as a central haven for terrorists," Allen said.

The exchange was the first substantive argument between the two on Iraq policy since they clashed Sept. 17 on NBC's "Meet the Press." And it comes as they prepare for their final scheduled televised debate Monday night.

Warner, who returned this week from Iraq, said parts of the country have "taken steps backwards." Webb, an early critic of the war, seized on Warner's comments as proof that Allen has failed to offer a clear plan for ending the war.

In his stump speech, Allen says the United States cannot "cut and run" and must continue to fight in Iraq because "there is no substitute for victory." Webb said he wants the United States to start talking to Iraq's neighbors to develop plans to shift troops to other Arab nations.

"It's pretty hard to even see what Senator Allen's position is," Webb said. "The only things he has been saying is basically the three- or four-word phrase that matches what the administration has been saying."

In the conference call, Allen warned that Iraq would escalate into chaos and become a haven for terrorists if troops leave before the country's government and police force are stable.

"These terrorist threats we face are real. This is not some political game we are in. . . . We need to remain vigilant in it rather than turn it into some political game, as my opponent wishes to do," Allen said.

Warner declined to criticize Webb, but the senator predicted horrific consequences if "those [oil] fields would fall into the hands of terrorists." But he added that "bold decisions" will be needed if the violence does not subside soon.

Webb said that if elected he would offer "a different set of eyes on the problem."

The return to the Iraq discussion marked a change for a campaign that has been dominated by personal issues, including Allen's alleged use of racial slurs in college and a 1979 article by Webb that some women have called demeaning.

In a two-minute commercial Monday, Allen asked for an end to personal attacks. "The negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve."

But Allen yesterday unveiled two television ads, one attacking Webb on taxes and the other focused on Webb's attitude toward women 30 years ago.

The tax ad shows a rotating cube with the pictures of Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). "There are some people in Washington who think you don't pay enough taxes. And they all support Jim Webb," an announcer says.

The ad then accuses Webb of wanting to raise taxes on families by $2,000 a year and says he supports other tax hikes. Webb aides called the ad "another gross misrepresentation of Jim's positions."

DOJ_NMG_0078654

The other Allen ad features a Naval Academy graduate who claims Webb made up her quotes after he interviewed her for the 1979 magazine article. The quotes did not appear in the article.

"I looked at him and said, 'I never said any of those things; they're all lies,' " said Janice Buxbaum of Springfield. "And he said, 'Too bad.' He's a bright man; he's just not an honest man. I don't want him in my party, and I don't want him in my Senate."

In an interview, Buxbaum said that she could not recall the exact quotes Webb had proposed to use and that the quotes were removed after she refused to sign a release. She said Webb had showed her statements he planned to attribute to her about "sexual activities and exploits" of female midshipmen.

"It didn't happen, so I never said it, and he was ascribing them to me," she said.

Webb accused Allen of conducting a "Karl Rove era" campaign, referring to President Bush's chief political adviser. "This woman isn't even in the article," Webb said.

Shear reported from Richmond.

Allen Foes Cite Sister's Book (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Sen. George Allen's political opponents have cited his sister's memoir to portray him as a bully, but an attentive read of her recollections of growing up with football-minded men provides deep insight into the Virginia Republican's past now at issue in his re-election campaign. "Fifth Quarter: The Scrimmage of a Football Coach's Daughter" by Jennifer Allen includes some eyebrow-raising passages such as a young George Allen dragging his sister by her hair or hitting her boyfriend with a pool cue, incidents that are often noted by Mr. Allen's Democratic foes. But his critics don't use excerpts noting that the senator was a star student or how he set out a chair in honor of his late father, famed NFL coach George H. Allen, at his 1994 gubernatorial inauguration. "He got straight A's, even when he acted like a hick," Miss Allen writes in the book, published in 2000 just before George, the oldest of her three brothers, was elected to the Senate. Mr. Allen's youth, particularly his stint as a second-string quarterback for the University of Virginia, has become a campaign issue since some former teammates have accused him of racism and uttering racial slurs while there. If young George had any racist tendencies, Miss Allen kept them out of "Fifth Quarter," which casts the family with an international understanding and Coach Allen as a man who was colorblind on the field. In reading the book, it is easy to understand why the senator equates almost everything with football -- his family lived, breathed and died by the game. The coach's career with the Los Angeles Rams and the Washington Redskins (during which he never had a losing season) taught the children about loyalty, the power of the press and appreciation of physical strength. "George never cried; I didn't think he even knew how," is one revealing passage from the book, which opens with 8-year-old Jennifer's observations of the 1968 football season. "I saw George get blindsided by a car, roll over its hood and land shoulder-first onto the pavement to make a diving catch without shedding a tear," she remembers of her brother, nine years her senior. Mr. Allen often invokes his father's favorite phrase, "The future is now," especially when asked about his 2008 presidential ambitions. The phrase is pertinent today, as he is nearly tied with Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr., a Vietnam veteran and Navy secretary under President Reagan. "Fifth Quarter" also provides an understanding of Henrietta "Etty" Allen, the family's brash matriarch. Raised in French Tunisia, Mrs. Allen frequently cursed at reporters, fans of opposing football teams and her children. "Fifth Quarter" depicts a dysfunctional family obsessed with football. One night soon after a Rams loss, Coach Allen and middle son Gregory argued after the boy failed to pour him a glass of milk. "Dad lifted Gregory up by the shirt collar. ... Dad picked up a plate and George stood up. It was the first time I had seen anyone take a stand against Dad. George said, 'If you're going to hit him, you'll have to hit me first.' " Jennifer, who ran from the room and hid in her closet, didn't spell out what happened next between her father and George, but Gregory ended up with a broken nose. The book sometimes portrays young George as a violent teen who called his sister "ugly," but Miss Allen also says she wanted her brothers to "turn me upside down, rough me up, because I thought I was in training to be the NFL's first girl quarterback." Some choice quotes include "George hoped someday to become a dentist ...a perfect profession -- getting paid to make people suffer," and "Ever since my brother George held me over the railing at Niagara Falls, I've had a fear of heights." Attempts by The Washington Times to reach the author, now Jennifer Richard, were unsuccessful, but she told the Associated Press in May that the pool cue incident wasn't violent -- her brother was testing her boyfriend's reflexes. Calling "Fifth Quarter" a "novelization of the past," Mrs. Richard told the AP that when George walked her down her wedding aisle in the absence of their late father, "He was crying more than anybody." The author notes in the acknowledgments that she consulted with her family while writing the memoir: "My brother George sat with me for hours by the pool one day, measuring out parcels of his past, all the while reminding me to remain faithful to the facts."

Battling Power Of Incumbency, And Feeling Left To Fight Alone (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

DOJ_NMG_0078655

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

BRIGHTON, Mich. — Implausible pursuits can be humbling. Jim Marcinkowski, a Democrat, discovers this every day in his bid to dislodge Representative Mike Rogers, a three-term Republican, from the United States Congress.

"Hi, Jim Marcinkowski," he says to an elderly man in a recent visit to a senior center.

"What?" The man is having trouble hearing over the accordion.

"I'm Jim, running for Congress."

"Oh."

The candidate pivots, approaches an elderly woman.

"Hi, Jim Marcinkowski."

"Who?"

"Jim Marcinkowski."

"Sounds Polish."

"It is Polish." He has a little Polish flag on his lapel.

"I'm German," says the woman, Lieselotta Olsen. She thinks she has heard of him, or maybe not. She knows of his opponent, Mr. Rogers, who clearly holds a big advantage in name recognition.

And money, organization, experience, knowledge of the district, and everything else that make incumbency such a near-invincible force in Congressional elections. It is easy to overlook this in an environment that many predict will be hostile to sitting members of Congress, especially Republicans. But 98 percent of incumbents have been re-elected in House contests since 1998, and even when Republicans took control of Congress in 1994 in a seismic realignment, 91 percent of incumbents still won.

Mr. Marcinkowski, 51, personifies the thankless underdog. He is a probable loser (some say surefire) who is unknown to most voters in this district northwest of Detroit and irrelevant to the national party officials who recruited him — and, in his telling, then abandoned him — as they focused on 50 or so "battleground" contests. The news media ignore him, too. When told Mr. Marcinkowski was a candidate, Chuck Todd, editor of Hotline, the online political tip-sheet, asked whether he was "that guy who played quarterback for the Atlanta Falcons in the 1980's." (No, that was Steve Bartkowski.)

Jim Marcinkowski is the deputy city attorney for Royal Oak, Mich. He has three teenage children whom he used to see after work, and a Hobie Cat sailboat he used to float around on, on weekends.

Mr. Marcinkowski, a crisply groomed former C.I.A. operations officer, could represent a tougher-than-usual test for Mr. Rogers, who was re-elected by a margin of 37 percentage points in 2002 and 24 percentage points in 2004. A former Republican, Mr. Marcinkowski has a tough-guy résumé — Navy, C.I.A., teamster — and the silvery-haired presence of a Famous Guy you would swear you had seen before, maybe on television.

He drew national attention in 2003 and 2005 when he testified before Congress about his friend and former C.I.A. classmate Valerie Wilson. The story of Ms. Wilson, the agent whose identity was leaked by Bush administration officials, sealed Mr. Marcinkowski's divorce from the Republicans. He had been active in the party from the time he organized the Michigan State University campus for Ronald Reagan's presidential campaign in 1980 but had gradually become disenchanted, particularly during the George W. Bush years.

His story — former C.I.A. officer, disaffected Republican — had great appeal to Democratic bigwigs seeking Congressional candidates. He talked to Representatives Nancy Pelosi, the House Democratic leader; Steny Hoyer, the Democratic whip; and Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. All urged him to run, especially Mr. Emanuel, who called several times, and even shipped him a thank-you cheesecake after he had agreed to run.

Mr. Marcinkowski says everyone promised their full support.

"That and a buck-seventy will get you a nice cup of coffee at Starbucks," he said, adding that if he could do it again, he would have sought assurances that the campaign committee would devote ample "resources" — also known as money — to his race.

He says many of the Democrats who enticed him to run abandoned him after his fund-raising lagged and they deemed other races to be more winnable. "Sometimes I feel like the marine who they sent charging up a hill," he said. "Then the marine looks back over his shoulder and wonders, 'Hey, where'd everyone go?' "

This is a recurring lament among challengers. "You hear a lot of long-shot candidates around this time who will feel used by their committees," said Nathan Gonzales, political editor for Rothenberg Political Report.

Mr. Marcinkowski said he spent virtually all his campaign time on fund-raising earlier this year. He devoted every weekend, lunch hour and weeknight to calling lists of past Democratic donors. He has used up six weeks of vacation time, burned through two cellphones and made about 15,000 calls, nearly all to raise money.

Mr. Emanuel's deputies from his committee phoned him relentlessly, he said, asking "how many calls I made, how many people I contacted, whether I'd hit up all my relatives, neighbors, friends from high school."

He raised more than $130,000 in the first quarter of 2006. Not bad, except that Mr. Rogers had about $1 million in the bank from past campaigns. Mr. Marcinkowski hired a small staff, recruited volunteers and bought local television, cable and radio advertisements. In June, Congressional Quarterly even moved Michigan's Eighth Congressional District to the Republican Favored category from Safe Republican.

But eventually, Mr. Marcinkowski said, the calls reaped less and less money. His donors focused on higher-profile races. The calls from the Congressional committee's officials pretty much stopped. "I fell off way their radar," he said, adding that he "really misses those phone calls."

The sudden silence left him "scarred," he said, and added that no one at the committee even sent him flowers to say goodbye. He suggested that his story could be called "The Spy Left Out in the Cold."

When did he last hear from Rahm Emanuel?

"Rahm who?"

A spokeswoman for Mr. Emanuel and the Congressional committee declined to comment.

For all his disappointment, Mr. Marcinkowski said he has no regrets about running and keeps thinking of the strangers who have encouraged him. He carries in his wallet a laminated copy of a $10 donation from a 92-year-old man. He said he loved meeting voters, "getting out in front of people." That can include polka dancing with elderly strangers before noon, as he did on that recent day at the Brighton Senior Center.

Mr. Marcinkowski calls himself a sleeper on the national map, saying he operates beyond the purview of the party apparatus and the narrow definitions of what constitutes "in play." He believes the dynamics in Michigan — the depth of voter agitation, concern about job losses and opposition to the Iraq war — have been underestimated outside the state.

"I don't think the people who read the political tea leaves are reading the real tea leaves," Mr. Marcinkowski said. He added that he has a prediction for how much he will win by on Election Day, but does not want to jinx anything by sharing it.

A Political Opportunity For Women (WP)

By Anushka Asthana

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Geraldine A. Ferraro made history in 1984 as the first woman to run for vice president on a major-party ticket. Twenty-two years later, she wishes she was no longer in a club of one.

"I thought it would have happened by now," Ferraro said with a sad note in her voice as she looked down at a room packed with more than 600 people, young and old, at the University of Virginia last month.

The glass ceiling in presidential politics will not be broken in her lifetime, she predicted to reporters before taking the stage. But she was there to persuade a new generation of women to continue the fight.

"We have to keep reminding them what it was like before, so they recognize that the only way they are going to make it better for the future -- for their future and their children's future -- is by becoming involved politically," she said.

The Democrat's appearance that night was part of a drive by U-Va.'s Center for Politics to inspire young women to get involved in politics. Its director, Larry J. Sabato, described Ferraro as a "trailblazer for the United States of America" and said she would be introduced by a "trailblazer in Virginia."

Mary Sue Terry, who in 1985 was elected Virginia's first female attorney general before losing the governor's race to now-Sen. George Allen (R) in 1993, said that there are many obstacles to women's advancement in politics but that she has hope. "It is not going to be easy, but it is not impossible," she said.

In fact, this year may prove to be a major breakthrough for women in Congress, according to experts at the university. Sabato's Crystal Ball, a Web page that provides analysis of House and Senate races around the country, is predicting that 2006 could be the best year for women in 14 years.

In a conservative scenario, according to the Crystal Ball, female candidates would gain nine seats in the House -- the largest rise since the Year of the Woman in 1992, when the number of women in Congress jumped from 32 to 54.

"There is going to be a net gain in the House for women," agreed Dennis Simon, a professor at Southern Methodist University and co-author of "Breaking the Political Glass Ceiling." But there is still a "gender gap in running for office," he said.

With co-author Barbara Palmer, of the Women & Politics Institute at American University, Simon looked at which jurisdictions tend to be most and least friendly to women. Topping the list of those most likely to vote for female candidates are New York City, San Francisco and Los Angeles. At the other end are Gadsden, Ala., and Paducah and Bowling Green, Ky.

Districts that elect women, according to Simon, tend to be "upscale -- more degrees, more professionals, urban." Those less likely, he added, are "more rural, lower-income and more traditional."

DOJ_NMG_0078657

Simon said female candidates are often seen as more liberal than they actually are -- as in the case of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). But her possible presidential candidacy, and the speculation that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice might be a presidential candidate in 2008 or later, has shifted perceptions about the plausibility of a female president.

Having Rice and former secretary of state Madeleine Albright in top national security jobs "made it normal to see women as leaders," said Marie Wilson, president and founder of the White House Project, which aims to advance female leadership and is training hundreds of women to run for office. "It we have three or four women in '08, it would have to be agenda," rather than sex, that separates them, she added.

Wilson said the United States has fallen through the rankings in women's political representation -- to 68th -- as other countries such as South Africa and Great Britain and Scandinavian nations climbed the list. Some countries used quotas to address the imbalance.

The recent U-Va. conference used persuasion. "New blood is needed," Ferraro told the audience. "If ever there was a time when the world and our nation needed new voices, new values, new approaches and sensitivities, this is it. Politics gives us the power to make a difference."

Women, she argued, would ensure that the concerns of half the population were listened to. In the same way that John McCain, as a former prisoner of war, pushed hard for legislation to ban torture, so women would shout loudest on behalf of day care, flexible work hours, prenatal health care, immunization, the aging population and more, she argued.

The challenge, she added, is to get enough women into the candidate pool. "The American electorate is accustomed to expect certain types of experience from candidates for national office," she said. "It doesn't hurt to be a governor of a large state, to be vice president or a senator of long experience."

Help For Congressman (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 6 (AP) — Mayor C. Ray Nagin says he is enthusiastically supporting the re-election of Representative William J. Jefferson, an eight-term Democrat who is the target of a federal bribery investigation.

“I've told the congressman that since he supported me during the mayor’s race, that I would reciprocate,” Mr. Nagin said Thursday.

According to government affidavits, Mr. Jefferson is accused of taking bribes to help promote a cable television and Internet business in Nigeria and Ghana. An F.B.I. affidavit said that he was videotaped accepting a briefcase with $100,000 in $100 bills on July 30, 2005, and that all but $10,000 of the cash was found four days later in his freezer.

Mr. Jefferson denies the accusations and has not been charged.

The congressman has 12 opponents on the fall ballot.

Schwarzenegger And Rival Spar But Step Lightly (LAT)

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Most of the rhetoric on immigration has been voiced at partisan events. The candidates are not far apart on key issues, political analysts say.

The national immigration debate is reverberating in California's gubernatorial campaign, with the two major-party candidates trading verbal jabs but treading carefully on the volatile issue.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who has talked tough in the past on border-related issues — praising Minuteman-style private border patrols and supporting the anti-illegal immigrant Proposition 187 — now plays up his immigrant roots, calling for a comprehensive and compassionate border policy that bolsters security without mistreating illegal immigrants.

The softened public stance hasn't stopped Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides from portraying Schwarzenegger as an anti-immigrant extremist who has harmed relations with Mexico.

"He's talked about closing the border. He sent the National Guard to the border instead of demanding that George Bush do his job. He sent the wrong signal to Mexico, our ally," Angelides said in a speech last month to Latino leaders in Los Angeles.

Schwarzenegger has labeled Angelides weak on national security for not supporting the deployment of 1,000 National Guard troops to the border. He also has criticized him for supporting driver's licenses for illegal immigrants.

The dispute continued this week, when Angelides supporters criticized Schwarzenegger for saying Mexican immigrants should "immerse yourself and assimilate into the American culture."

DOJ_NMG_0078658

State Democratic Party chief Art Torres said the remark was "a calculated political insult to all immigrants." Schwarzenegger, defending his comments Friday, said they were not meant as an insult. "This is not against Latinos; it's not against anybody," he said at a campaign event in Los Angeles.

That disagreement aside, most of the rhetoric on immigration has been voiced at partisan events. It has also been muted compared with the fireworks of past campaigns when immigration-related issues polarized voters and generated flurries of negative television advertising.

Part of the reason, political analysts say, is that the candidates' positions are not far apart on key issues, including their support for a guest worker policy and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants.

The other reason is political: Neither wants to risk losing support from core constituencies if he strays too far from the carefully crafted views that both have staked out.

Republican Schwarzenegger has already angered conservatives with his moves to the center in recent months. And Democrat Angelides, analysts say, could lose moderate Democrats' votes if he is perceived as being too liberal on immigration issues.

"It's such a hot-button issue that maybe both are afraid to push the button. There's a loss potential on either side," said Harry Pachon, president of the Tomas Rivera Policy Institute at USC.

Illegal immigration along the California-Mexico border has slowed significantly since increased enforcement in the 1990s pushed migration flows east to Arizona. From October 2005 to mid-September, 190,000 illegal immigrants were apprehended in California, compared with 500,000 in Arizona.

Still, immigration reform groups say, the continuing migration adds to California's estimated population of 2.6 million illegal immigrants and costs the state more than $10 billion a year in health, education and law enforcement funds.

Migrant rights group say the state's economy would break down without the labor of illegal immigrants, who provide much of the workforce in key industries such as construction, service and agriculture.

Immigration remains an important topic for voters. A Los Angeles Times poll in September showed that 34% of likely voters consider immigration issues to be the biggest problem facing the state — making it the top mention.

That presents something of a dilemma for state officials. Though governors of border states have historically struggled to make good on campaign promises of increased border funding, it is the federal government that is responsible for everything from patrolling the state's 150-mile frontier to inspecting the millions of vehicles that enter California from Mexico each year.

In the race for governor, both candidates have promised to pressure Washington to improve conditions along the border and to reimburse costs associated with illegal immigration. But, experts say, the winner probably will follow a long line of governors who failed at the task.

"It's a completely quixotic exercise," said Wayne Cornelius, director of the Center for Comparative Immigration Studies at UC San Diego. "The reality is that neither one is going to have much leverage in this area."

That's not to say that governors can't try.

"In Washington, any time that a well-known governor — let alone a superstar — comes to testify on a political issue, they attract attention, not just from the news media, but from lawmakers," said Adam Segal, director of the Hispanic Voter Project at Johns Hopkins University. "Certainly, there have been governors from various states that have used their stature to advance issues."

Last year, the Democratic governors of New Mexico and Arizona, Bill Richardson and Janet Napolitano respectively, intensified the national debate on illegal immigration when they declared states of emergency.

Schwarzenegger declined to follow their lead but has acted in other ways. He has written op-ed articles, sent letters to congressional leaders and spoken to President Bush on border issues.

The efforts have yielded mixed results. Congress did appropriate $80 million more in funding this year — for a total of about $200 million — for the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program, which reimburses states for incarcerating illegal immigrants. California spends more than $750 million a year for the incarceration of criminal illegal immigrants.

But at the same time, the number of Border Patrol agents in California has dipped, from 2,500 in 2003 to 2,300 this year, though there are plans to add more. The cuts were caused by redeployments to Arizona and other border areas.

Angelides, in a telephone interview, said that Schwarzenegger hasn't "lifted a finger" on border issues and that if he were governor, he would work more closely with California's representatives in Washington to pressure the White House.

"This governor … went to Ohio to campaign for Bush. Certainly, he can pick up the phone to implore the Bush/Cheney White House to meet its border commitments," Angelides said.

He said the governor's views on immigration issues have been divisive, and he criticized Schwarzenegger for, at one time, backing the Minuteman freelance group.

DOJ_NMG_0078659

"If I'm governor, you won't see me going on right-wing radio and praising the Minutemen, or making statements about closing the border, or using this issue to divide Californians," Angelides said.

He said he would push for comprehensive immigration reform and would urge the federal government to increase the number of Border Patrol agents and high-technology tools along the border. He said he opposed the deployment of the National Guard because California's contingent is already overextended and the troops send the wrong signal to Mexico.

Schwarzenegger's campaign criticized the challenger's position.

"Phil Angelides would take California's border security backward by removing National Guard troops," said Julie Soderlund, a spokesperson for the governor. (Schwarzenegger initially balked at the president's request to send the Guard to the border, and later refused Bush's request for more troops.)

Last year, he said illegal immigration could be choked off by closing the border. He corrected himself later, saying he meant "secure" the border.

Schwarzenegger's views on some border issues have moderated. This year, he came out against the congressional plan for a 700-mile border fence, saying it would be ineffective and amount to going back to the "Stone Age."

The governor also said this summer that he had made mistakes in praising Minuteman-style groups, and he repeated his earlier comment that Proposition 187 was "the wrong decision."

Schwarzenegger also supports immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the U.S. — a stance shared by Bush and criticized by some conservatives.

"It impressed many in the Latino community that he took a moderate stance at a time when the tide was seeming to go the other way," said Pachon of USC.

Skeptics remain, however, saying Schwarzenegger's move to the center is politically motivated to boost support among Latinos. A recent Los Angeles Times poll showed that 65% of likely Latino voters disapprove of the governor's job performance.

"We always have to remember that he's an actor and … without a doubt he is putting on an Academy Award-winning performance that he cares about the Latino community, when we know he does not," said Enrique Morones, president of the Border Angels, a San Diego-based immigrant rights group.

But others consider Schwarzenegger's positions in line with those of most voters, including many Latinos.

"On immigration issues, the governor probably pretty much reflects the views of most Californians," said Allan Hoffenblum, a longtime Republican strategist who publishes the California Target Book, a nonpartisan election guide.

richard.marosi@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Debate broadcasts

The sole debate between Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and his Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, will be held tonight. Several Southern California media outlets plan to broadcast the one-hour session, according to the sponsor, the California Broadcasters Assn., and station officials.

Broadcasting the event live at 6 p.m. will be KCBS-TV Channel 2, KCET-TV Channel 28, KWHY-TV Channel 22 and cable station C-SPAN. KABC-TV Channel 7, which will be airing college football during the debate, will delay its broadcast until 11 a.m. Sunday.

The association said the debate will also be broadcast on radio stations KABC-AM (790) and KNX-AM (1070).

Los Angeles Times

After Son's Death And Battle With Breast Cancer, Elizabeth Edwards Trying To Inspire (MCT)

By Jeri Krentz

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

CHARLOTTE, N.C. - In the days since her book was published, Elizabeth Edwards has gone from one interview to the next, from Oprah Winfrey to Diane Rehm to Charlie Rose, talking about the pain of losing her son and her battle with breast cancer.

She's answered questions about her son's life, relived his car accident in 1996 and shared stories about grief and healing.

Sometimes, she said, she feels the tears coming, and hopes the interview is almost over.

"Honestly, even though it's necessary to tell my story of grief, I don't want it to be about me," she said on her way to another airport. "I want it to be a larger message about how we need one another. If I break down, I don't think I become as good a messenger."

Edwards' book, "Saving Graces: Finding Solace and Strength From Friends and Strangers" (Broadway Books; $24.95), is a frank memoir about loss and accepting support.

DOJ_NMG_0078660

Edwards, 57, and her husband, former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., rarely spoke of their son's death during her husband's 2004 run for president or during his bid for vice president as Sen. John Kerry's running mate. In her book, she describes the tragedy in detail.

Wade, 16, had been on his way to meet his family at the beach for spring break. A gust of wind blew his car from the road; it fishtailed, then flipped.

"If I make myself think back on that night and on the next days, I can see everyone, I can bring everyone back," Edwards wrote. "But it is so hard to do it without also bringing back that pain. The heat of it. The chill of it. What's important and what's not? People came, that's what's important. They were there."

Edwards found support through an Internet group for the bereaved. Some days, she shared her sorrow. "I have no strength to face his death," she wrote in a post three weeks after what would have been Wade's 17th birthday. "Even comfort about his death brings me to the floor. I cannot look it in the eye. ... I don't know how many days without him I have left inside me."

Other days, she vented:

"I used to think that the greatest gift you could give a child was the sense that anything was possible. Now that gift has a horrid twist: Anything is possible."

She visited her son's grave daily, talking to him, reading letters to him, taking his SAT score when it came in the mail. When what would've been Wade's last year of high school began, she read aloud every book on the senior reading list.

"I went every day to Wade's grave," she wrote, "... because that was what felt right to me."

At age 46, she decided to undergo fertility treatments and have two more children. Emma Claire was born in 1998. Jack came two years later, when the Edwardses' oldest daughter, Cate, was a high school senior.

Politics is part of Edwards' story, too.

She describes meeting with Secret Service agents to learn what to expect. She tells how her friends helped fix up Cate's bedroom in Raleigh, thinking the Kerrys might spend the night. (They didn't. "But now Cate has nice new bed linens," she wrote.)

Two weeks before Election Day in 2004, she discovered a lump while taking a shower in a hotel room in Kenosha, Wis. After John Kerry delivered his concession speech, Elizabeth and John Edwards left for the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute in Boston.

Though she feared cancer, Edwards wrote that she'd "already been through the worst," that nothing will ever be as bad as losing a child. "The worst day of my life had already come."

She went through chemotherapy, then surgery followed by radiation.

At times, she wrote, "there was no part of me that did not feel beaten."

Other times, facing bruising and bleeding, hair loss, nausea and mouth sores: "I could not wait to get started. I wanted to be a warrior."

By that March, the number of e-mails from strangers and friends had reached 65,000.

The book's message is simple: Family is all around us, in strangers and friends, a "sea of support," nourishment to help in the next storm.

"I hope (readers) will take that away from the story," Edwards said. "Start including people in your lives that otherwise would be invisible and find out how rewarding that is. ... It sounds naive, but it's 57 not-always-easy years that have been made easier because I was good to people. And when I needed it, they were good back."

Explaining her faith, Edwards said, was the part of the book she "fiddled with" the most.

She believes in a God who lets human actions and nature take their course.

"The other option - that he set up the world so that he could intervene when he wanted to - that God is a very hard God to accept if your child dies."

Edwards admitted that she felt worried before "Saving Graces" reached stores last week. Reporters who traveled with her during the presidential campaign often described her as honest and down to earth. In the book, that openness sometimes makes her words difficult to read.

"I wanted it to seem like a conversation with people," she said. "But right before it came out, it was very scary. I don't know any other way to be, but you don't know how this candor will be received. I don't want to tell you all the adjectives that I didn't want to hear."

In the book, Edwards wrote that "life has found its cadence again." Her cancer appears to be gone. Her oldest daughter has started law school. Her younger children are busy with school and sports. John Edwards seems to be a probable 2008 presidential candidate. And the family has moved into a new home in Orange County, N.C.

At first, Elizabeth Edwards said, she worried about emptying Wade's room in their old house. But a hole in a washing machine hose started a flood and she had to rush to save his belongings.

DOJ_NMG_0078661

"In order to save his stuff, I had to get it out," she said. "Where I thought it was going to be so hard, I was relieved to get it out of his room."

Still, grief is unpredictable. Ten years away from her son's death, there are days when she's "just a puddle."

"Something will trigger it, and you have no idea what it's going to be. You can walk right through the obvious thing - and then a pile of shirts at Abercrombie & Fitch will do you in."

Gore And Murdoch Join Forces In TV Deal (FT)

By Emiko Terazono, Media Correspondent

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

Al Gore, the former US vice-president, is bringing his user-generated content television channel to the UK, courtesy of James Murdoch's British Sky Broadcasting.

Mr Gore launched Current TV, the US channel made of clips created by viewers and producers, in August last year, and said that the channel was "democratising television."

Mr Murdoch, who has claimed that BSkyB was the first media company in the world to go carbon neutral, and Mr Gore share their passion for the environment. Mr Murdoch invited Mr Gore to the gathering of News Corp's executives at Pebble Beach, California, this summer.

At Pebble Beach Rupert Murdoch, News Corp chief executive, urged News Corp officials to follow his son James' lead and to try and tackle climate change issues.

The pair have now come together to promote user generated content in the UK and Ireland. Current TV's agreement for the channel to be carried on BSkyB's satellite platform is its first international move outside the US.

Mr Gore said that the channel was one of the few on the cable network to break even in the first year and was looking to make profits in the second year. He rejected suggestions that viewer created clips was about gaining cheap content.

The deal with BSkyB brings Current TV to some 8m households. In the US, it is available in nearly 30m homes through cable and satellite television. With Current TV, viewers and producers upload their clips on to the channel's website, where content which gets the most votes is broadcast on its television channel.

Mr Gore compared Current TV to the introduction of the printing press in the 15th century, which led to enlightenment. He said: "The television medium for 50 years has had the depressing effect on the conversation of democracy by excluding individuals. But the new affordable digital tools of both cameras and digital video cameras and laptop editing systems now make it completely feasible for individuals with accessible training to participate in the conversation."

Mr Murdoch said that Mr Gore's channel TV was "an elegant way" to marry user-generated content on the web to the broadcast medium. He said: "Current TV is bringing the web's sense of empowerment to television for the first time."

Listen to audio excerpts from Emiko Terazono's interview with Al Gore and James Murdoch

Six Powers Agree To Take Next Step On Iran (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 6 -- The United States and five other major powers agreed Friday to take the next step toward imposing sanctions on Iran for failing to comply with a U.N. resolution to prevent it from subverting its nuclear energy program to develop a nuclear weapon, according to U.S. and European officials.

But in response to Russian and Chinese wariness about the impact and effectiveness of sanctions, the group also agreed to keep the door open to diplomacy, the officials said. The chief negotiator will remain available for talks if Iran chooses to come to the table and suspend its uranium enrichment program. As soon as Iran suspends enrichment, any U.N. sanctions would also be suspended, they said.

The package of economic, technological, scientific and diplomatic incentives already offered to Iran to surrender control over its fuel cycle -- but not its peaceful energy program -- will still be on offer if the Islamic republic changes its position, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said.

The agreement came at the conclusion of talks hosted by Britain and attended by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and top diplomats from France, Russia, China and Germany. But after a dramatic buildup all week to a possible turning point following the collapse of European negotiations with Iran, the tone and scope of the agreement appeared significantly milder than anticipated.

The timing of the talks and the wording of the agreement were affected by mechanical problems delaying Rice's arrival in London from Iraq. The military plane ferrying Rice got stuck in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, the last stop on her five-day Middle East tour, and she attended only the last 45 minutes of the six-nation talks that she had pressed the hardest to hold.

DOJ_NMG_0078662

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy described the new international goal as "proportionate and reversible sanctions." U.S. officials said they viewed the agreement on sanctions as a tactic to try to force Iran to return to negotiations.

En route to London, Rice said sanctions would be aimed at convincing Iran that returning to the table was "the best strategy here. Nobody wants to have [sanctions] just to have them. The hope would be that the Iranians recognize that increasing isolation from the international system is not good for Iran or for the people of Iran."

The general agreement comes after years of controversial diplomacy, including a period when Iran suspended enrichment of uranium, only to resume after hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was inaugurated in August 2005. Since then, Iran has missed at least two deadlines, including one set for Aug. 31 by the United Nations, to comply with demands that it halt enrichment.

"The extra innings are over. We're on to a new phase," Burns said. "We have no alternative but to proceed" and raise the cost for Iran's "irresponsible attitude."

Iran, he added, is missing a "major opportunity" in rejecting the package of incentives, particularly the opportunity for the first formal talks with the United States since relations were broken in 1980.

The administration has been pressing hard over the past six weeks to get the six major powers to agree to sanctions. A senior State Department official said Friday's agreement is likely to come as a surprise to Iran, which has calculated that it could continue to divide the international community.

In announcing the agreement, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said the six powers were "deeply disappointed" that the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, had to report Iran's failure to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities, as required by U.N. Resolution 1696.

"We said there are two paths ahead," Beckett said. "We regret that Iran has not yet taken the positive one."

Discussions on which sanctions to invoke against Iran, drawn from a two-page list assembled last summer, will begin next Tuesday or Wednesday in videoconference talks among specialists, U.S. officials said.

Burns predicted that the behind-the-scenes diplomacy would be "spirited" and possibly lengthy. A European envoy involved in the talks Friday said it would be a "struggle" to come up with details to follow through on what is now a joint strategy.

The agreement reached Friday also does not close the deep gap between the United States and Russia over strategy toward Iran. Rice acknowledged the split.

"It's long been the view of particularly Russia that sanctions may not have the intended effect," she said, adding that Moscow had an obligation to act since it had voted for Resolution 1696 in July.

Rice began the day in Iraq, where she met with Massoud Barzani, president of the regional government in the Kurdish-populated north. Rice urged Barzani to cooperate with the national government's reconciliation efforts, and Barzani said the three northern Kurdish provinces would remain part of Iraq despite growing support for independence.

"Kurds, like any other nation, have the right to self-determination," he said. "This is a natural right. But a parliament in Kurdistan has been adopted within the framework of a democratic Iraq, a federal system."

Regional officials said privately, however, that there is growing sentiment for independence as violence increases in the rest of Iraq.

U.S. Says It Has Deal With Other U.N. Members To Penalize Iran For Nuclear Drive (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 6 — The United States said it had won agreement on Friday from the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council and Germany to seek sanctions against Iran over its refusal to shut down a nuclear enrichment program that could be used to build bombs.

While the State Department praised the agreement, which was reached at a one-day meeting here of senior officials from the six nations, American diplomats conceded that there could still be long and difficult negotiations over what penalties to impose and their timing.

Indeed, none of the other nations here — Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia — issued such an explicit statement after the meeting. In the past, China and Russia have both said they would be wary of sanctions against Iran, despite its defiance of international demands to end nuclear enrichment.

R. Nicholas Burns, the American under secretary of state for political affairs, said after the meeting that whatever the other nations' diplomatic language, "What we've got is an agreement to go to the Security Council" to punish Iran.

In essence, Mr. Burns said, the six nations "concluded that Iran is not prepared to negotiate with us" based on conditions set last spring, and that "we'll go forward with sanctions."

DOJ_NMG_0078663

But he admitted the issue was far from decided. “I think there’s going to be a spirited debate about what kind of sanctions should be agreed to.”

Mr. Burns was the senior American negotiator at the talks for the most of the day because Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who traveled here from Iraq, was delayed when her military jet — and its replacement — developed mechanical problems, stranding her in the northern Iraqi city of Erbil for about two hours.

The German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who attended the London meeting, may have come closest to the American statement when he told ZDF television on Friday that “if there is no new decision from inside the Iranian leadership, there is at present no alternative to having the Security Council deal with this conflict.”

Agence France-Presse quoted the French foreign minister, Philippe Douste-Blazy, as saying that the six nations have “decided, in a unified manner, to work together in the next few days to speak about proportionate and reversible sanctions.”

The debate over Iran’s nuclear program is being conducted while the United States weighs a broad list of new sanctions to bring against North Korea, if it follows through on its threat to carry out a nuclear test.

Like his North Korean counterparts, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran has said he will not be intimidated by the possibility of economic and military sanctions. “This nation will not be frightened by the threats,” Iran’s state-run television quoted him as saying Thursday.

Iran says its nuclear program is for peaceful uses, but the United States says it is a cover for making nuclear weapons.

A senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Friday that as a result of the London meeting, senior diplomats from the six countries would talk next week by video conference to begin debating the list of sanctions on Iran.

The official said that the United States and other nations would work from a two-page “menu” of potential penalties that was drawn up earlier this year, and that the sanctions would be ordered in stages.

“The agreement we have is that we will begin a series of graduated sanction measures against Iran, and that we’ll start with sanctions directed at Iran’s nuclear industry,” like limits on the import of so-called dual-use technology and on the travel of scientists and bureaucrats involved in the Iranian nuclear program.

The London meeting was called after the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, acting on behalf of the six nations, reported this week that he had reached a stalemate in negotiations with the Iranians over curtailing their nuclear program.

The British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, praised Mr. Solana and said there were “two paths ahead” — a negotiated end to Iran’s enrichment program, or sanctions — and “we regret that Iran has not yet taken the positive one.”

While Ms. Rice’s transportation troubles in Iraq meant that she had little chance to participate in Friday’s negotiations in London, she said she would be actively involved next week in talks over the next step with the Iranians.

“When the diplomatic course is not going to produce an outcome, then the other path has to be pursued,” she said. “I think we’re getting pretty close to that time.”

“The United States has always said that this can’t go on endlessly, and we are already more than a month past the deadline,” she added, referring to Iran’s failure to abide by the Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations for suspension of the enrichment program.

Talks Planned On Sanctions Against Iran (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

A senior U.S. official says getting a U.N. agreement on penalties will be difficult.

LONDON — The United States and five other world powers said Friday that they were "deeply disappointed" by Iran's refusal to halt its nuclear enrichment program and that they would begin discussing sanctions against Tehran at the United Nations.

The countries, which have jointly pursued a diplomatic solution to the standoff for 18 months, said after a meeting of foreign ministers here that they continued to hold out hope that the Iranian government would relent, suspend nuclear enrichment and accept a package of economic incentives they offered June 1.

A senior U.S. official described the decision to discuss sanctions as "a little bit of progress" but acknowledged that agreeing on penalties against Iran would be difficult. Yet the Americans, who have pressed for sanctions, insisted that it was significant that the six nations have held together.

In addition to the United States, the six are Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany. All but Germany are veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council.

The United States and Britain have been most eager for sanctions, and Russia and China most hesitant.

The statement approved at the meeting here refers only to possible economic sanctions and excludes military action.

DOJ_NMG_0078664

R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of State for policy, said that with the failure of the latest round of talks between Iranian officials and Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief, "there's no question we have to proceed with sanctions."

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, talking to ZDF television after the meeting, said, "We have also agreed that if there is no new decision from inside the Iranian leadership, there is at present no alternative to having the Security Council deal with this conflict over the Iranian nuclear program."

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, told reporters that the group made the decision to discuss sanctions because "further pressure is required."

The sanctions, if approved, would be graduated, and would begin with restrictions aimed at Iran's nuclear industry. Crafting such sanctions would be complex and take some time in the best of circumstances, the senior U.S. official said. He said representatives of the group would be in touch Tuesday or Wednesday and take the issue to the U.N. on Thursday.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking to reporters, said world leaders had threatened so long to move to sanctions that to back away now would undermine their credibility.

"You can't extend deadline after deadline after deadline, because nobody will take the international system seriously," she said.

Rice recalled that the Security Council adopted a resolution in the summer signaling its intention to consider sanctions if Iran didn't suspend its nuclear enrichment.

"When you adopt U.N. Security Council resolutions, they're supposed to mean something," she said.

Rice almost missed the meeting because the military C-17 cargo plane on which she was traveling had an engine malfunction during a visit to Irbil, in northern Iraq's Kurdish region.

Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, said the plane, which had carried Rice from Baghdad for a visit with Kurdistan regional President Massoud Barzani, had developed a crack in a turbine. Officials summoned another plane, but it took longer to arrive than hoped, and U.S. officials waited in an airport visitor's terminal.

It wasn't the only travel snag on the trip. On Thursday, the C-17 ferrying Rice was forced to circle the Baghdad airport for about 45 minutes, delaying meetings with top Iraqi officials, because of mortar or rocket fire nearby.

U.S., Partners Seek Tough Stance On North Korea, Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

The U.S. and its major partners sought to deliver strong messages to both North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs, but divisions persist over how hard to push either country within the United Nations.

North Korea's threat to conduct a first-ever nuclear test and Iran's refusal to suspend its uranium-enrichment program are posing twin challenges to the international system. Prolonged attempts to negotiate an end to both countries' nuclear programs appear to have fallen apart, leaving little consensus about what steps to take next.

In New York, the U.N. Security Council Friday approved a strongly worded statement that "deplored" North Korea's assertion that it was planning a nuclear test. A test, the statement said, would "represent a clear threat to international peace and security." In U.N. parlance, that implies that a nuclear test would trigger international sanctions, but it is unclear how far China, in particular, would agree to push the volatile government in Pyongyang.

The U.N. move came amid rising concern that North Korea could conduct a nuclear test as early as this weekend, the ninth anniversary of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Worker's Party. Pyongyang's official media said Mr. Kim met with his top military commanders Friday.

North Korea claims that it has nuclear weapons, but it isn't known to have tested one before. For more than a year, it has declined to join six-country talks aimed at persuading it to give up its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

The U.S., France, Britain, Russia, China and Germany have reached a similar impasse with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, which it claims are purely for peaceful, civilian purposes.

Meeting in London Friday, the five permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany said they were "deeply disappointed" that talks between Iran and European Union foreign-policy chief Javier Solana had shown no real results.

The countries said they plan next week to begin talks within the Security Council over a package of sanctions aimed at pressuring Iran to return to talks to curb any efforts by Tehran to develop nuclear weapons. China and Russia reiterated Friday that they won't support threats or coercion.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said en route to London from Iraq Friday that the credibility of the international community is at stake in both the North Korea and Iran cases. "We can't continue to extend deadline after deadline after deadline, or nobody will take the international system seriously," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0078665

Powers Agree To Consult UN On Measures Against Tehran (FT)

By Roula Khalaf And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

World powers meeting on Iran on Friday agreed to consult on possible UN sanctions after Tehran refused to heed international calls for a halt to the most sensitive parts of its controversial nuclear programme.

But after two hours of talks in London, no agreement was reached on the details of potential measures and it was far from clear that differences between the US and Europe on one hand, and Russia and China on the other, had been overcome.

The meeting of foreign ministers from the US, UK, France, Germany, Russia and China was complicated by the late arrival of Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, due to travel delays, and by the departure of Sergey Lavrov, her Russian counterpart, before a planned dinner, because of prior engagements.

It came as Alexander Alekseyev, Russian deputy foreign minister, declared that serving Iran with ultimatums would be "counterproductive".

Speaking on behalf of the participants, Margaret Beckett, UK foreign secretary, said the six nations were 'deeply disappointed' that Iran was not prepared to suspend its uranium enrichment activities after extensive talks with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief.

Stopping short of declaring Mr Solana's talks a failure, she said the six nations would now 'consult on measures under Article 41 of Chapter Seven of the UN charter,' as agreed in a July UN Security Council resolution. The UN decision effectively authorised commercial and diplomatic sanctions but ruled out the use of force.

The UK expects discussions on sanctions to begin at the UN next week. But Russia and China still appear reluctant to impose punishing measures. Mr Lavrov declared on Thursday that sanctions would be 'extreme' until all 'diplomatic possibilities have been exhausted.'

UK officials, however, say sanctions envisioned would be gradual, targeted and reversible, and would start with a tightening of restrictions on procurement for Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

Mr Solana's talks with Iranian officials were designed to persuade Tehran to heed UN calls for a stop in atomic work, a condition for starting negotiations on a longer term solution to Iran's nuclear dispute.

The six governments have been hoping that, once negotiations start, they might persuade Tehran to abandon all enrichment in return for a package of economic and political incentives.

In Tehran, regime insiders told the FT this week that the leadership was now ruling out any prospect of suspending uranium enrichment.

A few weeks ago, Iran had floated the idea that it could be ready to stop the nuclear activities for three months, during which negotiations on the six-nation package would begin.

But it conditioned this on the other side accepting that, at the end of the negotiations, Iran would keep a small-scale uranium enrichment facility.

European diplomats say these terms would have pre-judged the outcome of the negotiations and indeed rendered them meaningless.

Regime insiders in Tehran also say that prospects of even a limited suspension had met with growing opposition at home.

"Iran is not unduly worried about sanctions, especially as we think Russia and China aren't in favour," says one insider, adding that Tehran's fears of US military actions were also receding given the accumulation of crises in the Middle East, from Iraq, to Lebanon, and Afghanistan.

"They are very wrong if they think they can gain through negotiations what they failed to gain through pressure," President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad told a crowd this week in Hashtgerd, a new town near Tehran, in reference to western governments. In a separate speech at a graduation ceremony for police cadets, he said Iran was not isolated because two-thirds of the countries in the world supported its right "to pursue peaceful nuclear energy".

Nations To Pursue Sanctions Against Iran (AP)

By Beth Gardiner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Six world powers agreed Friday to pursue possible U.N. sanctions against Iran over its nuclear program, but left crucial questions about the scope and timing of any measures unresolved.

Top diplomats from the United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia said in a joint statement after talks in London that they were "deeply disappointed" by Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, a key step toward making nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0078666

Apparently divided about how quickly to move, the envoys stopped short of explicitly declaring European negotiations with Iran a failure, as some had expected them to do.

Their statement also shied away from demanding Tehran be punished by the U.N. Security Council, but said they would discuss sanctions in talks at the U.N.

U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns went further.

"The decision has been made that we'll go for sanctions, the question is what the sanctions will be," he said after the meeting. "In the view of the United States, we have to move for sanctions to raise the stakes for Iran."

Reading the diplomats' joint statement, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Iran had two choices when the United Nations demanded it halt enrichment activities.

"We regret that Iran has not yet taken the positive one," she said.

Beckett said the six powers "will now consult on measures under Article 41 of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter." Article 41 authorizes the Security Council to impose nonmilitary sanctions such as completely or partially severing diplomatic and economic relations, transportation and communications links.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said the discussions on how to win Iranian compliance would take place at the Security Council, Russian news agencies reported. German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told ZDF television the powers would begin drafting a resolution.

Burns said political directors of the six nations' foreign ministries would hold a videoconference Tuesday or Wednesday, and their U.N. ambassadors would then meet, probably the following day.

Britain's U.N. ambassador said Thursday that he expected "the Iran dossier" to return to the Security Council in the next week, but Beckett set no timeframe for action.

Iran insists its enrichment of uranium is purely for peaceful purposes to be used for nuclear energy. But the United States and many European nations believe Iran is seeking to produce nuclear weapons.

The U.S. and Britain are leading the push for sanctions against Tehran. To avoid alienating the Russians and the Chinese — both major commercial partners of Iran — any measures are likely to be relatively mild, including embargoes on missile and nuclear technology, and possible travel bans and other penalties on Iranian officials involved in their country's nuclear program.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was delayed leaving Iraq on Friday because of mechanical difficulties with her plane, meaning the diplomats had little time to reach a consensus. But even before the logistical problems arose, it was clear there were significant differences among the participants, with Russia voicing reluctance to move toward sanctions and Rice suggesting it was "getting pretty close" to the time to take Iran to the Security Council.

"There is an issue of the credibility of the Security Council and the international system and you simply can't just keep talking with no outcome," she told reporters on her way to London.

Lavrov, who said Thursday that sanctions now would be "extreme," hinted Friday that Moscow might accept some action. "We do not rule out additional measures" the Interfax news agency quoted him as saying in London.

But his deputy, Alexander Alexeyev, warned that it would be "counterproductive" to speak to Iran "in the language of threats and ultimatums."

Beckett denied suggestions the five permanent U.N. Security Council members and Germany had been unable to agree on a course of action. She told The Associated Press that the international community was united in wanting to negotiate with Iran and urging it to suspend enrichment.

"None of us want to get involved in sanctions, but at the present time, Iran is not responding to probably the most generous offer that has ever been made by the international community," she told the AP.

She said the package of technological and political incentives the six countries offered Iran in June was still on the table if it commits to freezing enrichment, which it has refused to do.

The European-Iranian negotiations had been seen as a final attempt to avoid a full-blown confrontation between Tehran and the Security Council after it ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend uranium enrichment or face punishment.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was defiant Thursday, saying his country would not be intimidated into giving up its nuclear program.

Associated Press Writers Thomas Wagner and Anne Gearan in London, Stephen Graham in Berlin and Steve Gutterman in Moscow contributed to this report.

U.N. Council Presses North Korea To Drop Plans For Nuclear Test (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078667

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 6 — The Security Council urged North Korea Friday not to carry out a planned test of a nuclear weapon, saying it would endanger regional stability and provoke worldwide denunciation.

Taking action three days after North Korea said it was preparing for an underground test, the Council said such action would "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond."

The statement, agreed to by all 15 members, was issued amid speculation that the test could come as soon as Sunday, the anniversary of the appointment of the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il, as head of the Communist Party. It urged Pyongyang to return to six-party talks on its nuclear program that include North and South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

North Korea left the talks last year and claims it will return only if the United States lifts sanctions aimed at stopping counterfeiting and other illegal economic activities.

"At an absolute minimum, North Korea must come back to the six-party talks which it has boycotted for 13 consecutive months and shows no inclination to come back to," said John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations.

The statement made no mention of possible United Nations sanctions or punishment other than to note that the Council would act "consistent with" its obligations if Pyongyang followed through with its threat.

In July, the Security Council passed a resolution condemning recent missile launchings by North Korea, urging abandonment of its nuclear program and a return to the six-party talks but not imposing any penalties.

At that time, Japan and the United States, the principal sponsors of the original resolution draft, obtained unanimous backing only by dropping language citing the part of the United Nations Charter that makes actions enforceable by armed action.

Mr. Bolton said Friday, "We think the main point is that North Korea should understand how strongly the United States and other council members feel that they should not test this nuclear device." He warned, "And if they do test it, it will be a very different world a day after the test."

Kenzo Oshima, the ambassador from Japan, who is this month's president of the Council, said he had hoped for adoption of the statement before a planned visit by the country's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, to Beijing and Seoul this weekend to discuss ways to ease regional tensions.

A North Korea expert in China told [a news organization] that the threats of a nuclear test were tied to the economic sanctions that Washington imposed earlier this year.

If the United States removes the sanctions, said the expert, Li Dunqiu, of China's State Council Development Research Center, "then tensions can be eased." He added, "Otherwise, launching a nuclear test is unavoidable for North Korea."

U.N. Council Urges N. Korea Not To Conduct Nuclear Test (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 6 -- The U.N. Security Council issued a statement Friday expressing "deep concern" about North Korea's threat to conduct its first test of a nuclear explosive, saying it would "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond."

The action came as U.S. officials look toward Sunday as a possible date for North Korea to carry out the test. Oct. 8 is the ninth anniversary of Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Korean Workers' Party, and is only a day before South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon will face a vote on his bid to become the next secretary general of the United Nations.

The 15-nation council urged North Korea to resume multiparty talks over its nuclear program, warning that a nuclear test "would bring universal condemnation." The council also issued a veiled threat to weigh tougher action, including the possibility of sanctions, against Pyongyang it if proceeds with the test.

The nonbinding statement capped three days of intensive negotiation after North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it plans to test a nuclear device to strengthen its defenses against the United States.

The Bush administration expressed frustration that the council was not prepared to adopt an even tougher response spelling out the punitive actions to be imposed on North Korea if it conducts a test. "At this point, no, I don't think there's a strategy of preventive diplomacy in place," said John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Still, Bolton and Kenzo Oshima, Japan's ambassador, said the statement will be helpful to Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who is expected to advocate a tougher response to North Korea's nuclear program in visits to Beijing on Sunday and Seoul on Monday.

China and Russia have urged the United States and other members of the council to pursue only diplomatic means to end the nuclear standoff with North Korea. Russia's ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said he spoke with Bolton on Friday about the need for the United States to engage in direct talks with North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0078668

But Churkin said Bolton insisted that the United States would sit down with North Korean officials only if they resumed multiparty talks on the nuclear program. "We think that bilateral contacts between the United States and North Korea could be useful in resolving the situation," Churkin said.

In an effort to persuade Pyongyang to back down, Bush administration officials have issued a number of stern warnings that the United States will not accept a nuclear-armed North Korea. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said on Friday that the United States has also encouraged China and others "that have influence on North Korea to use it to convince them to turn away from this."

"I'd leave it up to the Chinese as to what the best way for them to exert their influence on the North Korean government is -- but, certainly, we want to see them and everyone else do whatever they can to prevent this from happening," he added.

U.S. officials suspect North Korea has acquired enough plutonium to produce as many as 11 nuclear bombs. In February, Pyongyang announced that it had succeeded in building a nuclear device, but analysts estimate that it could be years before North Korea is able to launch it.

U.N. Warns N. Korea On Nuclear Test (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Security Council warned North Korea yesterday not to conduct a nuclear test, telling the isolated communist state it would face unspecified consequences under the U.N. charter if it did so.

"The Security Council deems that should [North Korea] carry out its threat of a nuclear-weapon test, it would jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond," said Japanese Ambassador Kenzo Oshima, who presides over the council this month.

Mr. Oshima's remarks, approved unanimously by the 15-nation council, also warned, "should [North Korea] ignore calls of the international community, the Security Council will act consistent with its responsibility under the charter of the United Nations."

The vote came amid speculation that North Korea could conduct a nuclear test as early as this weekend.

The council's "presidential statement," which does not carry the weight of a formal Security Council resolution, also urged Pyongyang to return to six-nation talks and to abandon its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Japan and China drafted the statement, which the United States supported.

"We think the main point that North Korea should understand is how strongly the United States and many other council members feel that they should not test this nuclear device, and that if they do test it, it will be a very different world the day after the test," U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton told reporters.

The United States maintains a force of about 30,000 troops in South Korea, a legacy of the 1950-53 Korean War.

The council was in broad agreement on yesterday's statement, putting aside sniping earlier this week to craft an unambiguous response.

"It was a very good statement," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said. "We are pleased that it has been adopted."

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, who is scheduled to become U.N. secretary-general when Kofi Annan's term expires this year, has offered to travel to Pyongyang to press international opposition to the North's nuclear-weapons program.

Mr. Bolton declined to endorse the proposed trip, but said yesterday that Washington is looking forward to having fresh ideas at the United Nations.

In North Korea, television images of the nation's leader, Kim Jong-il, showed him meeting soldiers at an undisclosed location.

The meeting marked Mr. Kim's first reported public appearance since Tuesday's announcement that North Korea would set off an atomic explosion.

Earlier, Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shotaro Yachi told Japanese television after meeting with U.S. officials: "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend."

North Koreans are fond of anniversaries and a weekend test would coincide with Mr. Kim's 1997 appointment as leader of the ruling Korean Workers' Party.

The United States, along with South Korea, Japan, China and Russia, have been trying to persuade Pyongyang to give up its nuclear programs in exchange for fuel and security guarantees.

North Korea has boycotted the talks for nearly a year.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe is to meet with his Chinese and South Korean counterparts this weekend to discuss the crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0078669

North Korean Nuclear Test Would Be 'Incendiary': White House (AFP)

AFP, October 7, 2006

The White House warned that a North Korean nuclear test would be an "incendiary" event threatening Pyongyang's neighbors, but it refused to comment on the possible timing of the test.

"I'm not going to comment on any of our intelligence," White House deputy spokeswoman Dana Perino told reporters.

Japan said North Korea could test a nuclear device as early as this weekend.

"The international community has joined us in sending a clear signal to the North Koreans that any such test of a nuclear device would be unacceptable," Perino said.

"And this hostile act would be most incendiary and threatening to North Korea's immediate neighbors," she said.

"It would be destabilizing to the region and could lead to further escalation of tensions. And a test, by its very nature, could advance the North Koreans' capabilities," the spokeswoman added.

White House chief spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday that a US diplomat's warning that a nuclear-armed North Korea would be "unacceptable" was "not a lethal threat" against the Stalinist regime.

U.N. Tells N. Korea Not To Test A Device (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council unanimously urged North Korea on Friday to scrap plans for a nuclear test and return to six-party talks — or face unspecified consequences.

Newly elected Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Friday that the test could come as early as this weekend. U.S. spy satellites have detected sustained activity at a suspected underground test site in North Korea. Abe will travel to Beijing on Sunday and Seoul on Monday to press for support in corralling North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

North Korea has in the past timed its military exercises to coincide with significant dates: It launched missiles on July 4, despite international warnings. Monday is Workers' Party Day in North Korea and Columbus Day in the United States.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry had announced Oct. 3 that the nation was preparing for a nuclear test to ensure its security in the face of what the government in Pyongyang described as threats from the United States.

The U.S. levied financial sanctions against North Korea last year and has encouraged banks around the world to cut off business dealings because of Pyongyang's suspected money laundering and counterfeiting. The North Koreans want the U.S. to lift the sanctions and engage in direct talks, and the threat to test a nuclear device is seen by diplomats and analysts as a way to heighten pressure.

The Security Council statement said that a test would not bring Pyongyang closer to its goals. Rather it would "bring universal condemnation by the international community," the statement said. "The Security Council urges the DPRK not to undertake such a test and to refrain from any action that might aggravate tension," the statement added, using the initials for the country's official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton said the Security Council took the threat seriously and that the United States was prepared to push for international economic sanctions. "If they do test it, it will be a very different world the day after," he said before the meeting. "There would be another nuclear power. This would be proof positive of North Korea having a weapon."

China and Russia had objected to earlier drafts of the statement that threatened an arms embargo, economic penalties or military force for failing to comply. The two nations rejected wording to "demand" that North Korea halt its plans, settling instead for a statement that would "urge" it to do so. But Russian diplomats said they were "very concerned" about the possibility of a test.

"We very clearly and strongly believe that to threaten conducting nuclear tests, or even worse, to conduct such tests … would not help anybody, including North Korea," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said. "This message is very clearly conveyed in the useful presidential statement which we today adopted.

"Let's hope that things will cool off and that everybody will return to six-party talks," he said, referring to the on-and-off negotiations that have involved China, Russia, the U.S., South Korea and Japan along with North Korea.

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said that North Korea was ultimately seeking direct talks with the U.S., and that the key to containing Pyongyang might be negotiations. "I don't know if that is possible right at this moment, but at some point it is necessary," he said.

To Bush administration officials, offering one-on-one talks with the North Koreans is tantamount to rewarding them for bad behavior. When asked previously if the U.S. would consider direct talks, Bolton answered curtly, "No. Next question." Instead, he said Friday, the Security Council should now move toward a "broad strategic approach."

DOJ_NMG_0078670

The U.S. is contemplating punitive measures even if the council won't back them. One possible response, a U.S. diplomat said, would be a naval blockade to prevent nuclear-related materials from entering or leaving the country.

North Korea Urged To Cancel Nuclear Test (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

With speculation mounting of a North Korean nuclear test as early as this weekend, a unanimous U.N. Security Council urged the secretive, communist nation Friday to abandon all atomic weapons as it promised last year and cancel plans to detonate a device. Japan hinted the North could face sanctions or possible military action.

A statement adopted by the council expresses "deep concern" over North Korea's announcement that it planned a test — which would confirm strong suspicions it is a nuclear power — and warns Pyongyang of unspecified consequences if it carries through. The message also urges the North to return to six-party talks on scrapping its nuclear weapons program.

With tensions rising, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il met hundreds of his top military commanders and urged them to bolster the nation's defenses, as officers cheered, "Fight at the cost of our lives!" the North's official Korean Central News Agency reported earlier Friday.

A North Korea expert in China, the North's closest ally, said only the removal of American economic sanctions against Pyongyang could dissuade the country from carrying out a nuclear test.

"North Korea has already made a decision to carry out a test," said Li Dunqiu, of China's State Council Development Research Center, a Cabinet-level think tank. But "if the U.S. removes sanctions ... then tensions can be eased. Otherwise launching a nuclear test is unavoidable for North Korea."

The United States imposed economic sanctions on North Korea last year to punish it for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering. For the last 13 months, North Korea has boycotted six-nation talks aimed at persuading it to abandon its nuclear ambitions.

North Korea said Tuesday it decided to act in the face of what it claimed was "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war," but gave no date for the test. Washington has repeatedly said it has no intention of invading North Korea.

Both China and Russia have urged the United States and North Korea to hold talks, which Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said Friday "could be useful in resolving the situation." But he said U.S. Ambassador John Bolton informed the council that there would be no North Korean-U.S. talks except in the margins of resumed six-party talks.

Bolton said the Security Council needs to adopt a long-term strategy to deal with North Korea but the top U.S. priority now is to stop a nuclear test.

"We take the threat by North Korea seriously. We don't think this is an attention-getting device of people waving their arm to say `see me, see me.' We think this would be consistent with the unfortunate logic that North Korea has been following," he said.

"North Korea should understand how strongly the United States and many other council members feel that they should not test this nuclear device," Bolton said. "And that if they do test it, it would be a very different world the day after the test ... because there would be another nuclear power."

Russia's Churkin said threatening or conducting a nuclear test "would not help anybody including North Korea."

"This message is very clearly conveyed in the useful presidential statement which we today adopted," he said. "Let's hope that things will cool off and that everybody will return to six-party talks."

South Korea's Foreign Ministry also urged its communist neighbor to return to talks and applauded the council's warning.

"North Korea should be held responsible for any consequences that could be caused by a test," the ministry said Saturday.

The warning was read at a formal meeting by the council president, Ambassador Kenzo Oshima of Japan. The Japanese Foreign Ministry issued a statement later saying if North Korea defies international concerns about a test, "the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures."

Japan, which would be in close proximity to any North Korean nuclear test, proposed the initial text of the statement, which becomes part of the council record. Oshima had pressed to have it adopted before Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe travels to China on Sunday and South Korea on Monday with a message that the North should stop testing.

"It's good that the council has come up with a very clear, strongly worded message warning against a nuclear test" before the "very important" Japan-China summit meeting, Oshima said.

The statement says a nuclear test would not help Pyongyang address its concerns, especially strengthening its security.

It warns that a nuclear test would bring "universal condemnation," lead to further unspecified council action, and "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond."

DOJ_NMG_0078671

The council said it "deplores" the pursuit of nuclear weapons by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, known as the DPRK.

"The Security Council will be monitoring the situation closely," the statement said. "The Security Council stresses that a nuclear test, if carried out by the DPRK, would represent a clear threat to international peace and security and that should the DPRK ignore calls of the international community, the Security Council will act consistent with its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations."

Oshima indicated that the North could face sanctions or possible military action under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter if it detonates a nuclear device. Chapter 7 outlines actions the council can take to deal with threats to international peace. He stressed that the statement says a nuclear test would constitute such a threat, which "is clear enough."

"I think the terms in which this statement was prepared clearly indicate what will be the consequences of their action if they, in fact, resort to a nuclear test," Oshima said.

The statement also urges North Korea to return immediately to the six-party talks and work toward implementation of a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The six parties to the talks are the two Koreas, China, Japan, the United States and Russia.

The council acted amid speculation that a nuclear test could come on Sunday, the anniversary of Kim's appointment as head of the Communist party in 1997. Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shotaro Yachi, currently in Washington, told the Japan's TV Asahi: "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend."

The dispatch by North Korea's news agency did not mention a nuclear test.

North Korean state television showed still photos of Kim, with his distinctive bouffant-hair, waving to an assembled crowd of about 500 olive-suited officers in dress caps. Kim later posed for a group photo with his commanders in front of Pyongyang's sprawling mausoleum for his father and national founder, Kim Il Sung.

The meeting was the reclusive leader's first reported appearance in three weeks and the first since Tuesday, when his government shocked the world by announcing plans to test a nuclear device on its way to building an atomic arsenal.

It was unclear when the rally took place, or how many attended, but it could show that Kim is trying to polish his credentials with the military at a time when international pressure is mounting on Pyongyang.

Associated Press writers Hans Greimel and Bo-Mi Lim in Seoul, South Korea, Kana Inagaki and Mari Yamaguchi in Tokyo, and Foster Klug in Washington contributed to this report.

UN Warns N Korea On Nuclear Test (FT)

By Mark Turner And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

The United Nations Security Council has agreed a unanimous statement, warning North Korea to refrain from testing a nuclear weapon, or face unspecified action.

Details of the statement were expected to be read by Kenzo Oshima, the council president and Japan's UN ambassador, at a formal open meeting of the council later in on Friday, said Vitaly Churkin, Russia's UN ambassador.

Should North Korea ignore the UN's calls, according to an earlier draft statement, "the Security Council will act consistent with its responsibility under the charter of the United Nations", language that could lead to sanctions or tougher measures.

The negotiations came amid warnings from Japan that the reclusive state could conduct a test as soon as this weekend. "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend,'' Shotaro Yachi, the Japanese vice-foreign minister, told Japanese broadcaster TV Asahi.

According to the draft UN statement: "The members of the Security Council deem that should the DPRK [North Korea] carry out its threat of a nuclear weapon test, it would jeopardise peace, stability and security in the region and beyond. Such a test would bring universal condemnation," it said, and called for an early resumption of the six-party talks aimed at achieving "the verifiable denuclearisation of the Korean Peninsula".

John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, said before the meeting: "If they do test it, it will be a very different world the day after. There would be another nuclear power. This would be proof positive of North Korea having a weapon."

Mr Churkin warned: "Non-proliferation is very important internationally, for the region and for North Korea.

"It would be in everyone's interest for them to refrain from this action. We think that bilateral contacts between the US and North Korea could be useful in resolving the situation," he said. But he had heard no proposals for a broader strategy

China has clashed with the US over the precise strategy, resulting in a harsh exchange of words in a closed-door session earlier this week.

DOJ_NMG_0078672

The US is reportedly looking at possible sanctions against North Korea. Chris Hill, US assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled six-party talks, said on Wednesday: “We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea. We are not going to accept it.”

The US would “have no choice but to act resolutely”, he told the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University in Washington.

He refused to say precisely what the US would do in the event of a nuclear test, but indicated the response could be some kind of blockade, saying the top US priority was to prevent proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Fuad Al-Siniora The Accidental Prime Minister (WSJ)

By Michael Young

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

BEIRUT -- There was a time, not so long ago, when Fuad al-Siniora was the most vilified man in Lebanon. As the person in charge of the nation's finances under the late prime minister, Rafiq Hariri, he was regarded by the Lebanese as the abominable taxman. On the evening of Hariri's assassination on Feb. 14, 2005, it was another Mr. Siniora I recall seeing among a gathering of anti-Syrian opposition figures at the Hariri mansion -- a proper technocrat, seemingly misplaced amid the promenading politicians. Yet when the opposition elected a majority to parliament later in the year, Mr. Siniora emerged, almost naturally, as the successor to his onetime boss. For now, despite efforts by an array of forces to bring his government down, Mr. Siniora remains firmly in place.

There is an urban Sunni merchant's litheness in that metamorphosis from staid number-cruncher to persuasive prime minister. A native of the southern port city of Sidon who started his career as a Citibank executive, Mr. Siniora is velvety and unflappable, as befits a maven of the Levantine marketplace. He avoids hard angles in favor of nods, winks and baroque compromises -- qualities essential for herding the fat cats that make up Lebanese government.

Mr. Siniora receives me in his cavernous office in the Grand Sérail, an Ottoman barracks that after World War I housed the French Mandatory authorities. The vast structure, built in 1853, was destroyed during Lebanon's civil war, before Hariri rebuilt it as a headquarters for the prime minister. Mr. Siniora now works as well as lives there, with his family. These days, like most of Syria's Lebanese foes, he spends much time indoors, to avoid assassination. * * *

During the summer war between Hezbollah and Israel, Mr. Siniora walked a tightrope. A seven-point plan he devised was instrumental in creating a framework for an exit from the conflict and the extension of Lebanese state authority to the southern border. But this little endeared him to Hezbollah, which controlled an autonomous area in the south from which the Lebanese Army had been excluded. As Israel began bombing after the abduction of two of its soldiers on July 12, the prime minister had to balance conflicting interests: to use the violence as leverage to loosen Hezbollah's hold over the south, but without appearing to betray the party, which controls two ministers in his cabinet.

The highwire act is continuing. That's why Mr. Siniora will admit that "it's definitely difficult now for Hezbollah to conduct any military operation south of the Litani River" -- but he won't gloat. On the contrary, he insists, "We managed to stop Israel from winning, for the second time since the October 1973 Arab-Israeli war. This is important in the conscience of the Arabs." When I point out he is being disingenuous, that he and his allies in the parliamentary majority were never keen to see Hezbollah make gains, let alone endorse its claim of having scored a "victory" against Israel, Mr. Siniora says: "There were heroic efforts by [Hezbollah] combatants and by Lebanese who received the displaced. But I don't claim we won a victory. We could have sent the army south without this war, and we've now done so for the first time in 35 years. But here were the negatives: My country was reoccupied; it was destroyed; Israel took us back 10 years [economically]; and we must comply with international resolutions that affect Lebanese sovereignty."

I bring up a prickly moment two weeks ago when Hezbollah's secretary-general, Hassan Nasrallah, speaking at a rally in Beirut's southern suburbs, mocked Mr. Siniora. Last August, during an Arab League foreign ministers' summit in Beirut at the height of the fighting, the prime minister dissolved into tears in the midst of a speech defending Lebanon's Arab bona fides. In his address, Mr. Nasrallah affirmed: "Tears don't liberate [land]." What did Mr. Siniora think of the statement? "I don't react to every word I hear. I take it easy. I have a high degree of serenity. . . . Yet the impact of those tears on all the Arab world was greater than a thousand rockets [Hezbollah] fired on Israel."

There was a less obvious subtext to the exchange. The Arab summit was very much an effort by the predominantly Sunni Arab states to contain Shiite Iran and Hezbollah in Lebanon. Their way of doing so was to support the Siniora plan, which sought to remove excuses for new wars in the south. This succeeded: Aspects of the seven-point plan, including Lebanon's declaring a desire to return to the 1949 Armistice Agreement with Israel, were integrated into the U.N. resolution that ended the fighting, and Hezbollah agreed to them, albeit reluctantly. Mr. Nasrallah, in ridiculing Mr. Siniora, was expressing antipathy for his attachment to a Sunni Arab order that Hezbollah loathes.

DOJ_NMG_0078673

As for a return to the armistice, I suggest to Mr. Siniora that this is easier said than done. Some experts argue the agreement is no longer valid, given its repeated violations; others say it needs to be updated. More importantly, Hezbollah and Iran don't like it. Mr. Siniora is dismissive: "It doesn't have to be updated or renegotiated. It was approved by the government, and will be implemented de facto." But going back to an armistice first requires a resolution of the disputed Shebaa Farms issue. The U.N. says the farms area, occupied by Israel, is Syrian; the Lebanese say it is part of Lebanon. Mr. Siniora wants to place it under U.N. auspices until this is decided, in effect forcing the Israelis out. His aim is to deny Hezbollah a reason to pursue armed resistance there. But the U.N. is not enthusiastic. Won't this only encourage Hezbollah to say Mr. Siniora's methods have failed, justifying the guns again? "What can armed resistance bring?" he retorts. "Israel recently reoccupied Lebanon. Only diplomacy made them withdraw."

Would Hezbollah play along, given its Iranian agenda? "I must assume that, and act as if Hezbollah has a Lebanese agenda," he answers. However, his government is not taking chances: "There are no restrictions on the Lebanese army's movements in the south. It has clear instructions to prohibit the appearance of weapons or uniforms, and to confiscate them." More worrying is that the U.N. force helping the Lebanese might be attacked by al Qaeda, or by Islamists supported by Syria. Does Mr. Siniora consider this likely? "I don't think so," he answers, adding, far less reassuringly, "but we should take our precautions." * * *

The prime minister tells me once again that he has "a high level of serenity," but he does seem unsettled by the increasing pressure from Hezbollah, Christian leader Michel Aoun, Syria and Iran for him and the parliamentary majority to accept a new "national unity" government. He even sounds mildly irritated: "Change is unwarranted. Our performance this summer was outstanding. We passed the seven-point plan, reworked the U.N. resolution on Lebanon in our favor, ended the hostilities, sent the army south, forced Israel out, and gained international support, including financial support. What more could be done?"

Some discern more sinister designs in the effort to bring the government down. A few days ago, on Wednesday, the influential Christian Maronite bishops issued a statement implying that the call for a broader cabinet was a furtive way of blocking progress in the Hariri investigation. In the coming weeks the government must consent to guidelines for a mixed tribunal to try those accused of involvement in the late prime minister's murder. Syria is the leading suspect, and Mr. Siniora's allies fear the push to change the government is meant to ensure there are enough pro-Syrian ministers to block any cabinet vote on the tribunal -- or impose a limper court.

The prime minister is sanguine. "This is a tempest in a teapot. My experience in this cabinet is that in a very limited number of cases did we resort to voting. The tribunal was agreed upon [in a national dialogue between Lebanese leaders], and it's in no one's interest to make an issue of it." But his last phase is plainly a warning to Hezbollah, one Mr. Siniora repeats: "If someone tries to stop the legal process, then we must make sure we don't go back on what was agreed." When I ask whether Syria is the Svengali behind the new government plan, he sidesteps only slightly: "The effort is being made by people who are pro-Syrian."

But Mr. Siniora's strongest argument against a cabinet change comes in an anodyne phrase: "Nabih Birri says it might be difficult to form a new government, and could take Lebanon into a crisis to no one's advantage." Mr. Birri is the parliament speaker, and a Shiite. By invoking him, Mr. Siniora is using one powerful Shiite to offset the demands of another, Mr. Nasrallah, in warning that a political vacuum might ensue.

Politics are not the only thing the prime minister has to worry about. With a $40 billion debt, a GDP estimated at only $18 to $20 billion, and losses from the July-August conflict estimated by some U.N. agencies at over $10 billion, Lebanon is in dire financial straits. Mr. Siniora says the situation was already "unsustainable" before the "catastrophe," making reform imperative. What he outlines, however, is a dilemma.

Lebanon's credit rating is set to go down in the near future, and the government urgently needs revenue. However, Mr. Siniora is first to admit that, given the country's dark mood, "we cannot raise taxes, this would lead to a recession. We need alternative sources." He means privatization, particularly of the lucrative fixed and mobile telecommunications network.

Fair enough, except that unless the government shows tangible progress on financial reform soon, particularly on privatization, a long-anticipated international donor conference to help Lebanon out of its debt noose will not materialize. And like so much else, privatization remains vulnerable to political discord. So, when Mr. Siniora says the conference might happen "I hope before the end of the year," I have my doubts.

A government priority is compensating those whose homes were destroyed in the recent fighting. Hezbollah garnered publicity by handing money to victims out of suitcases, an approach it sought to contrast with the slowness of the state's reaction. Does Mr. Siniora see himself in competition with the party? "No. We have an obligation toward the people. It was not their mistake that they suffered." He accepts that "Hezbollah might politicize the relief effort against the government," and when I ask whether the party's distribution of funds had provoked problems in certain villages, Mr. Siniora probably sees an opportunity to get one back: "I've heard there are problems. Giving more aid to certain people and less to others creates a great deal of sensitivity."

DOJ_NMG_0078674

As we wrap up, the inevitable question provokes an inevitable answer. I ask Mr. Siniora what it feels like being a marked man. "I'm a believer. I know that if anything must happen, it will happen. But I take my precautions. I'm afraid of God. My mother once said: 'Don't be afraid of whoever is afraid of God.'" Many of Mr. Siniora's enemies will readily admit, of course, to a fear of God. What he must worry about is that they will increasingly fear Fuad al-Siniora, the accidental prime minister who may have turned out to be more than they bargained for.

Mr. Young, a Lebanese national, is opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine.

'We Will Not Recognize Israel,' Palestinian Premier Affirms (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 6 — In a defiant speech delivered to a teeming crowd of Hamas supporters, the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, insisted on Friday that his Hamas movement would not recognize Israel despite the cutoff in Western aid that has strangled his government.

"I tell you with all honesty, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel," Mr. Haniya said to thunderous applause from tens of thousands of supporters, many waving green Hamas flags, at the Yarmouk soccer stadium in Gaza City.

Mr. Haniya's remarks appeared to be aimed at the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who met Wednesday in the West Bank. At that time, Mr. Abbas declared that talks between his secular Fatah movement and Hamas on a Palestinian unity government had broken down, and that the political stalemate could not go on indefinitely.

Mr. Abbas says there is a need for a new Palestinian government that will recognize Israel and deal with it. He also indicated that he was prepared to invoke his presidential powers and dismiss the current government, which is dominated by Hamas, the radical Islamic movement.

Less than a month ago, on Sept. 11, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya agreed in principle to form a unity government in an effort to find a way out of the worsening political and economic crisis facing the Palestinians. The goal was to bring Fatah and other political factions into the government. And the hope was that this would persuade Israel, the United States and the European Union to resume the flow of money that had been cut off when Hamas assumed power.

Without that aid the Palestinian Authority has been unable to pay salaries, provide services or govern in any meaningful way.

But the blunt public remarks by Mr. Abbas on Wednesday and Mr. Haniya on Friday reflected what seems to be an increasingly bitter power struggle that could dim the prospects for a compromise.

Still, Mr. Haniya called on Mr. Abbas, who works in the West Bank city of Ramallah, to return to Gaza to resume talks on a broad-based government. "Come down to Gaza to protect our people and declare our commitment to a national unity government," Mr. Haniya said.

But Mr. Abbas has given no indication that he plans to accept the invitation any time soon. Mr. Haniya and other senior Hamas officials are based in Gaza, and Israel does not permit them to travel to the West Bank.

During the lengthy speech on a sweltering afternoon, Mr. Haniya appeared on the verge of collapse at one point and could not continue his remarks. Bodyguards rushed to physically support him and whisked him off the stage. During the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, Mr. Haniya, like many Muslims, observes a dawn-to-dusk fast, which apparently caused his weakness.

He re-emerged about 10 minutes later and continued. "Our bodies may get tired, but our souls will not," Mr. Haniya said as the crowd roared.

The United States and the European Union are demanding that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian accords.

In negotiations, Fatah and Hamas have sought a formula under which a new government would accept such positions, though Hamas as a political party would not be forced to endorse them. But Hamas has repeatedly rejected the Western demands, and Fatah leaders say they see no rationale for joining a unity government that will continue to be ostracized by the Western countries and much of the international community.

Israel, which is withholding more than $50 million a month in taxes and customs duties it collects for the Palestinians, refuses to deal with the Hamas government. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert says he is willing to meet with Mr. Abbas, but stresses that there is no prospect for progress until the Palestinians release an Israeli soldier seized by Palestinian militants and taken to Gaza on June 25.

DOJ_NMG_0078675

Mr. Haniya, meanwhile, said that the Palestinians faced an “unethical and unjust siege led by the United States administration,” and that “many parties, internal and external, colluded in an attempt to force us to surrender.” He noted that even Arab governments had not invited him to visit, aside from Qatar.

The Fatah-Hamas friction boiled over into street fighting in Gaza on Sunday and Monday, leaving 10 Palestinians dead and more than 100 wounded in some of the worst internal fighting in recent years. The violence has subsided, but the tension remains.

Haniyeh: Hamas Won't Recognize Israel (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Hamas will not recognize Israel or give in to international pressure that has crippled the Palestinian government, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh told tens of thousands of banner-waving supporters at a rally Friday.

Haniyeh's fiery speech was interrupted when he fainted onstage, apparently overcome by the heat and two weeks of dawn-to-dusk fasting during the holy month of Ramadan. He resumed his speech after a few minutes.

"I tell you with all honesty, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel," Haniyeh declared to a roar of applause from the crowd. "We say we will be in every government, we will stay in the government."

The Hamas leader ruled out a proposal by members of his own Hamas movement to form a new government of technocrats as a way of winning international support and ending a seven-month aid freeze.

"There are new scenarios, such as an emergency government, a technocrat government, or early elections," Haniyeh told the crowd in a packed soccer stadium. "They all aim at one thing, getting Hamas out of the government."

Moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who was elected separately, has the authority to dissolve the Hamas Cabinet and replace it with an emergency government, or could call early elections. However, Abbas aides say he's not considering either option at the moment, fearing such moves would not have popular support. An emergency government would also require approval of the parliament, which is controlled by Hamas.

Haniyeh said Hamas remains willing to invite other parties into a coalition, but that it would not soften its positions. In addition to recognizing Israel, the international community demands that Hamas renounce violence and accept existing peace agreements.

He accused the international community of trying to impose its will on the Palestinians. "They want a government with American and Israeli dimensions that implements external dictates, the so-called Quartet demands," he said, referring to the group of Mideast peacemakers — the U.S., the U.N., the European Union and Russia.

Haniyeh said his best offer to Israel was a temporary truce in return for establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with its capital in Jerusalem, over which Israel claims complete sovereignty. He also repeated demands for the release of thousands of Palestinians held in Israeli prisons

The 46-year-old leader's address had just got under way when, apparently weakened by fasting and the sweltering hot day, he began to slur his words, then slumped against aides surrounding him. He sat on a chair and resumed his address after a few minutes.

"Our bodies can get tired, but our soul will not, and we will not stop our steadfastness," he said of the incident.

The rally, with heavy security provided by armed Hamas militiamen, came at a time of increasing tension between the Islamic group and Abbas' Fatah Party.

The dispute between the two groups erupted into gunbattles last week, fueling concerns it could escalate into a full-fledged civil war.

Haniyeh called for Abbas to come to Gaza from his West Bank headquarters for talks to defuse the crisis. "Come here to Gaza to resume dialogue to protect the unity of our people," he said.

Hamas won a parliamentary election in January, bringing the party into direct confrontation with Abbas, who controls some of the security forces and backs peace talks with Israel.

In the West Bank on Friday, Israeli troops and Palestinians scuffled at a checkpoint south of Jerusalem when hundreds of Muslims tried to enter the Israeli-ruled city for Muslim prayers, witnesses said.

The Palestinians had arrived at the checkpoint, seeking to reach the Al Aqsa Mosque, Islam's third-holiest shrine. When some 300 people began pushing forward, paramilitary border police threw stun grenades to disperse the crowd.

A spokesman for the border police said nobody was injured in the incident.

During Ramadan, tens of thousands of Muslims attend prayers at the mosque. Citing security concerns, Israel bars Palestinian men under the age of 40 from reaching the site, in Jerusalem's walled Old City.

DOJ_NMG_0078676

We Can't Go Home Again (NYT)

By Sam Bahour

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

Ramallah, West Bank

THIRTEEN years ago, I left a comfortable life in the United States for an uncertain future in the West Bank. Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization had just signed the Oslo Accords. Like many others, I saw an opportunity for Palestinians to finally build a society and economy that would lead to freedom — to a thriving Palestine alongside Israel.

As a Palestinian-American businessman, I was determined to do my part. So I moved to the West Bank city of El Bireh, where my family has lived for centuries. There I helped create a $100 million telecommunications company, which today employs more than 2,000 Palestinians. I earned an M.B.A. through Tel Aviv University. Then I developed a $10 million shopping center — the first of its kind in the Palestinian territories, employing more than 220 Palestinians. I married and had two beautiful daughters.

Now the Israeli authorities have decided that my life here has come to an end.

Even after the Oslo Accords were signed and the Palestinian Authority established, Israel retained control of all borders and of the Palestinian Population Registry. Nothing or no one gets into or out of the West Bank and Gaza without Israeli permission. For a dozen years I have waited for Israel to approve my application for Palestinian residency.

American Jews, indeed Jews from anywhere in the world, can come to Israel and be granted automatic citizenship. Thousands of American Jews freely enter and exit Israel to live in illegal Israeli settlements in the middle of the West Bank. But Palestinians whose families have lived here continually for centuries do not enjoy the same right. I need a residency card from Israel to live with my Palestinian family in my grandfather's home in the Palestinian West Bank.

For 13 years, I've lived here by renewing my tourist visa every three months. Last month, an Israeli soldier stamped my American passport with a one-month visa and wrote "last permit" on it in Arabic, Hebrew and English. Now I am faced with a terrible choice. I can leave, uprooting my family and abandoning the businesses I've worked hard to build. I can leave alone and be separated from my wife and daughters. Or I can remain here "illegally," risking deportation at any time.

My situation is not unique. Thousands of Palestinians are in a similar limbo. Most have less desirable options than mine. My children are American citizens. We can return to the United States. But I came here with a vision, and I remain determined to play a role in developing an economy, nonviolently ending Israel's military occupation and building a Palestinian state.

Israeli policies effectively discourage people like me. According to the Israeli human rights group B'Tselem, it has been official Israeli policy since 1983 to "reduce, as much as possible, the approval of requests for family unification" of Palestinians. B'Tselem reports that in the last six years alone, more than 70,000 people have applied for permission to immigrate to the West Bank and Gaza to join family. Their applications have either been denied or, like mine, languish.

Each Palestinian who leaves lessens what Israelis openly call the "demographic threat" of a growing Palestinian population. But Israel needs to understand that the real threat comes not from demographics. It comes from controlling an entire population, breaking families apart and placing obstacles in the path of economic development.

Israelis and Palestinians are destined to be neighbors. One neighbor cannot ensure its security by condemning the other to hardship and despair. Many people like me — business owners, educators, artists and others — whom Israel is denying entry came to build bridges, not walls. We came to invest in a better life to follow this occupation — a bright, joint future for Palestinian and Israeli children alike.

Report Of Plot To Attack Jews Prompts Terror Alert In Prague (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 6 — A report that there was a plot to attack Jews in Prague has set off a terrorism alert there, a Prague newspaper reported Friday.

The Czech news media have been feverishly speculating on the nature of the threat since the government announced heightened security measures on Sept. 23, the first day of the Jewish New Year. The Czech interior minister, Ivan Langer, called the threat "unprecedented in the history of the Czech Republic."

The government has refused to characterize the threat further other than to say that information about it came from foreign intelligence services.

That has led some Czech news organizations to suggest that the terrorism alert was related to the arrest of three Norwegian men earlier in September on charges of plotting to bomb the United States and Israeli Embassies in Oslo. One of those men, a Norwegian of Pakistani origin named Arfan Qadeer Bhatti, had close contacts with a notorious ethnic Albanian gun and drug runner who operated for years out of Prague.

DOJ_NMG_0078677

The news of possible terrorism threats in both Oslo and Prague raise the possibility that Islamist terrorist plots, having been foiled by vigilant antiterrorism efforts in capitals like Paris and London, are turning to "softer" targets elsewhere in Europe where security is more lax.

President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan alleges in his memoir, published in the United States last month, that in 2003 Al Qaeda planned to hijack planes from the national carriers of the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Croatia, Poland, Romania and Malta for use in a Sept.-11-style attack against Heathrow Airport near London "because security at these airports and in their aircraft was lax."

The Czech newspaper Mlada Fronta Dnes reported Friday that an attack was supposed to coincide with Rosh Hashana, the Jewish New Year, during which many Israeli Jews visit the picturesque capital. The holiday was celebrated from sunset on Sept. 22 until nightfall on Sept. 26 this year.

According to the newspaper, which cited unidentified Czech intelligence officials, "Arab terrorists wanted to abduct dozens of people, hold them hostage, and, in the end, massacre all of them."

Government officials have declined to comment on the report. The newspaper quoted one unnamed minister as saying that an abduction plot was only an "extreme" possibility.

The heightened security alert was followed by several anonymous bomb threats, which interrupted service on a Prague subway and forced the evacuation of a hotel, but proved to be false.

Nonetheless, police officers bearing automatic weapons continue to patrol Prague's airport, train stations and the areas around the city's seven major synagogues, residents say.

China Reports Increase In Gauge Of Foreign Trade (WSJ)

By J.r. Wu

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

BEIJING -- China's current-account surplus in the first half of this year totaled $91.58 billion, widening from $67.26 billion in the same period a year earlier, the country's foreign-exchange regulator said Friday.

The current-account surplus in the January-June period was bolstered by a growing surplus in China's trade in goods, the State Administration of Foreign Exchange said in a statement on its Web site.

The latest data indicate China's current-account surplus is on track to exceed the $160.82 billion posted for full-year 2005. The current account is the broadest gauge of foreign trade and it measures trade in goods, services, tourism and investment.

"We expect China's current account in the second half of the year, especially trade in goods, to maintain a relatively large surplus," SAFE said in China's first-half 2006 balance-of-payments report.

As part of its aim of achieving equilibrium in the balance of payments, including moving toward yuan convertibility on the capital account, SAFE reiterated it will encourage outflows and control the use of foreign debt.

It said it will continue to expand channels for overseas financial investments made by banks, brokerages, and insurance institutions.

SAFE will also seek to control the use of foreign debt by domestic institutions and encourage the early repayment of medium- and long-term foreign debt.

An Iron Fist, Extended Harmoniously (LAT)

By Mark Magnier, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

As China's leadership prepares for a key meeting, President Hu is showing he means business when he calls for unity in the party.

BEIJING — In advance of a key Communist Party meeting this weekend, Chinese President Hu Jintao has worked overtime to burnish the image of harmony in the party, even if it's taken some bloodletting to drive the point home.

The purge late last month of Shanghai party boss Chen Liangyu on corruption charges, quickly followed by the fall of two prominent party officials in Henan province, sent shock waves through China's political establishment.

The incidents also served as a warning to those in lower party ranks that Hu means business, further consolidating his power and stressing his underdogoriented policies as he heads into the fourth year of an expected 10-year administration.

Hu has stressed the importance of harmony as a salve for growing tensions over China's rich-poor gap and endemic corruption — even as the party and the nation's wide-ranging security apparatus have backed up words with force, intimidation and censorship when appeals for calm are ignored by rioting farmers, the media or social activists.

It comes as no surprise, then, that "harmonious society" will be the theme of this year's Central Committee meeting, which starts Sunday and runs through Wednesday. About 350 members of the party elite will attend.

DOJ_NMG_0078678

Beyond the pageantry and long-winded speeches, the party conference serves an important function in the Chinese political world.

On a stage before China's 70 million party members and its vast nonparty population, Hu hopes to further demarcate his policies from those of predecessor Jiang Zemin, who placed greater emphasis on economic winners.

The meeting also aims to bind lower-tier state and party workers to the leadership after extensive promotions and government reshuffling. And it will emphasize anti-corruption themes, the environment and the building of a social safety net in a bid to reach out to an increasingly cynical public.

"Hu's policies will be endorsed more strongly than ever before," said Cheng Li, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and author of "China's Leaders: The New Generation." "Moving into his second term, you'll see more policy initiatives, although probably not much political reform."

Chinese presidents in recent decades have tended to spend their first five-year term consolidating power and their second making their policy mark. It's a laborious process, analogous to a U.S. president inheriting his predecessor's Cabinet and then spending years nudging out the old guard through attrition, transfers, intrigue and strategic use of scandals.

Hu's recent power plays are in line with this timetable. Chen, a fellow member of the "Shanghai gang," was an ally of Jiang who in recent years defied Beijing's call to discourage real estate speculation and stem other policies favoring the well-heeled.

Speculation is rife that other Politburo members with ties to Jiang — Jia Qinglin and Huang Ju have been mentioned — may be squeezed out in coming months or, at the least, forced to retire by the Party Congress next fall.

Governing China, with its vast size, complex problems and economic and social turmoil, would challenge any politician, and so far Hu has exceeded generally modest expectations. His identification with the poor and underprivileged plays well, particularly outside the big cities, as does his modesty.

He has avoided major mistakes. And his quiet competence is generally admired by a nation on the move.

Now that he has the power, many analysts are looking closely at what he does with it. Few expect many new ideas during his likely 2007-12 second term, given his relatively cautious, conservative style.

There is likely to be continued emphasis on rural education, welfare issues, unemployment funds and allocation of resources from the richer coastal region to poorer interior areas.

But some see potentially interesting shadow plays in the wings, including gradual moves to strengthen the rule of law and improve human rights. These reflect the concerns of a growing middle class and an awareness of China's checkered international reputation as it prepares to host the 2008 Olympics.

That contrasts with the dim chances for change in the way China is run, although there may be some tinkering with the relationship between the central and local governments.

"The regime's institutional changes have so far served to consolidate rather than weaken authoritarianism," said Andrew Nathan, a political science professor at Columbia University.

To date, attacks on corruption appear selective rather than systemic.

And despite the many problems and contradictions inherent in China's one-party political system, few analysts expect much progress toward multiparty elections, a robust media, empowered civic watchdogs, an independent court system or external checks on police abuses anytime soon.

If anything, the Communist leadership in recent years has become even more jealous of its monopoly, actively rooting out even the hint of a threat amid suggestions it is running scared.

"Beijing will try to find ways to enhance governability without major changes that it deems unsettling to the regime," said Xiaobo Lu, a professor of political science at Barnard College and Columbia University.

"By implementing socially and economically harmonious policies," he added, "the leaders hope to avoid more painful, possibly destabilizing, political changes."

Russia Deports Georgians And Increases Pressures On Businesses And Students (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 6 — Russia deported 153 citizens of Georgia on Friday as a wave of punitive measures against Georgian migrants and businesses grew, prompting criticism that the government is carrying out an ethnically motivated campaign of harassment.

The deportations came at the end of a week of political and diplomatic conflict between Russia and Georgia that began with the arrests of four Russian military officers for espionage, and has shown little sign of easing despite the officers' release.

DOJ_NMG_0078679

The police, who had already begun to shutter some businesses linked to Georgians, searched and closed still more on Friday, including two more casinos and two of Moscow's better-known Georgian restaurants, according to officials and news reports.

At least some schools in Moscow received requests from the police to list students with Georgian names, presumably to help in identifying illegal immigrants, prompting a complaint from an education official, Lyubov Kezina.

And one of the country's most famous writers, Grigory Chkhartishvili, a Georgian native who writes under the pseudonym Boris Akunin, told a radio station that tax inspectors questioned his publisher about his income from his hugely popular novels.

Yuri Dzhibladze, an ethnic Georgian and president of the Center for the Development of Democracy and Human Rights in Moscow, described the authorities' actions as an unjustified overreaction to political disputes with Georgia's president, Mikheil Saakashvili.

"It smacks of racism and xenophobia," he said in a telephone interview.

Russian officials have cited legal or procedural violations as justifications for their actions, accusing the casinos and restaurants of violating health or other regulatory standards and the deportees of breaking immigration laws. "Everything that is taking place today is exclusively within the framework of the law," the prosecutor general, Yuri Y. Chaika, said on Friday, according to Interfax.

Officials' remarks, however, have left little doubt that they have singled out Georgians for enforcement.

Mikhail L. Tyurkin, the head of the country's migration service, said on Thursday that all future work visas for Georgians would be eliminated. "Our analyses showed that today we do not need to attract Georgian citizens," he said.

In the wake of last week's arrests, which provoked an ominous war of words between the countries, Russia severed transportation links to Georgia, effective Tuesday, and has vowed to restrict postal service and money transfers.

The steps against Georgians in Russia have coincided with two new campaigns announced this week by President Vladimir V. Putin. On Wednesday, he proposed sweeping new restrictions on gambling. A day later, he called for new regulations of migrant workers, especially those in wholesale and retail markets, which he said were controlled by "semigangs, some of them ethnic."

Using some of the most strikingly nationalistic language of his presidency, Mr. Putin said that markets should be regulated "with a view to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population," according to the Kremlin's transcript of his remarks.

It is not clear exactly how many Georgian citizens live in Russia, though some estimates run as high as 1 million. Like many citizens of former Soviet republics, they come to Russia to work, often temporarily, sending money home to support their families.

The Georgians deported on Friday were detained over the last several days in what officials have described as a sweep of illegal migrants. Viktor P. Beltsov, a spokesman for the Emergency Services Ministry, said that 153 deportees were flown to Georgia's capital, Tbilisi, aboard a ministry airplane from an airfield outside of Moscow.

The campaign against Georgians has been echoed in television and newspaper reports that have indulged in stereotypes and lurid descriptions of Georgian mafias and criminality. At the same time, however, the authorities have come under unusually sharp criticism in other parts of the news media.

"Searches in restaurants, closed casinos, threats of deportations looming over hundreds of thousands of people," a commentator, Demis Polandov, wrote in the newspaper Gazeta on Friday. "If this is not an ethnic cleansing, then I do not have a word to name it."

Kremlin Rules (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

The world needs to watch Russia's current pressure on Georgia. Its decision this week to ban trade, travel and postal links to neighboring Georgia isn't the first time Moscow has tangled with the former Soviet republic. But it is a fresh reminder of just how paranoid and bullying the Kremlin's foreign policy has become in the hands of President Vladimir Putin.

The current dispute involves Georgia's arrest last week of four Russian officers, whom the Tbilisi government of President Mikheil Saakashvili accuses of being spies. Mr. Saakashvili quickly handed over the four "hostages" -- as Mr. Putin's government calls them -- to the custody of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which promptly returned them to Moscow.

That should have been the end of it. Instead, Mr. Putin's rubber-stamp parliament -- which already bars the import of Georgian goods, including its famous wines -- now threatens to prevent the 300,000 or more Georgians living in Russia from wiring money home. Yesterday, Mr. Putin urged the international community not to "ignore the irresponsibility of the Georgian government." His foreign minister, Sergei Lavrov, alleges that the arrest of the officers is part of a Western plot apparently hatched in Washington: "The seizure of our officers immediately followed, I repeat, NATO's decision to grant Georgia an intense cooperation plan, intense dialogue," he said, noting Mr. Saakashvili's recent visit to the U.S. as part of the annual meeting of the U.N. General Assembly.

DOJ_NMG_0078680

Maybe Comrade Lavrov really believes the Bush Administration wastes its time hatching two-bit schemes in the Caucasus to humiliate Mother Russia. What we are likelier witnessing is another fit of Russian pique at Mr. Saakashvili's courageous decision to yank Georgia out of Moscow's orbit -- where it had remained for a dozen dreary years after its nominal independence from the Soviet Union in 1991 -- and into the orbit of the West.

Since coming to office after the 2003 Rose Revolution, the U.S.-educated Mr. Saakashvili has moved aggressively to reform and deregulate the Georgian economy. Customs tariffs have been abolished, income taxes have been cut to a flat 12% rate, inflation has been brought below 10%, growth is in double-digits, the birthrate is again positive and the World Bank now cites Georgia as a global role model in the fight against corruption. Mr. Saakashvili has also sent 900 troops to Iraq and brought Georgia into NATO's Partnership for Peace program, a likely precursor to actual membership.

All this can serve as a model for other former Soviet republics such as Kyrgyzstan and Ukraine as they struggle to prosper. It could also serve as a model for Russia itself, which may be why Moscow has used every opportunity to bring Georgia and its leaders to heel. Mr. Putin continues to provide military and political support to the breakaway Georgian provinces of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Earlier this year, gas and electricity lines to Georgia were mysteriously disrupted in the dead of winter in what senior Georgian officials believe was an act of sabotage by Mr. Putin's secret services. Georgia has now switched to Azeri gas and expects to maintain supplies through this winter.

That doesn't preclude future acts of mischief by Mr. Putin's KGB government, in Georgia or anywhere else in the former U.S.S.R. that they consider properly their own. Which is one reason to feel grateful that President Bush, after placing too much faith in Mr. Putin in his first term, has given Mr. Saakashvili the support he deserves. "Nobody else would stand up for cases like Georgia except if you're idealistic," the Georgian told us during a recent visit to our offices in New York. "And Americans are the most idealistic people in the world."

Castro Is Reported To Have Cancer (TIME)

By Timothy J. BURGER AND SALLY B. DONNELLY

Time, October 7, 2006

Ever since President Fidel Castro was sidelined for what was said to be abdominal surgery last July, Cuban officials have maintained that the country's leader will return to his post. "We will again have him leading the revolution," said Foreign Minister Felipe Pérez Roque just two days ago, speaking at an outdoor rally to protest the U.S. trade embargo against Cuba, according to the Communist Party daily newspaper Granma.

But U.S. officials tell TIME that many in the U.S. government are now convinced that Castro, 80, has terminal cancer and will never return to power. "Certainly we have heard this, that this guy has terminal cancer," said one U.S. official.

Of course, such intelligence reports could be wrong, and one official cautioned that definitive proof is nearly impossible for the U.S. to come by. Yet the fact that the Cuban government removed Castro from the public stage before his death could suggest that Castro and his would-be successors were aware of a terminal condition and wanted to gauge public reaction to his absence. "They got to see how people would react," says one U.S. official. "They have had a chance to see how things might work without out him functioning day-to-day."

The U.S. government has been preparing for Castro's departure for half a century. But this time, the Bush Administration has set up an interagency group to coordinate policy once the inevitable happens.

That doesn't mean that things will change much. Fidel's brother Raul, 75, has been acting president since Fidel went into the hospital and has given no indication that he will change the policies of the isolated Communist government that has tormented the U.S. since taking power in 1959. Though he has until recently kept a very low profile, Raul Castro — not Fidel — was feted as the host of the non-aligned nations' summit on Sept. 15. Then Raul called a high profile meeting of the country's local, provincial and national leadership at what he called "this historic moment in our country's history." In another sign of his increasing prominence, two weeks ago Raul delivered his first televised national speech at the close of a trade union federation congress.

Hungarian PM Wins Confidence Vote (FT)

By Christopher Condon

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

Lawmakers from Hungary's two coalition parties on Friday signalled their near unanimous support for Ferenc Gyurcsany, the prime minister, in a confidence vote.

DOJ_NMG_0078681

Despite a withering attack from the opposition and the knowledge that hundreds of thousands of Hungarians were expected to mass outside parliament to demand the prime minister's resignation later in the day, MPs voted 207-165 in favour of Mr Gyurcsany. Only three coalition MPs failed to vote for the measure.

Before the vote, Mr Gyurcsany offered a qualified apology for admitting to lying about state finances in a speech he gave to his party in May, the publication of which sparked rioting and anti-government protests last month.

On Friday, Mr Gyurcsany said he was sorry for not having confronted the budget problem earlier. He vowed again to continue austerity measures and to introduce public sector reforms designed to reduce the budget deficit from the 10 per cent of gross domestic product projected for this year.

Mr Gyurcsany vowed to press on with crucial public sector reforms and apologised for not speaking honestly about Hungary's budget woes earlier. "I call on parliament not to give in to threats and street blackmail organised by the opposition," he said.

In connection to the speech he made behind closed doors in May to his party – the publication of which three weeks ago sparked riots and an ongoing political crisis – Mr Gyurcsany said he regretted not making the same message public.

The speech was an emotional and obscenity-laced appeal to his party to stop lying and confront Hungary's mounting budget deficit with budget reforms. In it, Mr Gyurcsany admitted his party lied about state finances to win April's parliamentary elections.

As the prime minister spoke, opposition supporters gathered in the square outside parliament for a demonstration expected to draw hundreds of thousands calling for the prime minister's resignation.

The events are unlikely to resolve the most perilous political stand-off in Hungary's 16 years of post-communist democracy, and one that threatens to paralyse the country's badly needed efforts at budget reforms.

Both the government and the opposition this week contributed increasingly heated rhetoric to the three-week-old crisis.

Lajos Kosa, the mayor of Debrecen and a vice-president of Fidesz, the largest opposition party, warned that Hungarians might overthrow parliamentary democracy unless the prime minister resigned.

Opposition frustration stems from the prime minister's majority in parliament, which means that only a split in his coalition could topple the government.

Investors, particularly long-term bond holders, are relying heavily on the ability of Hungary's government to continue new austerity measures and deliver public sector reforms. Both are needed to reduce the country's dangerously high budget deficit, which is expected to reach 10 per cent of gross domestic product this year.

The forint weakened modestly against the euro this week, though yields on Hungarian government bonds rose sharply, signalling nervousness among investors. At a Wednesday auction of six-month treasury bills, demand was down and yields rose to 8.62 per cent, compared with Tuesday's benchmark fixing of 8.30 per cent.

On Thursday, Hungary sold Ft40bn-worth ($185m, €146m, £99m) of one-year government bonds. The average yield rose to 8.84 per cent, compared with Wednesday's benchmark of 8.7 per cent.

Hungary PM Wins Vote Of Confidence (AP)

By Pablo Gorondi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany, whose admission that he lied to the country about Hungary's economy led to huge street protests, won a vote of confidence in parliament Friday.

The motion in support of Gyurcsany passed 207-165. He needed 193 votes to win.

Even as parliament voted, however, tens of thousands of people gathered on Kossuth Square just outside the legislature and demanded Gyurcsany's dismissal.

The Fidesz party called on supporters to bring alarm clocks to the rally, a symbolic wake-up call for the ruling coalition to get rid of the prime minister.

Gyurcsany, whose coalition suffered large setbacks in Sunday's nationwide municipal elections, had requested the vote of confidence to reinforce political support for his austerity package and the transformation of the inefficient public sector.

Speaking ahead of Friday's vote, Gyurcsany insisted he did not consciously mislead the country.

"I must reject accusations that the first Gyurcsany government falsified data, that it knowingly misled or deceived the people," he said.

Hungarians have been protesting since Sept. 17, when Gyurcsany was heard, in a leaked recording, admitting that the government lied about the economy to win April's general elections.

Two nights of rioting two weeks ago, including an attack on state television headquarters, injured some 150 police and dozens of participants.

DOJ_NMG_0078682

In a May speech to Socialist lawmakers, Gyurcsany said his first government — the first to win re-election in post-communist Hungary — "lied throughout the last year and a half, two years.

"It was totally clear that what we are saying is not true. ... And at the same time, we did nothing for four years. Nothing," Gyurcsany said at the closed meeting May 26. "Instead, we lied morning, evening and night. I don't want to do it anymore."

But on Friday, the prime minister said the lies he had been referring to were about unsustainable policies implemented by Hungary since 2001 that led to a false sense of security and created illusions about the stability of the economy.

"Maybe we have to apologize because we allowed appearances to be maintained; what is more, we ourselves sustained the illusion that higher, larger incomes could be accomplished without better achievement," Gyurcsany said.

"I did not have the courage to tell the voters to their eyes that everything I did, everything we did, everything that many, many people in Hungary did and believed in for the past years, was based partly on self-deception, partly on lack of valor," he said.

"Yes, in this sense we eluded the facts, we were timid and we tried to avoid the straightest, most simple answers," he said. "If there's anything to apologize for, this is it. Sorry."

In the last few months, Gyurcsany's government has started implementing austerity measures and some reforms aimed at lowering the state budget deficit, which at over 10 percent of gross domestic product is the largest in the European Union.

Gyurcsany said the austerity and reforms would have negative effects next year before leading to improvements.

Former premier Viktor Orban, who leads the Fidesz party, has proposed the formation of a government of experts — not politicians — to find a solution to the country's economic crisis.

"The prime minister does not listen to the people, the people do not and will not listen the prime minister," Orban told the crowd, estimated at 80,000 by state news agency MTI. "The consequences are difficult to foresee."

Orban said his party was not seeking early elections but would continue its Kossuth Square protest until the coalition replaced Gyurcsany, claiming Hungary's economic crisis would continue to deepen as long as he was power.

"We will be here every day," Orban said, standing on the steps of the parliament building's main entrance. "We have to do this even though we know it may be difficult and take a long time."

Sudan Divestment Effort Gains Momentum At State Level (WP)

By Nora Boustany, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

House members are scattering to their home states this week with inconclusive results on the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of western Sudan, but momentum is growing at the state level for governments to divest public funds from companies, mostly foreign-based, doing business with Khartoum.

In a victory for business lobbyists on Capitol Hill, lawmakers approved a Sudan sanctions bill stripped of language that would have endorsed states' rights to pass divestment laws. The National Foreign Trade Council, representing more than 300 multinational companies, had lobbied aggressively against the provision on state investments inserted by the House during its consideration of the bill last year.

A divestment movement, however, appears to be gaining momentum across the country, with active campaigns on university campuses and at city and state levels. Six states have already passed divestment laws: Maine, Connecticut, Oregon, Illinois, New Jersey and California.

Although state legislatures will not be in session until January, lawmakers in many states are pushing for divestment bills, according to Adam Sterling, the executive director of the Sudan Divestment Task Force, a nonprofit organization dedicated to the issue.

Colorado, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Vermont, Virginia and Washington could consider some form of legislation early next year, according to the task force's Web site, which is tracking the initiatives and keeping a list of companies that warrant scrutiny.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's much-publicized signing of his state's divestment law -- standing alongside actor-activists Don Cheadle and George Clooney -- has helped spread popular awareness on the continuing violence in Darfur and given added momentum to the divestment drive, Sterling said.

The violence in Darfur began three years ago, when the Sudanese government, backed by a state-sponsored Arab militia called the Janjaweed, moved to crush African rebel movements in the fertile agricultural territory that has long resisted central government control of its resources. The conflict has left as many as 450,000 people dead and driven more than 2 million people from their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0078683

Sudan has refused to allow a U.N. peacekeeping force into Darfur, and on Monday said it opposed an indefinite extension of an African Union peace mission there.

"At this point, we are approaching that critical mass where it is past symbolism," Sterling said. "We are already seeing a response from the Sudanese government. Last April, a press release from the Sudanese Embassy here urged institutions to stop divesting, and in a recent discussion with our campaign leader in Indiana, Beth Reilly, that was the only topic the Sudanese ambassador was interested in addressing."

The National Foreign Trade Council has argued that unilateral American sanctions will not alter the behavior of a government if other countries continue to do business with it. U.S. companies have been prohibited from conducting business in Sudan since 1997, when terrorism-related sanctions were imposed on the country, but some are exempt.

The Darfur Peace and Accountability Act (HR 3127), which passed last month with bipartisan support, urges President Bush to prohibit Sudanese oil tankers from entering U.S. ports and bans cargo ships that deliver goods to Sudan's armed forces. The bill also would deny visas to individuals implicated in the killing in Darfur.

"The bill is not bad, it is just incomplete," Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.) said in a telephone interview from Boston last Tuesday. "I don't think that divestment will have the impact of shutting down the economy of the Sudan, but if it is just a penny it is worth doing -- you do what you think is right and you hope that it works."

"This issue can't wait any longer," Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) warned this week, vowing to push for an amendment he co-sponsored with Rep. Barbara T. Lee (D-Calif.) to restore the divestment language. "These are people who respond only to pressure, and one of our efforts is to push the Europeans who share our position on this to do more. It is unfathomable that . . . before our very eyes yet another genocide should unfold, specifically in Darfur. The Rwanda episode is still very much on people's minds."

The amendment calls for a halt to federal contracts going to international companies whose business in Sudan may directly or indirectly support the Sudanese government's military campaign in Darfur. Lee said similar measures against South Africa helped end apartheid.

While the sanctions campaign to end apartheid in South Africa took more than 20 years to show any effect, the Sudan divestment movement is only 18 months old. The effort grew out of an eight-month study group at UCLA and has quickly developed into a nationwide network.

Lee, who sits on the House International Relations Committee and serves on the Africa subcommittee, has been a leading voice in the divestment movement.

"So many people have died, we have to use every tool at our disposal," she said. "It is our duty to make sure pension funds don't have blood in their banks. It is the blood of genocide. We don't know how many companies are involved. We know there are $600 million in federal contracts, and this is just the tip of the iceberg. We have got to step up and do something."

There are no American companies that are directly involved, but at least two dozen multinational companies, mostly in the energy sector, have been targeted by divestment campaigners. Already, 3M and Xerox have restricted all operations in Sudan to humanitarian work, according to Sterling, and Royal Dutch Shell is engaging with human rights groups so as not to be perceived as complicit in atrocities.

State Rushes In Where Washington Fears To Tread (FT)

By Matthew Garrahan In Los Angeles And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

From laws that led to catalytic converters being fitted to new cars in the US, to the recent passing of far-reaching climate change legislation, California has never been afraid to make ambitious policy decisions.

But the progressive politics that drive the Golden State, the world's fifth largest economy, are beginning to take on an increasingly international dimension. This has left some businesses leaders and Washington policy makers uneasy.

Arnold Schwarzenegger, California's Republican governor, followed last month's landmark bill to cut greenhouse gas emissions with another first: passing a law that prohibits the state's pension funds from investing in companies with active business in Sudan.

The bill, prompted by the killings that have sparked a humanitarian crisis in Darfur, saw Mr Schwarzenegger cross party lines to find consensus on an issue that has galvanized California's liberal population.

His efforts were hailed by voters from across the political spectrum. But the Sudan divestment law, which follows the example of several other states this year, is troubling the Bush administration, as well as business lobby groups and some senators.

DOJ_NMG_0078684

The National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), which represents big industries, is fighting the divestment campaign and has sued the state of Illinois. California is also in its sights. Bill Reinsch, its president, said there would be paralysis in foreign policy if the US did not speak with one voice.

California's action comes weeks after the US Senate blocked legislation that would have ratified divestment from the Sudan by US states.

In common with its action on climate change, California's determination to divest from Sudan signals its intent to pursue its own foreign policy agenda – with or without the explicit agreement of the federal government.

Mr Schwarzenegger followed the signing of the bill with a letter to George W. Bush this week urging the president to "confront this genocide with an equally clear and urgent national focus".

Aides to the governor said it was unlikely he would seek to curb California's independent spirit. "California is the world's fifth largest economy," said Margita Thompson, the governor's press secretary, saying the state almost "constitutes a country unto itself".

California played "a leadership role in anything it does," she added. "California has led on improving air quality and in signing the [Sudan divestment] bill, the governor has shown that Californians will stand against genocide."

Mr Schwarzenegger's relationship with state Democrats is an important factor in the boldness of his recent policy decisions. His willingness to act on causes more traditionally associated with the Democratic party – such as climate change – have won support from Democrat voters and helped him build a commanding lead over Phil Angelides, the governor's opponent in November's gubernatorial election.

Whereas President Bush has refused to commit the US to carbon limits, Mr Schwarzenegger has passed a law that will cap California's greenhouse gas emissions at 1990 levels, an effective cut of 25 per cent. The governor went so far as to chastise Mr Bush for his failure to take tougher action, saying: "California will not wait for our federal government to take strong action on global warming."

"I can imagine that California is going to ruffle feathers in Washington," says Mark Baldassare, director of research at the Public Policy Institute of California. "First of all, we have a Republican president and congress going in one direction on foreign policy. Then we have a Republican governor and a Democratic legislature [in California] going in another."

History shows that where California leads other US states and countries tend to follow. The implementation of clean air regulations in California in the mid-1970s, for example, led to a country-wide policy that saw catalytic converters fitted to all new cars, with other nations following suit.

With the new climate change legislation, Mr Schwarzenegger has already secured the support of international figures such as Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister. Britain and California have bypassed the Bush administration and agreed to work together to explore ways to fight global warming.

"It all gives Californians confidence that we are not going to be left holding the bag by ourselves," said Daniel Kammen, professor in the energy and resources group at the University of California, Berkeley. "A lot of states and countries are going to follow what California is doing."

The Murder Of Andrei Koslov (WSJ)

By Paul Volcker

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

On Sept. 14, the first deputy chairman of the Russian central bank was killed in Moscow. Andrei Koslov was a brave young man on a patriotic mission to restore a sense of integrity and confidence in Russian banking. He knew he was in danger as he attacked money laundering and other shady financial practices by strong men in government or out; his must have been a lonely effort, but he persisted. His murder is a dramatic reflection of the corrupt forces resisting governance reform in that one country. But plainly, those forces are not confined to Russia. In much of the emerging world, they undercut efforts to develop a strong competitive economy.

In that light, the murder of Andrei Koslov defines the battle lines for all of us. It's a battle that all those supporting economic development and the rule of law cannot afford to lose. And, appropriately, it is international institutions that are placed front and center in that battle.

I learned of Koslov's death as I traveled to the annual meetings of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund in Singapore, to speak at a panel on governance and corruption. My interest in the subject was sharpened by my recent experience investigating the U.N.'s Oil for Food program, which seems to me a prime example of good intentions being frustrated by failures in governance. Corruption not only limited the success of that particular program, but very real questions have been raised about the competence of the U.N. organization generally. And I would emphasize that it is difficult for any organization to maintain support and legitimacy unless it is perceived as competent.

DOJ_NMG_0078685

I think it is now generally recognized and accepted that corruption is an obstacle -- and in some countries the major obstacle -- to effective economic development. That simple fact has been increasingly recognized by the World Bank. It was the central message of my fellow panelists in Singapore who at personal risk are fighting corruption on the front lines in Africa and elsewhere.

It is fatuous to suggest that a serious attack on corruption in borrowing countries -- including in the last analysis a threat or the actuality of denying loans -- is somehow inconsistent with supporting the development goals of the World Bank. The contrary is much more likely. Failure to deal with corruption undercuts development. It will limit, and likely will more than offset, any value added in new lending.

Of course, that's easy to say. Much more difficult is what can be effectively done in combating corruption. The key to dealing with corruption is leadership -- leadership at the multilateral institutions, but also in lending countries, in borrowing countries, in private companies and in nongovernmental organizations. A consistent message really needs to come from the top. It has to infuse the culture of all the organizations concerned, public and private.

A reasonable starting point might be to take a leaf from Nancy Reagan, with her old anti-drug slogan: "Just Say No." After all, corruption is a kind of addictive drug. I know that some companies endorse and successfully enforce that approach, but I also know that isolated efforts and slogans aren't enough. Private companies, public institutions, NGOs -- all can do more by making that kind of pledge publicly and jointly. They should have a common approach toward conflicts of interest, financial reporting, ethical standards and transparency.

But still, I am not so naïve as to think that a plea for voluntary cooperation by itself is going to do the job. It seems to me entirely legitimate, with respect to individual loans, that the World Bank and other development institutions be assured that really effective independent oversight and auditing arrangements of the projects they finance are in place. That has been the intent in the past, but my sense is that the approach may need to be toughened up, especially when experience with a particular country suggests the need for stronger World Bank oversight.

I think it also implies a strong internal inspection function. This has to be thought of not as an unwanted addendum to the bank, but as an integral part of it, right up there with the lending function itself. It will be intrusive, but it is not a question of national sovereignty. These are voluntary lending programs, with a willing borrower and lender. If corruption is found, and remedial action falls short, then suspension is not only justified but mandatory. The more difficult case is when the concern is not confined to a particular loan but when the country and its government are broadly and deeply corrupted, the corruption embedded in long-standing traditions and practice. Then a different approach is initially required. Consultation and step-by-step criteria for change may be the best course.

Those are very general statements. The policies need to be made more concrete and specific. It would be very helpful if they were spelled out in program guidelines at the World Bank. And it should be done in consultation and partnership with private parties and NGOs as well as interested governments. But let me make a simple declaration: The greatest threat to development and, ultimately, to the World Bank Group itself, would be to sit back passively in the face of this challenge. To take the view that its job is simply to lend freely whenever a perception of marginal benefit seems to justify it, and without concern for entrenched corruption, will inevitably erode support for the institution and undercut the effectiveness of its work to help the world's poor have a chance for a better life.

My impression is that the corruption problem may be getting worse. Whether or not that is the case, it plainly needs priority attention. The implications go far beyond any one institution. But I know of no institution, by its leadership, by its professional staff, by its standing in the world, that is better equipped to take on that challenge than the World Bank.

Mr. Volcker was chairman of the Federal Reserve from 1979-1987.

Good News From Northern Ireland (NYT)

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

The transformation of militant Irish Republicanism from terrorism to democratic politics over the past decade has been little short of remarkable — a welcome success story in troubled times.

This week's highly positive report by an official monitoring commission confirmed the good news. It declared that the Irish Republican Army has fully renounced terrorism, dissociated itself from organized criminal activity and committed itself to following an exclusively political path, the very steps its critics have demanded for years.

That calls for a similarly remarkable response from the harshest of those critics, the Democratic Unionist Party led by the Rev. Ian Paisley.

It is time for the D.U.P. to acknowledge that the conditions it has long set out for entering into a power-sharing government with the I.R.A.'s political arm, Sinn Fein, have been achieved. If that happens within the next month or so, Northern Ireland can complete its transformation from sectarian terror to democratic self-government.

DOJ_NMG_0078686

Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, and his Irish counterpart, Bertie Ahern, have set a Nov. 24 deadline for Northern Ireland's parties to agree on a new power-sharing government. If they fail to do so, Britain will cease its efforts to revive power-sharing and will rule the province from London.

The I.R.A.'s gradual shift from violence to politics was a matter of hardheaded calculation about what could and could not succeed. Even before 9/11, terrorism had become repellent to Northern Ireland's people and a blight on their neighborhoods and economic prospects. Those circumstances made it possible to coax Sinn Fein into a purely peaceful, electoral role.

An impressive array of political leaders — Irish, British, Roman Catholic and Protestant — have helped Northern Ireland get this far. These include Mr. Blair and Mr. Ahern, who did much of the coaxing, and Gerry Adams, the Sinn Fein leader, who persuaded the I.R.A. to give up its arms, its terror and its organized criminal activities.

The Rev. Paisley now needs to join these other leaders in completing the job. With the threat of renewed I.R.A. terror at last put to rest, Northern Ireland should be moving forward toward a self-governing future.

DOJ_NMG_0078687

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, October 11, 2006 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, October 11, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061011.pdf; agnb061011.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Albany Mosque Leaders Convicted Of Terrorism-Related Charges....3
FBI Still Has Few Arabic-Speaking Agents....4
NYTimes Says Navy Killed Lawyer's Career Following Hamdan Case....4

Homeland Response:

Tariq Ramadan Said To Have Chance Of Obtaining US Visa....4
Congress Sets Six-Month Deadline For DHS To Fix Watch Lists....4
State Farm Alleged To Have Wrongfully Denied Katrina-Related Claims....5

War News:

Dozens Of Bodies Turn Up In Baghdad As Violence Continues....5
Study Estimates 600,000 Iraqis Killed Since 2003....6
Five US Servicemen Killed In Iraq....7
Troops Often Need Iraqi Approval To Act....7
DNA Confirms Identity Of Dead Al Qaeda Militant....7
Snowe Seeks Policy Change On Iraq....7
Kurds Build Airport....7
Military Meets Recruiting Goals....7
Data Suggest Vast Disability Claims Lie Ahead....8
Schoomaker Says US Needs Consensus Against Terrorism....8

Corporate Scandals:

Bed Bath & Beyond Admits To Backdating Stock Options....8
Two Former Comverse Officials In Plea Talks With US....9
Skilling Wants Enron Conviction Overturned....9
Third Trial Begins For Cendant's Forbes....10
Buffett Warns Berkshire Managers Against Unethical Behavior....10
Dunn Defends Her Actions As H-P Chairman....10
Judge Orders Conrad Black Not To Sell Wife's Diamond Ring....11

Criminal Law:

President Holds School Safety Conference....11
911 Transcripts Released From Amish School Shooting....16
FBI Interviews Page Who Received Messages From Foley....16
Hastert Pledges To Fire Any Aides Involved In Foley "Cover Up."....17
Kolbe Clarifies His Knowledge Of Foley E-Mails....18
Records Suggest Abramoff Had Lobbying Contacts With Pombo....19
Judge Orders DOJ To Respond To Siegelman Evidence Preservation Order....19
DOJ Seeks Death Penalty In Puerto Rico Murder Case....20
High Court Considers Viability Of Flawed Indictments....20
Attorney For Suspect In Killing Of Washington Federal Prosecutor Declares Innocence....20
FBI Investigating Specter Aide Over Pentagon Contract To Lobbyist Husband....21
Ney To Appear In Court Friday....21
Malvo Pleads Guilty To Six Counts Of First Degree Murder....21
Judge Delays Wecht Trial Until 3rd Circuit Rules On FBI Records....22
California City Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Corruption Charges....22
Philadelphia Architect Sentenced To Probation For Illegal Contributions....22
Immunized Computer Technician Helped FBI Access Fumo Emails....22
Missouri Federal Prosecutors Begin Child-Porn Crackdown 23
Former California TV Reporter Charged In Alleged Child Sex Abuse Case....23
Aviation Experts Debate Whether Criminal Charges Should Follow Jet Crashes....23

Prosecutor Drops Assault Charge Against Maryland State Senate President 23
Missouri Nursing Home Operator Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud 24
Federal Officials Eye Woman's Property In Prostitution Case 24
DC Mosque Accuses Financial Manager Of Embezzlement 24
Chicago Police Question Suspect In Triple Homicide 24
Three Year Old Girl's Alleged Shooter Captured 24
Liquor Store Owner Fears Reprisals After Tracking Down Gang Members Who Robbed His Store 24
Three Men Charged In Robbery Murder 25

Civil Law:

Oracle Settles GSA Contract Fraud Charges With DOJ For $98.5 Million 25
High Court Finds For Small Tobacco Firms 26
Plame Parts Ways With Lawyer In Civil Suit 26
US Challenges AIDS Funding Ruling 26

Civil Rights:

DOJ Charges Black Political Leader In Mississippi With Suppressing White Vote 27
Parties Agree To Stop Crossover Voting In South Carolina Primaries 27
Report Finds Little Evidence Of Polling Place Fraud 27
SCOTUS Rejects Gay Marriage, Abortion Cases 28
Marcus Concerned Over Popularity Of South Dakota Abortion Ban 28
Real Estate Brokerage Accused Of Discriminatory Sales Practices 28
NYTimes Celebrates US Diversity 28

Antitrust:

DOJ Expected To Approve AT&T-BellSouth Merger 28
Investor Claims Microsoft Helped Utah Firm Finance Linux Litigation 29
DOJ Launches Antitrust Probe Of Private Equity Firms 29
Judge Delivers Split Ruling In Qualcomm-Broadcom Dispute 30
SCOTUS Considers Case Pitting Telecoms Against Pay-Phone Providers 31
Sprint Nextel Losing Ground Since Last Year's Merger 31
Texas Pacific Group, AXA To Buy 60% Stake In TDF 31
Google To Pay $1.65 Billion For YouTube 31

Environment:

Lettuce Tests Negative For E. Coli Bacteria 32
Federal Court Rulings Hinder Administration's Federal Land Development Strategy 32
EPA Says Texas Copper Plant Illegally Burned Hazardous Waste 33
Ultralow-Sulfur Diesel Fuel To Debut In US Market 33
Environmentalist Faces Charges For Destroying Invasive Plant 33
Supreme Court Upholds Ruling Requiring W.R. Grace To Pay For Asbestos Cleanup 33
Congress, Bush Move To Cleanup Pacific "Garbage Patch." 34

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Six Indicted In Missouri Cocaine Trafficking Ring 34
Baltimore Company's Online Painkiller Sales Lead To Arrests 34
Georgia Man Seeks To Return Home Before Drug-Trafficking Trial Begins 35
Man Gets Stuck In Tunnel Trying To Enter US From Mexico 35
Arizona Couple Facing Federal Drug Charges Relinquishes Church Leadership 35
FARC Member's Trial To Begin In DC 35
US Cracks Down On Illegal Guns In New Orleans 35
West Virginia Attorney Sentenced To Six Months For Gun Violations 36
Washington Gang Sweep Nets 40 Arrests 36

Immigration:

High Court Refuses To Hear Deportation Appeal Of Former Nazi Guard 36
Groups Seek Freedom For Immigrant Detainees In California 37
Bush Seen As Avoiding Immigration Issue On Campaign Trail 37

Tax:

Many US Expatriates Face Tax Increase This Year 38
Minister Fights To Preserve Religious-Based Tax Breaks 38

Congress-Administration:

Bush Warns Democrats Would Raise Taxes 39
In Fiscal 2006, Medicaid Saw Smallest Spending Boost In A Decade 40
DOE Says Most Home Heating Costs Will Drop This Winter . 40
Administration's Effort To End Homelessness Said to Neglect Rural Areas 40
Defense Contractors Consider Murtha As Majority Leader 40
DeMint Expected To Head GOP Steering Committee 41

DOJ_NMG_0078690

FAA Administrator Seeks To Strengthen Agency's Public Profile....41
Stalled Postal Reform Bill Examined....41
NYTimes Urges High Court To Uphold Ruling On Courtroom Photos....41
WPost Calls For Increasing Federal Funding For Education 41

Other News:

Mortgage Debt Said To Color Voters' Perceptions Of The Economy....42
Exposure Of Foley's Internet Contact With Pages Included Effort By Democrats....43
Rove's Fundraising For GOP Candidates Seen As Unprecedented....44
Democrats Hope To Take Advantage Of Dissatisfaction With Iraq War....44
Democrats Said To Need Support Of Rural Red State Voters To Flip Senate....44
Many Democratic Candidates Taking Conservative Positions....45
527 Groups Expected To Spend Over $300 Million On Midterm Election Ads....45
Belated Agreements Over Turnout Plan Funding Could Make Difference For Democrats....45
DSCC Launches $1 Million Ad Campaign For Webb....46
Ford, Corker Seek To Seek To Establish Independent Credentials....47
Poll Shows Lieberman Leading Lamont 48%-40%....47
Trial Lawyer Pledges $5 Million To Jump Start Bell Bid For Texas Governor....47
Poll Show Crist With Ten Point Lead In Florida Governor's Race....47
Taylor Benefited From Earmarks For District....48
Rural Areas Benefit From More Charitable Giving....48
Stark Says Private Sector Not More Efficient Than Medicare On Prescription Drugs....48
As China Signals Support For Sanctions, Rice Says US Not Planning To Attack North Korea....48
McCain Says Clinton Policies Set Stage For Current North Korean Situation....53
Officials From Six Nations To Discuss Possible Sanctions On Iran....55
Olmert Dismisses Syrian Peace Overtures....55
Hamas Rejects Conditions For Unity Government....55
Bush Tells Peru's Garcia He Will Press For Trade Pact Approval....55
Federal Taskforce To Pursue Cuba Sanctions Violators....56
Top Treasury Aide On China Quits....56
Libya Makes Deal With Nonprofit To Supply Its Schoolchildren With Laptops....56
Washington Gathering Pushes For Action On Uganda....56
Europe's "Centrists" Growing Concerned Over Islam....57
TV Producer Calls For Understanding Arab Side Of Issues....57
Arab, Muslim Activists Call On US To Support Arab Democracy....57
NYTimes Urges US To Support Ban's Proposed UN Reforms....57
WSJournal Urges Costa Rica To Implement Flat Tax....58

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages....58

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington....59

TERRORISM NEWS:

Albany Mosque Leaders Convicted Of Terrorism-Related Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/11, Virtanen) reports, "Two mosque leaders arrested in a terrorism-related sting were convicted Tuesday of federal money laundering charges. Yassin Aref, imam at the Masjid as-Salam mosque in Albany, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and a founder of the mosque, were never accused of being terrorists, but prosecutors said they laundered money in 2003-04 for an FBI informant." The AP notes, "Hossain was convicted on all 27 charges against him, including three counts of conspiracy. The jury…found Aref guilty of 10 of the 30 charges against him. … 'Obviously we had a couple of individuals that were prone to supporting terrorism,' U.S. Attorney Glenn Suddaby said after the verdict. 'The FBI did what they had to do.'"

The Albany Times Union (10/11, Lyons, 103K) notes, "Jurors on Friday asked to watch an FBI surveillance videotape of a key meeting between an undercover informant and Aref. At the meeting, which took place in January 2004, about six months after the sting began, the two men discussed the informant's plan to 'legalize' money that he was loaning to Hossain." Capital News 9 Albany (10/10, Ferrence) reported US Attorney Bill Pericak said, "This is a world where when we have suspicions about people, we have a choice. Do we do something or do we wait until something happens?" Pericak added that "the government sting operation nabbed two men who could have walked away from the FBI informant who pretended to be a missile dealer to a terrorist organization. But they didn't."

DOJ_NMG_0078691

The New York Times (10/11, Wilson, 1.21M) reports, "A lawyer for Mr. Hossain, Kevin A. Luibrand, said that the defendants would appeal, and that the entrapment theory would again be raised. 'Before the government arrived on the scene, they were not committing any crimes and were not thinking about committing any crimes,' he said. The men are to be sentenced on Feb. 12. The lengths of their sentences were unknown Tuesday, with Mr. Luibrand estimating 20 years in prison for Mr. Hossain, who was convicted of more crimes than Mr. Aref."

FBI Still Has Few Arabic-Speaking Agents. Under the headline "FBI Agents Still Lacking Arabic Skills," the Washington Post (10/11, Eggen, 748K) reports in a front-page story that five years after 9/11, "only 33 FBI agents have even a limited proficiency in Arabic, and none of them work in the sections of the bureau that coordinate investigations of international terrorism, according to new FBI statistics. … The same challenge is facing the CIA and other agencies as the government competes with the private sector for a limited number of applicants with foreign-language proficiency, according to U.S. officials and experts." Georgetown associate professor Daniel Byman "said the FBI's continuing failure to attract Arabic-speaking agents is 'a serious problem' that hurts the bureau's relations with immigrant communities and makes it more difficult to gather intelligence on extremist groups." However, "Margaret Gulotta, chief of the FBI's language services section, said in an interview that the bureau has made significant progress since 9/11 in increasing the number of translators who speak Arabic and other foreign languages."

NYTimes Says Navy Killed Lawyer's Career Following Hamdan Case. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M) editorializes that Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift's "integrity helped spark" the debate over prisoner treatment at Guantánamo Bay when he refused "to represent Salim Hamdan, a Yemeni citizen accused of being a high-ranking member of Al Qaeda — for the sole purpose of getting him to plead guilty before one of the military commissions that President Bush created for Guantánamo Bay." Instead, Swift "did his duty and defended his client," only to see the Navy respond "by killing his military career. About two weeks after the historic high court victory in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Commander Swift was told he was being denied a promotion. Under the Navy's up-or-out system, that spelled the end of his 20-year career, and Commander Swift said last week that he will be retiring in March or April." The Times says the Navy's actions send a "chilling message…to remaining military lawyers about the potential consequences of taking their job, and justice, seriously."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Tariq Ramadan Said To Have Chance Of Obtaining US Visa. Rachel Ehrenfeld, director of the American Center for Democracy and Alyssa A. Lappen, a senior fellow at the American Center for Democracy, in an op-ed for the Washington Times (10/11, Ehrenfeld, Lappen, 88K) write, "Tariq Ramadan's latest attempt to legally obtain a visa to the United States was denied on Sept. 24.," on the grounds that his actions "constituted providing material support to a terrorist organization," according to State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus. Ramadan contends that his contributions to "the French-based Hamas front 'Committee for Palestinian Charity and Aid'" were made before it was listed as a terrorist organization and says that "his funding of Hamas was just an excuse. The 'Bush administration has barred me for a much simpler reason: It doesn't care for my political views.'" However, Ehrenfeld and Lappen write that Ramadan enjoys growing "popularity among the Europeans," and say he should not be counted "out, yet. The American Civil Liberties Union, which filled several lawsuits on his behalf, condemned the State Department's decision, and said, 'it was considering an appeal.' Stay tuned."

Congress Sets Six-Month Deadline For DHS To Fix Watch Lists. Government Executive/CongressDaily (10/10, Strohm) reported, "With frustration levels apparently reaching an all-time high, lawmakers have given the Homeland Security Department a hard deadline to revamp its process for clearing individuals who have been wrongly put on terrorist watch lists. The fiscal

DOJ_NMG_0078692

2007 Homeland Security appropriations bill…requires the department within six months to 'establish revised procedures for expeditiously clearing individuals whose names have been mistakenly placed on a terrorist database list or who have names identical or similar to individuals on a terrorist database list.'" CongressDaily noted, "The FBI's Terrorist Screening Center is responsible for managing and consolidating all government watch lists. The FBI and TSA both issued statements in the last two days defending watch lists as valuable counterterrorism tools and clarifying current redress procedures."

State Farm Alleged To Have Wrongfully Denied Katrina-Related Claims. The National Law Journal (10/11, Geier) reports, "Allegations by whistleblowers and plaintiffs lawyers that State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. used a 'one-size-fits-all' engineering report to deny policyholders' Katrina-related claims are stirring up Mississippi's southern federal district." The Journal continues, "State and federal prosecutors and grand jurors are looking into allegations that insurance claims were denied on the basis of a biased engineering report. The allegations were brought to light by two claims adjusters who had worked for an Alabama risk management firm under contract with Bloomington, Ill.-based State Farm." The Journal adds, "Richard T. 'Flip' Phillips of Smith, Phillips, Mitchell, Scott & Nowak of Batesville, Miss., an attorney representing Judy M. Guice in a mass tort on behalf of Mississippi homeowners who lost their homes, alleges that State Farm's tactics reveal 'a calculated strategy of wrongful claims denial.' Guice v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., No. 06-cv-1 (S.D. Miss.). … 'If they're allowed to do this, the lesson the insurance industry will have learned is that in mass catastrophe situations, a calculated course of across-the-board, wrongful claims denial and trying one case at a time pays,' Phillips said. … State Farm spokesman Phil Supple said that the company has been resolving claims fairly and is cooperating with state and federal probes into its activities." The Journal notes, "Underlying the litigation is the issue of whether the damage to policyholders' homes was caused by Katrina's high winds, which most policies cover, or by the storm surge and high waters, against which many policyholders were not insured. The southern district of Mississippi so far has denied class certification on the ground that each case involves its own set of circumstances as to the percentage of wind to water damage. … But the plaintiffs allege that State Farm used a 'generic engineering report ... which concluded that all of the hurricane damage to property on the Mississippi Gulf Coast was caused by storm surge and not by hurricane wind,' in essence to deny all of their claims, according to an amended complaint filed in McFarland v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., No. 06-466 (S.D. Miss.)."

WAR NEWS:

Dozens Of Bodies Turn Up In Baghdad As Violence Continues. The New York Times (10/11, Luo, 1.21M) reports in a bleak article, "Dozens of bodies turned up in Baghdad and a series of bombs killed at least 17 people on Tuesday, indicating that the sectarian violence in the capital showed little sign of easing, despite efforts by the American military and its Iraqi counterparts to quell it. At least 50 bodies, riddled with bullets and many bearing signs of torture, were discovered across Baghdad."

The Iraqi immigration minister "said more than 300,000 Iraqis have fled their homes [while remaining in Iraq] since the American-led invasion in 2003, The Associated Press reported. Half of them left after the February bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra set off cascades of sectarian violence. He estimated that about 890,000 Iraqis have moved to Jordan, Iran and Syria since 2003."

USA Today (10/11, 2.27M) reports, "A bomb blew up Tuesday outside a bakery in a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad, killing 11 people who had been waiting in line. In addition, police told the Associated Press they had discovered the mutilated bodies of 60 men in different parts of Baghdad over the 24-hour period ending Tuesday morning."

The AP (10/11, Al-Bashir) reports the bombing and observes that the "Iraqi government put forward a new idea to help stop sectarian violence: ensuring security checkpoints in the capital have an equal number of Shiite and Sunni troops." The AP also reports the ammunition fire on the US military base.

All three networks reported the ammunition dump explosion. ABC World News (10/10, story 5, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Still overseas tonight, several spectacular explosions have rocked a small US military base in southern Baghdad. An ammunitions storage area caught fire, possibly as the result of mortar fire. The blaze set off stores of ammunition and ordnance. There were no reports of injuries. Also in Baghdad, the bodies of 110 men have been found bumped across the city just since yesterday morning. Most of them had been bound, shot and tortured. Sectarian death squads are suspected."

DOJ_NMG_0078693

CBS Evening News (10/10, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported it as an insurgent attack, saying, "Overseas tonight a US military base in Baghdad came under attack. An ammunition dump was hit, setting off huge explosions. The blast continued for hours, and the flames could be seen for miles. No injuries were reported, and it's not known who is responsible."

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 3, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We turn to Iraq, where there have been explosions in Baghdad tonight. A series of them on the outskirts of that city felt across a wide area." NBC (Engel) added, "These explosions at a forward operating base in south Baghdad, an ammunition depot caught fire, the US military is still not saying exactly why but thousands of tank, shells and artillery rounds were exploding into the night sky. Witnesses in the area said the base had been attacked by mortar rounds for about 20 minutes before this fire began. After the explosions erupted, the base was put on a state of high alert. Soldiers were ordered into bunkers. The fire brigade on the base was able to contain it and according to the US military, there were no casualties." Williams: "Another topic in Iraq, I know we'll have more reporting on it tomorrow night, but something in the news lately, this exodus of Iraqis out of that country. How big are the numbers?" Engel: "The numbers are staggering according to Iraq's minister of migration. Some of it happening in this area where the base was attacked, apparently this evening. According to the minister, the ethnic tension that has been on the rise in this country has caused about 300,000 Iraqis to flee their homes. These are internally displaced people. Shi'ites forced out of Sunni neighborhoods, Sunnis forced to leave Shi'ite areas. They call it ethnic cleansing and almost one million Iraqis have left the country all together, moving to neighboring countries. Right after the fall of Saddam, people here started to save their money. Some Iraqis, doctors and professionals, left the country looking for work. Now people are saving their money just so they can leave. Anyone who can get $1,000 together is trying to get themselves to Syria, Jordan or Iran."

The AP (10/11, Keath) reports, "A fire broke out at an ammunition depot at a U.S. base in southern Baghdad on Tuesday night, setting off a series of explosions from detonating tank and artillery shells that shook buildings miles away. ... It was not clear whether the depot at Forward Operating Base Falcon was hit by an attack." The base "is near the violence-torn district of Dora, where U.S. troops have been focusing in a 2-month-old sweep of the capital neighborhood-by-neighborhood aimed at rooting out militants and weapons."

The McClatchy Newspapers (10/11, Price) also reports the fire, noting, "An insurgent group called Al Fataheen Army took credit for the damage in a posting on an Islamic forum used by various insurgent groups in Iraq. The group said it had attacked the base with several missiles at 11:55 p.m., but that timing cast suspicion on the claim. The explosions, which could be felt throughout the city, had begun about an hour earlier."

AFP (10/10) reports, "The damage appeared to have been contained within the base, the US spokesman said, although Iraqi officials said that shells 'cooking off' in the fire had crashed down in five districts in the south of the city."

US Forces' Efforts Clean Up Violent Neighborhood Examined. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "The Amariya neighborhood has won a reputation as the most fearsome quarter of the capital, with car bombs, snipers and frequent clashes between U.S. forces and hardened Sunni Arab fighters. But over the last few weeks, U.S. officials and Iraqi residents say, life has improved markedly in the notorious district, thanks to an American-led effort to improve security and services." However, Lt. Col. Gian Gentile of the 4th ID "acknowledged in an interview that he had to move troops from nearby neighborhoods under his command to bolster security in Amariya, risking rising peril in those districts. He has also had to close off the western Baghdad neighborhood at all but two gateways ... And he has watched helplessly as the district's Shiite Muslim population has plummeted." Gentile "made strenuous efforts to build goodwill. Drawing lessons from previous commanders, he softened his tactical approach."

Study Estimates 600,000 Iraqis Killed Since 2003. USA Today (10/11, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "More than 600,000 Iraqis have died by violence since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to a study released today by researchers at Johns Hopkins University. The figure is based on surveys of households throughout most of the country. It vastly exceeds estimates cited by the Iraqi government, the United Nations, aid and anti-war groups, and President Bush." The study "estimates that 2.5% of the Iraqi population has died as a result of the conflict." The Pentagon and NSC "immediately challenged" the study.

DOJ_NMG_0078694

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A4, King, 2.03M) also reports the study, writing, "The findings are sure to draw fire from skeptics and could color the debate over the war ahead of congressional elections next month." Lead researcher Gilbert Burnham said, "What our data show is that the level of violence is going on throughout the country."

The New York Times (10/11, Tavernise, McNeil, 1.21M) reports in an article that quotes skeptics, "The figure breaks down to about 15,000 violent deaths a month, a number that is quadruple the one for July given by Iraqi government hospitals and the morgue in Baghdad and published last month in a United Nations report in Iraq. ... But it is an estimate and not a precise count, and researchers acknowledged a margin of error that ranged from 426,369 to 793,663 deaths." The findings of the 2004 predecessor study had been "criticized as high, in part because of its relatively narrow sampling of about 1,000 families, and because it carried a large margin of error." Academics Robert Blendon and Donald Berry expressed their misgivings about the current study's sample size and "inappropriate" "tone of accuracy."

The Washington Post (10/11, A12, Brown, 748K) reports that the findings will be "equally" as controversial as those of the 2004 predecessor study. Academic Ronald Waldman and Human Rights Watch official Sarah Leah Whitson are quoted giving credence to the study.

Five US Servicemen Killed In Iraq. The AP (10/10) reports the deaths of three Marines and two soldiers in a brief, factual article: "Three U.S. Marines and two soldiers were killed in fighting in Iraq, the U.S. command said Wednesday. The Marines, assigned to 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, died Monday from enemy action in Iraq's western Anbar province, the military said in a statement. It did not provide further details. Also Monday, a U.S. soldier was killed when his patrol was attacked by insurgents in an eastern part of Baghdad, the military said. The second soldier, attached to the 25th Combat Aviation Brigade, died of wounds from an explosion during a vehicle patrol Sunday north of the city of Tikrit."

Troops Often Need Iraqi Approval To Act. USA Today (10/11, Jervis, 2.27M) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi military forces battling militias in Baghdad often must seek permission from Iraq's government before launching even routine missions, complicating efforts to loosen the grip of religious violence in the capital. ... Tackling militias is a sensitive matter for Iraq's Shiite-dominated government. ... The political considerations have complicated matters for troops operating in Baghdad. ... some officers think a direct confrontation with the Mahdi Army may be inevitable."

DNA Confirms Identity Of Dead Al Qaeda Militant. The AP (10/10, Rising) reports, "DNA tests have confirmed that a man shot to death by British forces was a leading al-Qaida militant who embarrassed the U.S. military by making an unprecedented escape from a maximum-security military prison in Afghanistan, the U.S. command said Tuesday. Omar al-Farouq was shot and killed Sept. 25."

Snowe Seeks Policy Change On Iraq. The AP (10/11, Flaherty) reports, "Sen. Olympia Snowe joined a growing list of Republicans calling for a change of course in Iraq, a position that could undermine President Bush's election-year assertion that the nation shouldn't set a timetable for troops to come home. Snowe, a moderate who often bucks the Republican Party line, said in a statement Tuesday more should be done to pressure the Iraqis to take control of their country and make clear U.S. support is not unlimited." Her remarks "echoed" earlier ones by Sen. John Warner. Other Republicans voicing disappointment are "Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, along with Reps. Christopher Shays of Connecticut and Walter Jones of North Carolina." The AP adds, "As the Nov. 7 elections inch closer, more and more Republicans have grown louder in expressing their opposition to the White House's handling of the war."

Kurds Build Airport. The Washington Post (10/11, A17, 748K) reports, "The Kurds are building a new $300 million airport in Irbil that will take the biggest aircraft in the world, including the Russian Antonov 225 cargo plane and the American C-5 Galaxy ... The Kurds are hoping their dramatic mountain region, the one tranquil part of Iraq, will become a tourist haven as well as a transit refueling stop for international carriers between Europe and Asia or Australia." They also hope the facility becomes "a backup landing strip for NASA shuttles for emergency landings."

Military Meets Recruiting Goals. ABC World News (10/10, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And the Pentagon, today, said all four military branches have met recruiting goals this year, one year after the Army missed its mark by a wide margin. The Army topped its goal of 80,000 active duty recruits by 635, while the Navy, Marines and Air Force made their goals, as well. The Army offered cash bonuses, raised age limits and lowered test standards to help boost its numbers."

DOJ_NMG_0078695

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (10/11) editorializes, "Critics of the Iraq war often slam the Bush Administration for sending unwitting American soldiers off to an unwinnable battle. ... The Pentagon announced yesterday that in fiscal 2006 the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines all met or exceeded active-duty recruitment goals. ... Many of those young people, despite the luxury of choice, have decided to ship off to boot camp and join the world's finest all-volunteer military force. It'd be nice if a few more politicians and pundits respected their decision."

Data Suggest Vast Disability Claims Lie Ahead. The New York Times (10/11, Shane, 1.21M) reports, "Nearly one in five soldiers leaving the military after serving in Iraq and Afghanistan has been at least partly disabled as a result of service, according to documents of the Department of Veterans Affairs obtained by a Washington research group. The number of veterans granted disability compensation, more than 100,000 to date, suggests that taxpayers have only begun to pay the long-term financial cost of the two conflicts. ... [Veterans' advocate Paul Sullivan] said that if the current proportions held up over time, 400,000 returning service members could eventually apply for disability benefits when they retired."

Fallen Troops Remembered. Both the New York Times (10/11, Applebome, 1.21M) and Washington Post (10/11, A1, Morse, 748K) report on the grief felt by survivors of fallen troops. The New York Times (10/11, Applebome, 1.21M) writes that the town of Highland, N.Y., with a population of 10,000, has lost three servicemen in Iraq: "When Pfc. Michael K. Oremus — 'Mikey O' to his friends — was killed by a sniper bullet in Baghdad on Oct. 2, the numbers lost all meaning, washed away by tears ... Death is more tornado than hurricane, picking its spots with capricious malice, but a third soldier gone, Mikey O, in this close-knit throwback of a town, Grover's Corners on the Hudson, seemed particularly beyond grief, beyond pain, beyond knowing." The Times writes, "The funeral for Mikey O, dead at 21, could be the biggest in town history."

The Washington Post (10/11, A1, Morse, 748K) reports on the mother of Marine Sgt. Alex Carbonaro, an only child who died from wounds caused by a roadside bomb and "remains the only service member listed from Bethesda killed in Iraq or Afghanistan." The 2,628-word front page article describes his childhood and service in Iraq, as well as Marines' consolation of Mrs. Carbonaro after his death.

Schoomaker Says US Needs Consensus Against Terrorism. McClatchy (10/11, Brown) reports, "The United States needs to reach a consensus on how to fight terrorists and increase defense spending to make sure the Army stays ready to fight, the Army's chief of staff said Tuesday. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker also called on teachers, parents and other influential adults to encourage young people to serve in the military." He did not "give specific figures about the amount of defense-spending increases he thought was necessary. He said the Army had learned a 'bitter lesson' during the 1990s when 425,000 soldiers were cut from its ranks and expenditures fell to levels unseen since the late 1940s."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bed Bath & Beyond Admits To Backdating Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C4, Maremont) reports, "Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. admitted to rampant backdating of stock-option grants as part of a policy to provide extra incentives to insiders, but said an internal probe found no evidence of 'willful misconduct.' … Bed Bath & Beyond said its internal probe examining the period from its 1992 initial public offering through May 2006 found that the company had misdated options on 44 occasions, 37 of them in favor of the recipients. In many cases, the probe concluded, executives used 'hindsight' to select favorable grant dates in the past when the stock was trading at low points." The Journal adds, "The company said it doesn't intend to restate past financials to record the extra compensation expense associated with the backdated options. Instead, it said it will cut $66 million from the equity portion of its balance sheet, and expects to record another $8 million in expense in its fiscal third quarter."

The AP (10/11) reports, "The review committee found 31 off-cycle monthly grant dates not made on the 15th of the month as required by the company's policies, and 12 of them were 'at notable low prices.' Interviews and the documentation reviewed did not explain the selection of the dates, the company said. … 'The low prices were suggestive of the use of some hindsight in selecting the low price off-cycle grant dates,' according to the filing. However, the committee found no willful misconduct and no intent to mislead auditors. … At least 136 companies have disclosed internal, SEC or Justice Department investigations into the possible backdating of past stock options to artificially inflate their value."

DOJ_NMG_0078696

Two Former Comverse Officials In Plea Talks With US. The Houston Chronicle/Dow Jones Newswires (10/11, Bray) reports, "Two former executives of Comverse Technology Inc. are engaged in plea discussions with the U.S. Justice Department to end the criminal fraud case against them, according to court documents filed late last week." Dow Jones continues, "In separate orders filed late Friday, U.S. Magistrate Judge Joan M. Azrack ordered that the time to indict former Comverse finance chief David Kreinberg and ex-senior general counsel William F. Sorin be extended by 30 days to Nov. 8." Dow Jones adds, "According to court documents, Sorin and Kreinberg are engaged in plea negotiations with the U.S. Attorney's office in Brooklyn, which 'they believe are likely to result in a disposition of this case without trial.' … Kreinberg and Sorin were charged, along with ex-Comverse Chief Executive Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud in August in an alleged scheme to improperly backdate options at the company. The men were charged at the time under a criminal complaint. … Alexander, who was arrested in the African nation Namibia last month, has since been indicted on charges of conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, mail fraud, wire fraud, money laundering and engaging in unlawful monetary transactions. Alexander was granted bail at a hearing last week in Namibia. … The SEC also has separately filed civil charges against the men."

Brooklyn, Manhattan Federal Prosecutors Spar Over White-Collar Cases. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C1, Davies, Lattman) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Manhattan aren't used to being upstaged. But if Kobi Alexander, the fugitive executive arrested last month in Namibia, makes it stateside to answer stock-option-backdating charges, he will do so across the East River, in a different borough of New York City: Brooklyn." The Journal continues, "Ownership of the case -- involving Comverse Technology Inc., which Mr. Alexander co-founded -- is the latest in a string of white-collar cases overseen by the Justice Department's U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn. Known as the Eastern District of New York, its prosecutors lately have gained ground in a friendly, but sometimes-pointed, rivalry with their Southern District counterparts in the borough of Manhattan, who have stumbled recently on a few big cases." The Journal adds, "That rivalry between prosecutors in two of the country's 93 judicial districts is playing out amid a broader competition for business cases that has intensified nationwide since the dot-com collapse. Led by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, and Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, state and local prosecutors also have jockeyed for prominence, sometimes stepping on the toes of regulators, especially at the Securities and Exchange Commission, which has authority to bring only civil cases. … In the criminal realm, the Manhattan U.S. attorney's office is the 'old established group that considers itself the best,' says Alan Vinegrad, a former Brooklyn U.S. attorney. But now the scrappy underdog is 'on the map.' … Unwilling to concede much, Steve Peikin, former head of the Manhattan office's securities unit, quips that Brooklyn is a 'great second.'"

Skilling Wants Enron Conviction Overturned. Bloomberg News (10/11, News) reports, "Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, found guilty in May of directing a huge fraud, asked a judge to throw out his conviction, citing a successful appeal in another Enron case." Bloomberg continues, "In a filing yesterday in federal court in Houston, Mr. Skilling, 52, joined other convicted Enron executives in asking a trial judge to void his guilty verdict, based on an August ruling by a federal appeals court in New Orleans. Mr. Skilling's request came as part of a motion to remain free pending an appeal he said he planned to file after his sentencing, scheduled for Oct. 23." Bloomberg adds, "Mr. Skilling told Judge Simeon T. Lake III of the United States District Court that his conviction should be thrown out because the jury might have relied on a prosecution claim that he deprived the company of "honest services," a theory that caused the New Orleans court to overturn four other Enron-related convictions in August. … Mr. Skilling, convicted of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, faces a sentence of as much as 25 years in prison. Prosecutors gave jurors several situations under which they could find him guilty of defrauding Enron, which collapsed into bankruptcy in December 2001. Having deprived the company of his honest services was one. Deliberately deceiving investors was another. … Since the jury did not explain how it reached its guilty verdict, the fraud and conspiracy convictions were tainted by the possibility that 'honest services' played a part. Mr. Skilling argued that his entire conviction should be thrown out, using the logic the appeals court followed in August. … The government will respond to Mr. Skilling's motion 'in an appropriate court filing,' a Justice Department spokeswoman, Jaclyn Lesch, said."

DOJ_NMG_0078697

Third Trial Begins For Cendant's Forbes. The third trial of former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes began yesterday with prosecutors accusing Forbes of masterminding an accounting fraud which inflated Cendant's earnings by $252 million. USA Today (10/11, Farrell) reports that "the government argued that Forbes, 63, founder of Comp-U-Card International, used CUC's merger-and-acquisition reserves as a slush fund through which his underlings padded the company's earnings." USA adds, "The government has already put Forbes on trial twice for his alleged actions. In a trial that began two years ago, a jury convicted Forbes' right-hand man, E. Kirk Shelton, of securities fraud, but it deadlocked on the question of Forbes' involvement. Shelton received a 10-year prison sentence. In a retrial of Forbes last year, a different jury also reached an impasse."

Buffett Warns Berkshire Managers Against Unethical Behavior. The Washington Post/AP (10/11, D2, Ross) reports in a letter to managers of his company, Berkshire Hathaway, Inc., Warren Buffett warned against unethical business practices, saying the excuse "everybody else is doing it" is no justification. Buffett "cautioned managers that many corporate scandals arise because questionable activity is accepted as normal behavior. … Buffett acknowledged that it is inevitable that someone among Berkshire Hathaway's almost 200,000 workers would give in to temptation. He called on his top executives to resist improper behavior and head it off in employees. 'Berkshire's reputation is in your hands,' Buffett wrote."

Dunn Defends Her Actions As H-P Chairman. Former Hewlett-Packard chairman Patricia Dunn writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14), "When I agreed to accept the position of non-executive chairman of the Hewlett-Packard board during the tumultuous period surrounding Carly Fiorina's departure, I knew there would be challenging and difficult times ahead…. One of the first requests I received from my fellow directors was to find a way to stop leaks of confidential information emanating from our boardroom. … As I testified before Congress, the first thing I did after being directed by the majority of the board to find and stop the leaks was to approach one of my fellow directors… to ask him how I should proceed. I said I wanted to make sure that everything done was not only legal and proper, but in the H-P way." Dunn adds, "As a result of extraordinary negative publicity from these episodes, the board asked me to step down as chairman and director. Less than two weeks later I was charged by the California attorney general on four felony counts of fraud and conspiracy. Some have said they feel I have been made a scapegoat. That is not for me to say. What I will say is that throughout the process I asked the right questions of the right people at the right times. I have no reason to believe that the people who continually assured me that what was being done was being done both legally and properly did not believe this to be true. And, despite the outrage and incredulity with which my statements about accepting assurances that phone records could be obtained legally, my lawyers assure me that there are in fact ways this can be done."

Defendants In H-P Case May Turn On One Another. The New York Times (10/11, Richtel) reports that while the five defendants in the H-P case "must overcome a paper trail of evidence against them," they could "wind up with as much to fear from one another. At least one lawyer involved in the case and several outside legal experts said the five defendants might wind up turning on one another as part of a way to shift blame away from themselves." The Times adds, "It is not yet clear whether the defendants will be tried together or separately. It is possible that one or more defendants could choose to cooperate with the prosecution and testify against others. But lawyers for any of the defendants could also try to shade the evidence in a way that is more favorable to their client and less so to another defendant. If the cases are severed, evidence presented in one trial could be subpoenaed in another trial."

Three Private Investigators In H-P Scandal Arraigned In California. The AP (10/11, Robertson) reports, "Three private investigators who allegedly obtained confidential telephone records as part of Hewlett-Packard's boardroom spying probe pleaded not guilty Tuesday to identity theft and other felony charges." The AP continues,

DOJ_NMG_0078698

"Ronald DeLia of Massachusetts-based Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., Matthew DePante of Florida-based Action Research Group Inc. and Bryan Wagner of Colorado were arraigned in Santa Clara County Superior Court. Each was later booked and released on personal recognizance." The AP adds, "DeLia, DePante and Wagner are among five people criminally charged last week for their roles in the spying scandal at the computer and printer giant. Former HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn surrendered and appeared in court late last week, and the company's ousted ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker also turned himself in and was released. … The three investigators are accused of impersonating HP board members, employees and journalists to trick telephone companies into divulging their private phone logs. … All five are charged with using false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility; unauthorized access to computer data; identity theft; and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. Each charge carries a fine of up to $10,000 and three years in prison. … They are all scheduled to return to court Nov. 17."

Dowd Stresses Need For "Emphatic And Sensitive" Corporate Leadership. Maureen Dowd The New York Times (10/11, Dowd) reports, "Carly Fiorina prided herself on being adept at succeeding in a man's world without whining about sexism. … The male-dominated [H-P] board's handling of her exit was 'heartless in some ways and disrespectful in other ways," she said. "Maybe they took great pleasure in seeing me beat up publicly for weeks and weeks.'" Dowd adds, "With several of the few high-profile women at the top tanking, it's interesting to note that Columbia Business School has introduced a new program that teaches the importance of a more empathetic and sensitive leadership style in globalized business, as opposed to the command-and-control style that has dominated the White House and Pentagon for, lo, these many messed up years. … Neenu Sharma, an M.B.A. student in the new Columbia program, says the moral of the story is that leadership works best with both sexes involved."

Judge Orders Conrad Black Not To Sell Wife's Diamond Ring. The Toronto Star (10/11, Westhead) reports, "Conrad Black has been slapped with a restraining order that will bar him from selling a rare $2.9 million diamond ring he gave his wife Barbara Amiel-Black as a gift and other antique jewellery." The Star continues, "Black, accused of engineering a racketeering, fraud and tax evasion scheme when he was CEO of Chicago publisher Hollinger International Inc., successfully fought off an attempt by the U.S. Justice Department to force him to relinquish the 26-carat diamond ring he purchased in 2000 at British jeweller Graff Diamonds Ltd. Black has pleaded not guilty to the charges. He is on bail and living in Toronto." The Star adds, "He has said the ring and other antiques were gifts to Amiel-Black, who has not been charged with any wrongdoing. Nevertheless, in an Oct. 6 restraining order, Judge Amy St. Eve in Chicago barred Black from 'selling, transferring, assigning, pledging, distributing, encumbering, wasting, secreting, depreciating, damaging, or in any way diminishing the value' of the diamond ring and other antiques."

CRIMINAL LAW:

President Holds School Safety Conference. The AP (10/11, Feller) reports, "President Bush urged the nation Tuesday to help prevent deadly school shootings, saying adults should intervene when they notice children are in trouble." At a conference he hosted on school violence, Bush "seemed most struck by one of the points raised by experts: When students plot violence, they often brag about it in advance to other students. Safety specialists say schools must encourage students to speak up when they notice any ominous behavioral changes." Bush called for "a cultural change inside schools, for teachers to become more aware and more active." But "there were no new policies nor new money announced." And "Democrats mocked the event as a photo opportunity with little substance." Still, "the White House, sensitive to the concerns of many parents, wanted to show it was doing something." US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "led three panel discussions." Experts said that "schools get safer when they take bullying seriously, practice their crisis plans, and talk to parents about what's happening." The conference "gave Bush a chance to emphasize education, the issue at the center of his domestic agenda."

All three networks covered the conference. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 7, Costello, 9.87M) reported, "Since the 1999 Columbine massacre, 225 people have died in school-related violence: 13 this school year alone, including five at an Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania and one at Platte Canyon High School in Colorado." So "today, law enforcement, educators, students and parents gathered to share their experiences and potential solutions, like getting dads more involved." Still, "critics point out the conference comes as the White House moves to cut more than $300 million in drug and violence prevention grant money to school districts. The Administration says those programs have proved to be ineffective and it's up to local communities to deal with violence issues."

DOJ_NMG_0078699

ABC World News (10/10, story 2, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) said "the conference on school safety the President called was almost a carbon copy of a similar summit after Columbine. Similar solutions were proposed then. But what has really been done since Columbine?" ABC (Muir) added, "Seven years after Columbine, and school safety experts say it's still a struggle to get the number of reduced open doors," and "federal funding for safety in schools has decreased" from $180 million to "this fiscal year, it's not even in the budget."

CBS Evening News (10/10, story 5, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported "one school in the Midwest may be a model for the nation had when it comes protecting our children." CBS (Bowers) added, "These days, at Green Bay's East High School, students can't get past the front door without IDs. That's in addition to surveillance cameras and security officers. The school remains in full lockdown mode, less than one month after a student walked into the associate principal's office and told him some classmates were planning a Columbine-style massacre." And "experts say communication is key to school safety" because "in more than 80% of the cases, at least one kid who wasn't involved, knew about it ahead of time, and in more than half the cases, at least two kids knew."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Nguyen) reported, "President Bush says the nation must find a way to keep its children safe. He spoke at a White House-sponsored conference today on school violence. First Lady Laura Bush said children need to know adults are there to protect them. A survivor of the 1999 Columbine shooting was also at today's conference. Mr. Bush called the meeting after three recent deadly shootings in Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Colorado."

Newspaper coverage suggested the conference was part of a PR effort to show the President's involvement and concern in the wake of the recent shooting. A number of reports also noted the absence of new policy initiatives. The Washington Post (10/11, A3, Shaver, 748K) reports the Conference on School Safety was "hastily arranged last week." Bush "announced no new funding or policy initiatives to handle the problem." He "heard calls for more coordinated planning between schools and police, more character education, more peer mentoring programs, more parental involvement and more counseling." USA Today (10/11, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the president was "reacting to a spate of school shootings." He "attended the last hour of the event." The conference "pointed to the biggest challenge facing those who would stop school violence: There are different theories about what causes it and how to prevent it. Panelists and attendees floated at least a dozen theories."

The New York Times (10/11, Schemo, 1.21M) reports, "The federal government should not play the primary role in responding to school violence, President Bush said Tuesday, but should instead give out information about strategies to help parents and schools grappling with the threat of deadly outbursts in the nation's schools."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (10/11, Gilbert, 259K) reports the conference "was clearly meant to signal that the administration was actively engaged in the issue, even though the president and his education secretary pointed out that matters such as school security and school policy are largely a state and local domain."

The Baltimore Sun (10/11, Davis) reports, "President Bush urged Americans Tuesday to turn their anguish over school shootings in Pennsylvania and around the nation into "concrete action" to prevent further tragedies. … But he told a gathering of educators, activists and law enforcement officials that more federal funding and government regulation won't solve the problem. … 'In many ways, I'm sorry we're having this meeting,' Bush said as he wrapped up a conference hastily organized by the White House to respond to the recent spate of deadly school violence. 'In other ways, I know how important it is.'" The Sun continues, "Bush said the meeting, moderated by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, was part of 'a nationwide effort to help people who are responsible to protect our children.' … More than 300 local leaders and specialists from around the country spent about six hours trading ideas, from drafting strong school emergency plans to urging fathers to get more involved in school, to providing character education for kids." The Sun adds, "Bush took a seat at a three-sided table on the stage of a packed suburban Maryland auditorium in the headquarters of the National 4-H Council, a youth development organization. The administration had set up a mock classroom complete with fake wood paneling and a chalkboard backdrop emblazoned with the event's title, and Bush questioned participants about how best to share their experiences with others around the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0078700

The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Mohammed) reports, "Conspicuously absent in the all-day session was any mention of the role of firearms in the shootings, a politically volatile issue sure to inflame partisan passions in a midterm election year." The Times adds, "Some participants argued that schools needed to do a better job of determining which students might bring weapons on campus. Psychologists pointed out that students who have suicidal tendencies often have thoughts of homicide too. And many panelists focused on the importance of building character in students, which they said had been degraded by media influences such as music and video games. … Harsher measures such as installing metal detectors in schools were viewed with skepticism. Gonzales said metal detectors may not be appropriate, noting that not all school shootings occur inside the buildings."

Gannett (10/11, King) reports Secretary Spellings said of the recent school tragedy, "This could really happen anywhere." Attorney General Gonzales "dismissed one questioner's call for increased gun control" and "panelists also didn't give metal detectors much of a thumbs-up."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch/Media General (10/11, Klein) reports, "Metal detectors won't stop school shootings, speakers at a conference on school safety told President Bush yesterday. Only listening to students, hearing about their problems and getting them help will stop the violence before it begins." Bush "heard Craig Scott describe how in April 1999 he hid under a table in the Columbine High School library as his two friends next to him were shot and killed." Bush "called on both departments to put together the best practices learned from this conference and distribute them to law-enforcement and education officials."

McClatchy (10/11, Hutcheson) reports, "Victims of school violence shared their horrific experiences" and the conference "ended with a call for more focus on character and values in the nation's classrooms." Experts "cited a host of factors that have contributed to the violence, including stress and feelings of alienation among students, negative media influences and inattentive parents." But "some advocates of character education offered implicit criticism of Bush's No Child Left Behind Act, which stresses academic achievement and requires frequent testing." Bush responded, "I think you can make sure a child learns, and I think you can instill character at the same time." He also "told the audience members that they shouldn't look to the federal government to bankroll character education or other school programs."

The Denver Post (10/11, Farrell, 256K) reports, "Bush said he wanted Tuesday's White House conference on school safety to produce a concrete plan of action. But tangible solutions like the use of metal detectors or a ban on assault weapons were rejected and eclipsed by testaments to the power of love." And "several speakers at Tuesday's conference urged Bush to purge America's coarse and violent culture, and to order that schools teach students about character, virtue and God. But the president noted the limitations of government in the battle against school violence." Bush said that "the best solution…is for parents, educators and students to find the love and compassion to reach out to troubled youths before they turn to violence." One panel said that "the purchase and operation of metal detectors and security cameras" were "overly expensive and easily evaded."

The Houston Chronicle (10/11, Mason) reports, "Keys to stopping what appears to be an epidemic of school violence include learning how to spot troubled students, boosting their self-esteem and preparing for emergencies, according to panelists at a special White House conference Tuesday." The Chronicle continues, "Organized in response to a recent spate of deadly shootings at schools, the conference did not address gun control or firearms-related issues. Rather, it focused on values and community action. … 'The violence we've seen is upsetting to a lot of people and I know it's upsetting to the professionals who are with us,' President Bush told participants. 'But rather than be upset, it's best for all of us who are responsible for helping the folks not only to cope, but to prevent action from taking place.'" The Chronicle adds, "In an effort to make schools safer, many Houston schools employ cameras, uniformed officers and metal detectors — an approach that drew skepticism from Bush administration officials. … 'One panel member said that it sends the wrong message about what we think of our kids when we have them come to an environment where they're supposed to learn and have to pass through metal detectors,' said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales."

Long Island Newsday (10/22, Dutton) reports, "Nearly 10 years ago, Daniel Gross' brother Matthew was shot in the head by a gunman while standing on an observation deck of the Empire State Building. After watching his brother slowly recover from a coma, Daniel started a gun violence prevention organization, PAX. … The group Gross co-founded runs a nationwide anonymous hotline that, he says, is helping kids fight school violence, 866-SPEAK-UP. … 'You could safely say hundreds of incidents have been averted,' Gross said. He cites 15,000 calls to the hotline in the past four years. 'New York has lagged behind a lot of other communities' in terms of school violence prevention, he said." Newsday adds, "Gross joined other advocates, law enforcement officers and educators from around the country yesterday in Chevy Chase, Md., for a conference on school safety. … The rate of violent crime in schools dropped over 10 years, according to the most recent figures from the Bureau of Justice Statistics and National Center for Education Statistics. In 1992, 48 of every 1,000 students would fall prey to violence at school, but in 2003 that number fell to 28 of every 1,000. … 'We are, however, seeing some indications in the last two years that those trends are changing,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said."

DOJ_NMG_0078701

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/11, Sherman, 241K) says the conference "emphasized the faith-based approaches at the center of some of his domestic policies."

Dana Milbank writes in an analysis for the Washington Post (10/11, A2, 748K), "Bush has always been a disciplined man, but yesterday he set a new standard for self-control: He moderated an hour-long discussion about the rash of school shootings in the past week without once mentioning the word 'guns.'" First lady Laura Bush "was nearly as good, giving a seven-minute speech…without mentioning guns." Gonzales and Spellings "deftly led hours of panels at the National 4-H building in Chevy Chase with only a few glancing references to weapons." The White House "neglected to invite any gun-control advocates. In fact, how the killers had carried out their deeds might have remained a mystery if 19-year-old twin brothers Theo and Niko Milonopoulos hadn't infiltrated the gathering" and "pointed out to Gonzales that 'the common denominator in the rash of school shootings' has been access to high-powered guns." The lack of discussion about guns was "unusual" and "even the invited guests found it a bit odd." Also, "with gun control off the table, the questions and comments became a bit repetitious, too, as a long line of participants echoed the belief that school violence would be reduced by values education and religious belief." Bush "had been having trouble finding his voice on school shootings" and "labeled the violence 'inexplissible,' apparently merging 'inexplicable' and 'inexpressible.'"

FNC's Studio B with Shepard Smith (9/10, 3:53 p.m.) reported, "From the daily school shootings in Colorado, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania to violent bullies on campuses across the nation, the potential for school violence is a real concern for millions of parents and students across the nation. Today, President Bush responding by convening a conference on school safety, a way for educators and law enforcement to share ideas to make schools a safer place, that according to the White House. Joining us now from Washington is one of the speakers at today summit, Alberto Gonzales, the attorney general of the United States. What did we learn today, sir?" Alberto Gonzales said, "Well, we learned we've got by and large a good system of providing quality education to our students in a safe environment. We are seeing some troubling trends in recent years and we need to watch it very carefully. But clearly your child is safer in school than they are at the mall, for example. I think we also learned that law enforcement agencies are doing a good job in working with educators to make our schools as safe as possible. But we looked at a lot of issues today. I think we made good progress talking about what's already being done at the federal, state and local level, and making sure we find some kind of mechanism to educate and inform people about all the resources that are available to make sure our kids are safe at school." FNC's Shepard: "A federal program was put into place after the Columbine massacre called COPS, that's an acronym. And today, the Democrat of New York Anthony Weiner said it's a shameful hypocrisy that the program has been cut from some 150 million in the beginning to 5 million this year. Why the cuts and how do you respond to that?' Alberto Gonzales: "Well, we have spent billions of dollars since President Bush became President with respect to state and local assistance and we have spend millions of dollars to provide specifically safety for our schools. I think what we need to look at is everything that we're doing to ensure our kids are safe. Look at the task forces that we have in place, working with state and local officials. Look at the prosecutions, the number of prosecutions for gun crimes since 2001. Gun prosecutions are up 62%. So, we're sending a very clear message that if you engage in gun crime you're going to pay severe time in our federal prisons. I think we're doing a lot. We talked a lot about the successes we've enjoyed working with state and local officials, and we also talked about what we can do going forward."

Appearing on CNN's American Morning (10/10), Attorney General Gonzales said, "we obviously need to make sure that we have our laws -- we have good laws to deal with this kind of violence. We have really spent a lot of time prosecuting violent crime during the Bush administration. I think prosecutions are up on violent crimes about 10% since 2001. It really has been a focus to go against gun crimes. Most do involve guns. What we're doing is to send a very clear message that if you're going to engage a crime using a gun, there are going to be severe consequences for doing so." Gonzales added, "During the Bush administration, our primary focus is on existing laws. We have seen violent gun crimes go down during the time of this president. The focus should be on criminals who break the law, not focusing on law-abiding citizens who follow the law. Obviously, we want to ensure we have an environment where our kids can learn. It's difficult for the kids to learn if they don't feel safe. One of the things that we can do is to educate people, to provide training to state and local officials at the federal level and to prosecute people who engage in violent gun crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0078702

Local Television. Several local television networks reported on the first day of the national conference on school violence, being held in Chevy Chase, Maryland. The focus of the reporting centered around attorney general Alberto Gonzales' call for tougher enforcement of existing gun laws rather than the promotion of new ones. Some examples: WKRN-TV Nashville, (10/10, 6:16 p.m.) reported, "President Bush calls a summit on school safety. Attorney general Alberto Gonzales and education secretary Margaret Spellings each led discussion panels. People who have experienced the terror of school violence talked about the importance of communication as a means to safety."

WVLT-TV Knoxville, (10/10, 4:02 p.m.) reported, "First Lady Laura Bush and attorney general Alberto Gonzales gathered to speak about an issue that has gripped our nation, especially in the past two weeks: school violence."

KMSP-TV Minneapolis, (10/10, 5:47 p.m.) reported, "Some experts advocate better gun control laws. But attorney general Alberto Gonzales urged using current laws to more aggressively prosecute gun crimes. 'The focus should be on criminals who break the law, not focusing on law-abiding citizens who follow the law.' Track participants said schools must pay more attention to student bullying and spend more time rehearsing crisis plans, but agreed there is no single, simple answer to the problem."

KRON-TV San Francisco, (10/10, 6:01 p.m.) reported, "In the seven years since the Columbine school mass killing, many schools have installed video monitors, limited access and put panic buttons in classrooms. Today attorney general Alberto Gonzales rejected another idea allowing teachers to carry guns."

KDFW-TV Dallas, (10/10, 12:10 p.m.) reported, "Some people, including the U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzalez, believe part of the solution is tougher gun laws. 'What we're doing is sending a very clear message that if you're going to engage in a crime using a gun, there are going to be severe consequences. Schools need to create a culture where their encouraged to tell officials what they know and have a good crisis response plan.'"

WTMJ-TV Milwaukee, (10/10, 5:01 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales opposes the idea of allowing teachers to carry guns. 'Our teachers are there to train and teach our children. They're not there to protect the children.'"

California School Locked Down After Apparent Gun Prank. The Contra Costa Times (10/11, Graham) reports, "A rumor that a student had carried a firearm onto the Castro Valley High School campus today forced administrators to lock down the school for three hours while nearly two dozen deputies and investigators searched the campus. … No weapon was found, and police later attributed the scare to an apparent prank." The Times continues, "The lockdown was issued around 11:40 a.m. after school officials received word of the report. Teachers were ordered to lock all doors, close all windows and pull down all the window blinds, said Alameda County Sheriff's Sgt. Scott Dudek. … School officials informed the sheriff's office of the threat as soon as the rumor reached administrators. The sheriff's office responded by dispatching 25 deputies and three K-9 units to the 2,800-pupil campus at 19400 Santa Maria Ave., Dudek said." The Times adds, "Deputies cordoned off the campus, setting up a perimeter where worried parents gathered and waited in vain for about three hours, not sure what exactly had transpired at the 40-acre campus. … The lockdown occurred at a time when public awareness has been heightened by a recent series of deadly school shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania. … In response to the violence, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings convened a school safety conference today in Chevy Chase, Md."

Utah School Practices Lockdown In Preparation For The Worst. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/11, Lyon) reports, "At Bountiful (UT) High on Tuesday morning, the school was teaching a post-Columbine lesson in a subject most of us never expected to study: school violence. By practicing a lockdown situation as it has for several years, members of the staff learned what they need to do to keep students safe. The students taste what a scary situation at school could be like and how to help. … What was new at Bountiful High this year was the number of police agencies involved and the hostage twist. Schools have been reeling from the spate of shootings over the past few weeks that seemed to leave no community, even the peaceful Amish, untouched. On Tuesday, safety and education experts from across the country met in Maryland at a conference called by the White House." The Tribune adds, "Bountiful High is far from a fearful place. Students walk in the high school without having their bags searched or being screened by metal detectors. Several doors are open during the school day. Unlike some schools, it does have an on-campus school resource officer who can react immediately. … While the school lockdown may have been more for the school's benefit, officers Tuesday filmed their exercise and evaluators stood nearby taking notes. The police shouted commands and codes over their radios communicating with an improvised command post outside. Not communicating, as one officer put it, can be deadly."

DOJ_NMG_0078703

911 Transcripts Released From Amish School Shooting. CBS Evening News (10/10, story 4, 0:45, Couric) reported that "one week after Charles Roberts shot those ten Amish school children, killing five of them, officials released a transcript of the 911 call he made as police accomplice surrounded the schoolhouse. Roberts says 'I just took ten girls hostage, and I want everybody off the property, or else' When the dispatcher asked Robert's to hold. He said 'No … right now or they're dead in two seconds.' Asked again to hold. 'Roberts says, 'two seconds that's it!!' His last words before he opened fire."

ABC World News (10/10, lead story, 2:50, Donovan) reported that Roberts "made up his mind to die that day. … But his wife was first to suspect it. Marie Roberts. She was at home. This is the house. She called 911 herself. 'I am really scared,' she told the dispatcher. 'and I wonder if -- how I find out what's going on.' It was almost 11:00 when she made that call. She didn't know much. But she knew something was wrong, because she'd just heard from her husband, who had left suicide notes."

The New York Times (10/11, Hamill) reports, "An hour after walking into a small Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania last week with a small arsenal of guns and hardware, Charles C. Roberts IV told a dispatcher in a calm, dispassionate voice just what his emergency was. 'I just took, uh, 10 girls hostage and I want everybody off the property or, or else,' Mr. Roberts told a 911 dispatcher for Lancaster County." As the dispatcher tries to engage him, "Mr. Roberts threatens to kill the girls, but his voice 'is not angry, there is no yelling and screaming,' the county district attorney, Don Totaro, said in an interview." The Times adds, "The dispatcher's short conversation with Mr. Roberts, as well as calls from his wife, Marie, and the farmer who made the first 911 call, after a young teacher fled the schoolhouse to seek help, show how frantic Mr. Roberts's brief siege was."

The Washington Post/AP (10/11, A2, Scolforo) reports, "Before authorities could react, he started shooting inside the West Nickel Mines Amish School, killing five girls and wounding five others before killing himself. Police burst in after hearing the gunfire."

USA Today (10/11, Welch) reports that Totaro said, "They tried to keep him on the line as long as possible," adding, "They tried to diffuse the situation, but there was just no possible way for them to do so. It was clear he was intent on carrying out his mission."

Laura Bush Praises Amish Girls. The Lancaster Newspapers (PA) (10/10, Itkowitz) reports, "Two Amish girls who put their classmates' lives before their own represent the country's best, First Lady Laura Bush said during a school safety summit Tuesday. The first lady was referring to Marian Fisher, 13, and her 11-year-old sister, Barbie Fisher, both of whom beseeched Charles Carl Roberts IV to shoot them first, hoping he'd spare the lives of the younger Amish girls locked inside their one-room schoolhouse on Oct. 2."

FBI Interviews Page Who Received Messages From Foley. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 5, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "This is the public's first look at the former House page at the center of the Foley scandal. 21-year-old Jordan Edmond today in Oklahoma City where he met for two and a half hours with the FBI." Stephen Jones, attorney for Jordan Edmund: "I'm not able to discuss the interview except to say that it occurred and that our client answered their questions and cooperated to the fullest." Reid: "While serving as a page five years ago, Edmund, then 16, got to know Congressman Foley. After leaving the program, he reportedly received sexually explicit instant messages from Foley. 11 days ago, shortly before those messages were made public, Foley resigned." Edmond is

DOJ_NMG_0078704

"also expected to testify before the House Ethics Committee which already has 400 calls to align taking reports of potentially inappropriate contact with pages." ABC World News (10/10, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (10/10, story 8, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) also mentioned Edmond's interview.

CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported attorney Stephen Jones "said that he was contacted today by the House Ethics Committee, which…is conducting its own investigation. He's not clear, though, whether or not his client will be asked to appear before them."

Former House Clerk Emerges As Key Figure In Foley Investigation. The Chicago Tribune (10/11, Dorning, Zajac, 623K) reports former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, "who formerly controlled the administrative apparatus of the House," emerged "as a key figure in the scandal over former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate emails to underage pages." Rep. Jim Kolbe, who "was informed as early as 2000 of suggestive emails from Foley to a former page described a more significant role for then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl." Kolbe "said he passed the complaint on to Trandahl, who also was involved in handling a complaint in 2005 about inappropriate emails to another former page." The account "raises new questions about the quiet disposition of the later complaint, which officials handled by privately warning Foley to cease contact with pages." But House Speaker Dennis Hastert "defended his own staff's handling of the 2005 complaint about inappropriate emails from Foley, saying he could not find any fault in their actions based on what they knew at the time." However, Hastert said "he would dismiss any member of his staff involved in a cover-up, while Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) asked for an independent investigation of Republican leaders' handling of the complaints."

Fordham To Appear Before House Ethics Panel Thursday. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported, "CNN has also learned…that Kirk Fordham, who is Foley's former chief of staff, he is scheduled to appear before the House Ethics Committee on Thursday. Now, remember, that Fordham claims that he told a senior member of House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office about these concerns about e-mails, or at least contact that was inappropriate between Foley and interns, going back three -- or, I should say, pages going back three years." CBS Evening News (10/10, story 8, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, testifies tomorrow before the House Ethics Committee."

McCain Calls For Independent Investigation Of House Page Scandal. ABC World News (10/10, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Republican Senator John McCain called for an independent investigation of the House page scandal."

Doubts Raised About Foley's Alleged Drinking Problem. The Hill (10/11, Young) reports photographs and "first-hand accounts of Foley's public drinking told by acquaintances in Washington and Florida could reinforce doubts about the veracity of the claim that a drinking problem fueled his behavior, which included carrying on sexually explicit instant-message chats with former pages." Though "no law-enforcement authority has filed charges against Foley, his attorney could cite alcohol addiction as part of a legal defense by arguing that Foley was not in complete control of his actions when he contacted former pages over the Internet."

Hastert Pledges To Fire Any Aides Involved In Foley "Cover Up." The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Simon, Levey, 918K) reports Speaker Dennis Hastert said Tuesday "that anyone who covered up information about contacts between then Rep. Mark Foley and male pages 'really ought to go.'" During a "question and answer session with reporters outside a meeting of the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce in Aurora, Ill., Hastert said that ongoing investigations in the sex scandal should determine if his staff or anyone in Congress covered up information about the former Florida representative, and the former pages, 'shouldn't continue to have their jobs.'" Hastert "noted that none of the pages were approached by Foley while they were in Washington — only after they had graduated from the program. Moreover, Hastert said he is still searching for a candidate to run the program. 'I asked (former FBI Director) Louie Freeh to do it and (House Democratic Leader) Nancy Pelosi rejected him for some reason.'"

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 5, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Hastert has been criticized for not doing more and today three new polls show large percentages of Americans think he should resign as Speaker. Hastert says he knew nothing about the Foley issue until the day Foley resigned but some of the staffers did know about Foley's less explicit emails months ago. Today Hastert was asked if any of those staff members should resign for not telling him." Rep, Dennis Hastert: "If anybody's found to have hidden information or covered up information, they really should be gone." ABC

DOJ_NMG_0078705

World News (10/10, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (10/10, story 8, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) also briefly reported the story.

CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported that House Speaker Dennis Hastert says "if anyone on his staff hushed up concerns about Mark Foley and the congressional pages, those people, in his words, will be fired." Hastert "acknowledged that complaints about Foley's conduct could have been handled better."

MSNBC's Hardball (10/10, Shuster) reported, "In Illinois today before a backdrop of a graveyard, House Speaker Dennis Hastert all but sacrificed his own staff." Hastert: "If there is a problem, if there was a cover-up, then we should find that out through the investigation process. They will be under oath. And we'll find out. If they did cover something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs."

USA Today (10/11, Kiely, Johnson, 2.27M) reports the story under the headline, "Hastert Says Fire Anyone Who 'covered' For Foley." The New York Times (10/11, Zeleny, Johnston, 1.21M) reports Hastert's remarks "were the first time he had used the term 'cover-up' in talking about the case. Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned late last month after explicit messages he had sent to a former page became public."

The Washington Post (10/11, A4, Babington, 748K) reports Hastert's remarks "came amid a quickening pace of investigations into Foley's relationships with teenage congressional pages and the House's handling of warnings about the Florida Republican's behavior." Hastert "again said he knew nothing of alarms raised in some circles about Foley's behavior toward pages until the day he resigned. Two high-ranking GOP House members have said they mentioned to Hastert concerns about 2005 e-mails that Foley sent to a former page from Louisiana."

The Washington Times (10/11, Hurt, 88K) reports the story under the headline, "Hastert Vows To Fire Staff In Foley Cover-up."

Prominent Democrats Refrain From Seeking Hastert Resignation. The Hill (10/11, Schor, Sherman, O'Connor) reports while House Republicans "rush to contain the political damage from the Mark Foley scandal, Democrats have relied on their challengers to push for Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) resignation while party leaders and most vulnerable incumbents refrain from calling for Hastert's head." More than "20 Democratic opponents of vulnerable GOP incumbents have urged Hastert to abandon the Speakership," but "no elected Democratic leader and no Democratic incumbents in competitive races have echoed those challengers, according to a search of public statements conducted by The Hill." The "trend places" Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Democratic caucus chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), "all of whom have declined to urge Hastert to step aside, in a less combative camp than the conservative Washington Times editorial page, several conservative activists and at least one Republican candidate."

Hastert Meets Critic Of Handling Of Foley Scandal. The AP (10/11, Hernandez) reports House Speaker Dennis Hastert met "with an evangelist who hoped to persuade the Illinois Republican to step down because of the congressional page sex scandal. Hastert had no comment after the meeting at his home with Christian evangelist K.A. Paul, founder of the Global Peace Initiative." Paul said he "met alone with Hastert for about 30 minutes and prayed with him." Said Paul, "I am humbled with his humility and simplicity." Paul said "the scandal is distracting the country from other issues."

Hastert's Memoir Highlighted Claims About "Incredible" Memory. The Hill (10/11, Heil) reports Speaker Hastert's "memory lapses may cost him some points this fall." House Majority Leader John Boehner and NRCC chair Thomas Reynolds "have said they talked to the Speaker about suspicious e-mails that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to House pages. Hastert had not denied that those conversations took place, but maintains he does not recall them." Democrat John Laesch, who is challenging Speaker Hastert, "highlights a noteworthy paragraph in Hastert's 2004 autobiography" on his Website. In the memoir, Hastert says, "Some say I have an incredible memory or recall for exactly what happened when and who said what to whom. I do listen pretty diligently, more than a lot of people listen, and I do pick up facts that way." The Hill adds Laesch "may not win, but he certainly knows how to compile opposition research."

Kolbe Clarifies His Knowledge Of Foley E-Mails. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported that Rep. Jim Kolbe "sought to clarify his knowledge of e-mails that were received dating back to 2000, or on or about 2000, between yet another former page and Congressman Foley. According to Congressman Kolbe, he was notified -- or his office was notified -- on or about 2000 by this former page, who said that he had received e-mails from Congressman Foley that made him uncomfortable. He said, 'I was not shown the content of the messages and was not told they were sexually explicit.' And, so, he recommended that this be passed on to Congressman Foley's office and to the House clerk."

DOJ_NMG_0078706

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 5, Reid, 9.87M) reported Kolbe "confirmed that he was told by another former page about six years ago of emails from Foley that made him uncomfortable. Kolbe says he sent the complaint to Foley's office. In statement, he says, 'I believe then and now that this is the appropriate way to handle this incident.' But Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert who was besieged by the media today, said Kolbe should have done more, including confronting Foley.

The AP (10/11, Taylor) reports Kolbe "said a former page he had sponsored contacted his office to complain of e-mails from Foley and that he 'passed along' the complaint to Foley, R-Fla., and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl. Kolbe said he did not take the matter to other lawmakers."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A6, Rogers, 2.03M) reports Kolbe "informed Kirk Fordham," then chief of staff to Foley, and "Jeff Trandahl, then the House Clerk, of the complaint." The complaint "appears to have been made between 2000 and 2002, or more than two years before a separate incident last fall, when a Louisiana family complained to their congressman of Foley emails to their teenage son, also a former page." In both cases, Foley was "warned directly or through his staff to cease contact with the former pages, and he apparently did. But following Mr. Foley's resignation on Sept. 29 -- and disclosure of his sexually explicit messages to former pages -- House Republicans are under fire for not having done more to investigate these early warnings of his behavior."

The AP (10/11, Talhelm) reports the issue has "thrust Kolbe, 64, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, into the spotlight just as he is preparing to leave Washington after 22 years in the House." It is "unclear whether Kolbe's role in the Foley saga will affect his post-Congress employment options. This week, he was named one of five finalists to head the Global Fund to Prevent AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, the central financing engine of international efforts to fight those diseases."

Records Suggest Abramoff Had Lobbying Contacts With Pombo. In an exclusive story, the AP (10/11, Werner) reports, "California Rep. Richard Pombo has insisted he was never lobbied by Jack Abramoff. Records show the disgraced lobbyist billed a client for at least two contacts with Pombo a decade ago." The AP continues, "The lobbying records released by the Northern Mariana Islands show that Abramoff billed once for calls to Pombo, chairman of the House Resources Committee, and a second time for a discussion with him, while lobbying in 1996." The AP adds, "On more than two dozen other occasions from 1996 through 2001, Abramoff associates called or met with members of Pombo's staff, including his chief of staff, the records indicate. As the contacts picked up, Pombo voted Abramoff's way on a bill important to Abramoff's clients. … Pombo spokesman Brian Kennedy disputed the reported contacts, saying direct lobbying by Abramoff 'never happened' and the staff-level contacts were 'greatly inflated.' Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in a congressional corruption investigation, is 'an admitted felon' who can't be trusted, Kennedy said. … 'I think any of these billing records should be taken with a grain of salt if not dismissed entirely,' Kennedy said. He noted that e-mails have surfaced showing Abramoff instructed associates to inflate their billing hours. … Still, the records put in question Pombo's campaign-trail assertions that he barely knew Abramoff and was never lobbied by him."

Judge Orders DOJ To Respond To Siegelman Evidence Preservation Order. WSFA-TV, NBC 12, Montgomery, AL (10/11, Hammons) reports, "U.S. District Judge Mark Fuller has given the government until Friday, October 13, 2006 to show cause in writing why the emergency motion submitted by attorneys for Governor Don Siegelman, requesting preservation of evidence related to alleged jury misconduct, should not be granted. … The action of the judge is standard procedure." WSFA-TV continues, "Assistant United States Attorney Steve Feaga told WSFA.com, 'We will of course comply with the Court's order. We do not believe the motion is well founded and will so state in our response and provide our reasoning at that time.'" WSFA-TV adds, "Siegelman attorney David McDonald, responding to Mr. Feaga's comment told WSFA.com, 'I can't wait for the Justice Department to file a brief that opposes the preservation of evidence. I'm going to blow it up, frame it, and hang it on my wall.' … McDonald says he understands the government and the judge need time to respond to the motion concerning alleged juror misconduct and the possible introduction of extrinsic evidence into the jury room. However, McDonald says all he's asking is that all evidence be preserved while the judge takes the motions into consideration. 'How in the world is the government going to oppose that?" questions McDonald."

DOJ_NMG_0078707

DOJ Seeks Death Penalty In Puerto Rico Murder Case. The AP (10/11, Rivera) reports, "Federal prosecutors on Tuesday urged a jury to choose capital punishment for a Puerto Rican man convicted of killing a hospital guard in what could be the first death sentence handed down in the U.S. territory in nearly 80 years." The AP continues, "Carlos Ayala Lopez was found guilty two months ago in the 2002 slaying of Jose Rodriguez Reyes, a guard at the Veteran's Medical Center in Rio Piedras. The jury reconvened Tuesday to decide if Ayala should be executed or sentenced to life in prison. … 'Justice will be to give him the punishment that he deserves ... and to sentence Carlos Ayala Lopez to death,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Jacabed Rodriguez told the jury of six men and six women." The AP adds, "One of the jurors cried as Rodriguez displayed photos of the crime scene at the hospital just outside San Juan. Prosecutors said Ayala shot the guard while trying to steal the man's gun for a planned drug trafficking operation. … Puerto Rico abolished capital punishment in 1929, but federal prosecutors can still seek the death penalty in some cases because the territory is subject to U.S. federal law. The island's last execution was in 1927, when a man was hanged for murder. The island's legislature approved a resolution reaffirming the anti-death penalty stance in May. … The only other case in which a federal jury in Puerto Rico had to decide whether to impose a death sentence was in 2005. The jury opted to give two men charged with murder a life sentence."

High Court Considers Viability Of Flawed Indictments. The AP (10/11, Sherman) reports, "Judges and prosecutors make mistakes, a Justice Department lawyer told the Supreme Court Tuesday, but sometimes those errors are so minor that they don't warrant reversing a conviction in a criminal case." The AP continues, "A jury convicted Juan Resendiz-Ponce of attempting to enter the United States illegally from Mexico. But the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals overturned Resendiz-Ponce's conviction because his indictment by a grand jury did not set out any specific acts showing how he tried to enter the United States. … The omission was so serious that it required automatic reversal of the conviction, the appellate court said." The AP adds, "Deputy Solicitor General Michael Dreeben told justices Tuesday, however, that Resendiz-Ponce received a fair trial at which the government proved that he had displayed two false pieces of identification in an effort to enter the country. Resendiz-Ponce presented his cousin's green card and driver license when he approached the border crossing at San Luis, Ariz., on June 1, 2003. … Dreeben conceded that prosecutors should have included more information in the indictment and, when they didn't, the trial judge should have dismissed the charge before the trial began. .. .Even so, he said, the conviction should stand. … 'Such an error violates the Fifth Amendment, but it is harmless,' he said."

Attorney For Suspect In Killing Of Washington Federal Prosecutor Declares Innocence. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/11, Shukovsky) reports, "The lawyer representing the prime suspect in the killing of federal prosecutor Tom Wales publicly declared his client's innocence Tuesday, rejecting the notion that he held a grudge against Wales and protesting the government's inquisitionlike investigation. … 'This is Richard Jewell all over again,' Seattle attorney Larry Setchell said, referring to the man wrongly suspected in the 1996 Olympics bombing." The P-I continues, "Setchell's client, a 45-year-old commercial pilot who recently moved to Snohomish, has been in the FBI's cross hairs since Wales was shot to death in his Queen Anne home five years ago today. … Next week, Setchell said, the pilot will provide agents with handwriting samples -- hoping to prove he wasn't the author of a bizarre, anonymous letter sent to the bureau earlier this year by someone claiming to be a hit man hired to kill Wales." The P-I adds, "After the Oct. 11, 2001, slaying, federal authorities launched a massive manhunt. If Wales was killed because of his job, he would be the first federal prosecutor murdered in the line of duty. … But in an interview with the Seattle P-I, Setchell said the FBI has 'no science' connecting the pilot to the scene of the killing. … 'They took everything from his house and they have nothing connecting him to Tom Wales. If they did, he wouldn't be walking the streets,' the attorney said. The P-I isn't identifying the pilot because he hasn't been charged with a crime." The P-I notes, "In 2001, Wales prosecuted the pilot, his business partner and others on charges that they improperly modified a surplus military helicopter for civilian use. Wales ultimately dropped the charges after an expert witness for the government was shown to have lied in another, similar case to the Justice Department, Federal Aviation Administration and the court, Setchell said. An internal investigative report from the Department of Transportation's Inspector General obtained by the P-I confirms that the expert witness lied. … FBI Special Inspector Robert Jordan, who this summer took charge of the investigation, will conduct a media briefing at noon today in which authorities will provide 'new information about the investigation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0078708

FBI Investigating Specter Aide Over Pentagon Contract To Lobbyist Husband. USA Today (10/11, 5A, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "The FBI is investigating whether a member of Sen. Arlen Specter's staff broke the law by helping her husband, a lobbyist, secure almost $50 million in Pentagon spending for his clients, the senator acknowledged Tuesday. In an Aug. 21 letter, FBI official Joseph Persichini Jr. told Specter, R-Pa., that the bureau is investigating 'allegations of possible criminal misconduct' by staff member Vicki Siegel Herson. Persichini also asked for a copy of a report summarizing the results of an investigation of Siegel and other Specter employees with relatives who are lobbyists." USA notes, "Specter says he didn't know of the link to Siegel, who was one of his top advisers on spending issues until last fall. Specter says he did nothing wrong."

The Philadelphia Daily News (10/11, Davies, 109K) reports, "FBI agents have reviewed…Specter's financial disclosure statements" in the Siegel probe. "Specter said in a phone interview yesterday that he has not been interviewed by the FBI and neither he nor his staff has received subpoenas in the matter. 'Everything that was ever done here was within the [Senate] ethics rules,' Specter said." The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/11, Goldstein, 399K) adds, "'I really do not know' what the FBI was looking for, Specter said" of the review of his financial disclosures. "He said the FBI contacted neither him nor any member of his staff. … He has also changed the rules in his office to preclude any contact between office staff and relatives of employees engaged in lobbying.

Ney To Appear In Court Friday. Rep. Bob Ney, who has admitted to accepting gifts from lobbyists in exchange for legislative favors is due to appear in federal court Friday to formally admit wrongdoing. The Hill (10/11, Kucinich) describes Ney's scheduled appearance as "more bad news" for the GOP which is still reeling from the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contacts with house pages. The Hill notes that "to the dismay of Republicans," Ney is likely to make his court appearance as a sitting member of Congress. While Ney "has given up his gavels on the House Administration Committee and the Financial Services Housing and Community Opportunity subcommittee," he "has kept his seat. … A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee confirmed Ney is still on the congressional payroll. Ney makes $165,200 annually, or $452.60 per day."

Malvo Pleads Guilty To Six Counts Of First Degree Murder. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Londoano) reports that sniper Lee Boyd Malvo yesterday pleaded guilty to six counts of first degree murder, taking responsibility for his role in the October 2002 sniper shootings in Montgomery County. Malvo's attorneys said that before his scheduled November 9 sentencing hearing, "they will try to reach a 'global resolution,' which presumably would entail his pleading guilty to slayings and shootings in other parts of the country where he is a suspect. If such a deal is reached, Malvo, 21, could benefit by being allowed to serve time in a federal prison rather than a maximum-security penitentiary in Virginia, where he was first convicted of murder. Although defense lawyers raised the prospect of such an agreement, no negotiations appear to be underway."

The Washington Times (10/11, Wagner) reports, "State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said Malvo probably will be sentenced to six consecutive life terms without a chance for parole. The minimum sentence would be a single life term with a chance for parole." The Times adds, "According to an interstate agreement before the Montgomery trials, Mr. Gansler said Malvo will be returned to Virginia, where he was sentenced to life in 2003 for killing FBI analyst Linda Franklin, 47, on Oct. 14, 2002, in a parking lot outside the Home Depot in Falls Church."

The Baltimore Sun (10/11, Siegel) reports, "Malvo's lawyers said Tuesday they will move quickly to try to reach an agreement by his scheduled Nov. 9 sentencing in Rockville, where prosecutors are seeking the maximum sentence of six consecutive prison terms of life without parole. … 'We are about to hopefully embark on some candid and frank discussions with some local prosecutors,' said William C. Brennan, Malvo's lawyer. He said he will try in the coming weeks to 'to effectuate a global resolution to Mr. Malvo's legal problems,' but he and prosecutors declined to specify which shootings might be involved. … Charges are pending against Malvo and Muhammad in Alabama, Louisiana and Washington, D.C.. The pair is suspected -- in some cases because Malvo reportedly told police about them -- in shootings in Arizona, California, Florida, Georgia, Texas and Washington state."

DOJ_NMG_0078709

The AP (10/11, Manning) reports, "Malvo has already been convicted of shootings in neighboring Virginia. Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas Gansler said such a plea deal could mean Malvo may not serve his sentence there. … Malvo could plead guilty to the Oct. 3, 2002, shooting of Pascal Charlot in Washington, D.C. and serve his life term in the federal system, Gansler said. Federal prosecutors handle murder cases in the District of Columbia." The AP adds, "Gansler said the decision rests with Virginia authorities, who agreed to let Malvo and his one-time mentor, John Allen Muhammad, come to Maryland for new trials. Under an interstate agreement, Maryland must return Malvo after his sentencing. … Kevin Hall, a spokesman for Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine, said Kaine's staff has not had any recent discussions with Maryland prosecutors on a plea deal for Malvo. The Virginia prosecutors who first tried the pair were opposed when the idea was proposed a few months ago."

Judge Delays Wecht Trial Until 3rd Circuit Rules On FBI Records. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (10/11, Cato) reports, "The federal public corruption trial of Dr. Cyril H. Wecht will not begin next week as scheduled. U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab released the jury pool of nearly 300 people, effectively postponing the Oct. 16 trial start date indefinitely." The Tribune-Review notes that the 3rd US Circuit Court "has been asked to decide whether internal disciplinary records of the lead FBI agent in the case should be made public and whether a federal court rule in Pittsburgh that keeps lawyers from speaking to the media is constitutional." The AP (10/11, Mandak) adds, "Wecht's attorneys appealed to the 3rd Circuit after Schwab upheld FBI searches for Wecht's records and computers. Defense attorneys had attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who obtained the search warrants, but Schwab overruled some of their objections because he said they were filed too late."

California City Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Corruption Charges. Bay City News Wires (10/11) reports, "A Colma city councilman facing public corruption charges was arraigned Tuesday morning in San Francisco federal court." Philip J. Lum "pleaded not guilty before a U.S. Northern District Court judge to charges he failed to report gifts accepted from the owner of a Colma casino in exchange for voting favorably on City Council matters that benefited the casino." BCN notes, "The charges came after a three-year FBI investigation revealed that Lum, who has been on the Colma City Council since 1986, accepted first-class and coach airline tickets to the Philippines from 1999 until 2001 from the owner of Colma's Lucky Chances Casino, according to the U.S. attorney's office. … Lum was released on $100,000 bail."

Philadelphia Architect Sentenced To Probation For Illegal Contributions. The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/11, Shiffman, 399K) reports, "A Philadelphia architect who participated in a pay-to-play scheme in which $30,000 from a corporation was illegally funneled toward Mayor Street's reelection was sentenced to two years' probation yesterday. The case is part of a continuing FBI investigation into corruption at Philadelphia International Airport and is related to federal authorities' City Hall probe. The architect, Terry Crockett, had pleaded guilty to conspiracy and fraud and had helped authorities make a case against two codefendants." The Inquirer notes, "After Sky Sites paid Crockett, he gave $10,000 each to consultant Joseph Moderski and Eric Selby, a former vice president of Sky Sites. The three men then each gave $10,000 to a political action committee controlled by Ronald A. White, a chief Street supporter."

Immunized Computer Technician Helped FBI Access Fumo Emails. The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/11, Shiffman, Cattabiani, 399K) reports, "Last fall, agents on the FBI's public corruption squad faced a problem: They couldn't read encrypted e-mail seized from State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's offices. On Oct. 18, they got a break. Donald Wilson, a state Senate computer technician who had been granted immunity, suddenly remembered something, according to a newly unsealed FBI affidavit. He still had two portable data cards -- with all the passwords to open the e-mail. … With that breakthrough, the affidavit said, agents were able to read more Fumo office e-mails talking about destroying records and fretting about the FBI -- a trail that helped lead to obstruction-of-justice charges against two other Fumo computer technicians, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister." The Inquirer notes, "Prosecutors, who have been investigating Fumo for three years, say they will decide by Christmas whether to indict Fumo, or others."

DOJ_NMG_0078710

Missouri Federal Prosecutors Begin Child-Porn Crackdown. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/11, Patrick) reports, "Missouri's federal prosecutors said Tuesday that they are reinforcing the battle against an 'epidemic' of online child pornography, in an effort funded in part by well-known St. Louis concert promoter and philanthropist Steven Schankman." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Schankman) said he donated $100,000 toward the estimated $600,000 annual budget to help provide a more coordinated attack. He said his desire comes from various directions, including experiences of his employees' children. … Schankman said it had little or nothing to do with federal charges that sent his son, Jason P. Schankman, to prison in April for almost 16 years for producing and receiving child pornography here. The younger Schankman, 31 when he was charged last year, lived in Kirkwood." The Post-Dispatch adds, "Steven Schankman said his financial help was not intended to get his son a break from U.S. Attorney Catherine L. Hanaway's office. 'I'm too smart to say this will help my son and she's too smart to say it will,' he said. 'Catherine Hanaway did what she had to do.' … Hanaway said she had told Steven Schankman she could not work with him on the project while his son's case was open. … On Tuesday, her office announced creation of a child exploitation unit, which will refocus some prosecutors' efforts on child pornography. She also said the FBI is planning to bear down on pornographers who use 'peer-to peer' file-sharing networks that are commonly used to share music. … Several cases where child pornographers used the Kazaa network have been prosecuted in federal court in Kansas City, said Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri. Kazaa cases have also been handled in St. Louis, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeff Jensen said."

Former California TV Reporter Charged In Alleged Child Sex Abuse Case. The AP (10/11) reports, "A retired police sergeant and former television reporter was charged Tuesday in connection with several encounters between him and two 12-year-old boys in a cruise ship spa, authorities said." Roderick "Rod" Bernsen "was arrested at the Port of Los Angeles Saturday by FBI agents investigating a complaint by the mother of one of the boys, authorities said. He faces one count of abusive sexual contact. He made his first appearance in federal court Tuesday, where his bail was set at $850,000." The AP notes, "During an encounter in the steam room, the boys alleged that Bernsen inappropriately touched himself in front of them. They claim he later followed them to shower stalls where he inappropriately touched them, the affidavit said." The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Mozingo, 918K) adds after the boys' mother reported the alleged incident, "Bernsen went to ship security too, said nothing inappropriate had happened, but promised to stay away from the boys. A Princess Cruise Lines executive called the FBI that day to report 'a possible sexual assault of two 12-year-old boys by a 58-year-old man.' The FBI waited until the ship docked five days later to question and then arrest Bernsen."

Aviation Experts Debate Whether Criminal Charges Should Follow Jet Crashes. USA Today (10/11, Levin) reports, "Two U.S. charter pilots being held in Brazil following a fatal midair collision over the Amazon jungle are at the forefront of the latest debate over whether members of flight crews should face criminal charges in jet crashes, aviation experts said Tuesday. … Criminal investigations after an accident are part of 'an increasing and alarming trend,' said William Voss, president of the Flight Safety Foundation, a safety group. 'This tends to get in the way of the safety investigation, whose purpose is to find the causes and prevent future tragedies,' Voss said." USA adds, "The NTSB determines the 'probable cause' of accidents, but steers away from criminal cases or civil lawsuits. Groups such as the Flight Safety Foundation say that punishing individuals for mistakes does not help prevent accidents."

Prosecutor Drops Assault Charge Against Maryland State Senate President. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Wiggins) reports, "A Baltimore prosecutor dropped an assault charge yesterday against Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., who was accused last month of punching a developer," Leo Bruso, "in the jaw during a" County Council meeting. Gerard B. Volatile, "who was handling the case on behalf of the Prince George's County state's attorney's office, said he did not have enough evidence to move forward with the case. … 'After interviewing numerous potential witnesses, including the witnesses closest to Mr. Bruso at the council hearing and persons in a position to have the best perspective to see what happened, I do not believe that this allegation rises to a criminal matter,' Volatile told District Judge Thurman H. Rhodes yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0078711

Volatile "said that he interviewed more than a dozen potential witnesses and that none corroborated Bruso's account."

Missouri Nursing Home Operator Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/11, Patrick, 300K) reports Missouri nursing home company "American Healthcare Management and its former chief executive officer, Robert Wachter, reaped at least $4 million by slashing care while some patients lay dehydrated, underfed or in their own filth, officials said. One resident was covered in ants, one was bruised from falls, one wandered off across a six-lane intersection and one was beaten to death by an employee. … Wachter, AHM and three nursing homes pleaded guilty Tuesday to one count of conspiring to defraud the federally backed Medicare and Medicaid programs by taking payments for a level of care not provided." The Post-Dispatch notes, "State surveys originally alerted the Department of Health and Human Services to problems, said Roland Corvington, special agent in charge of the FBI at St. Louis, which joined the investigation."

Federal Officials Eye Woman's Property In Prostitution Case. The Washington Times (10/11, Emerling) reports, "Federal officials have filed suit against two California properties owned by a woman whose D.C.-based escort service is the subject of a money-laundering and prostitution investigation. A civil suit filed Oct. 3 by the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District lists two properties owned by Deborah Jean Palfrey -- one in Vallejo and one in Escondido, Calif. -- as subject to forfeiture pending the outcome of the criminal investigation. As of July, the properties were worth $495,000 and $480,000, respectively."

DC Mosque Accuses Financial Manager Of Embezzlement. The Washington Times (10/11, McElhatton) reports, "The Islamic Center of Washington, D.C., one of the most prominent mosques in the country, is accusing its longtime financial manager of embezzling hundreds of thousands of dollars by funneling checks to companies under his control. Farzad Darui of Falls Church was suspended last month as financial manager of the center, according to court records." Officials for the Islamic Center "have told their attorneys that they discovered more than $300,000 in canceled checks since 2000 that were paid by the center to at least two Virginia companies under Mr. Darui's control, court records show. … No criminal charges have been filed in the case."

Chicago Police Question Suspect In Triple Homicide. The Chicago Tribune (10/11, Heinzmann, Meisner) reports, "Chicago police were questioning a suspect Tuesday in the weekend slayings of an 80-year-old grandmother and two of her adult children and the assault of a teenage relative in their South Side home. The male suspect was in custody and charges were expected, but none had been filed Tuesday evening, Chicago police spokeswoman Monique Bond said. She declined to say how long he had been in custody or whether it was believed he acted alone." The Tribune adds, "The bodies of Elnora White, her son Curtis, 56, and her daughter Elnoria Countee, 54, were found Saturday afternoon in their first-floor apartment in the 8100 block of South Green Street in the Auburn Gresham neighborhood, police said. … According to the Cook County medical examiner's office, which conducted autopsies Sunday, Curtis White, who was disabled and found dead in bed, died of stab wounds in his face. Elnora White, who was found on the floor of the dining room, died of blunt trauma wounds. Countee, who was found on her bedroom floor, died of a stab wound in the chest."

Three Year Old Girl's Alleged Shooter Captured. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Winton, Hayasaki) reports, "A 17-year-old gang member accused of intentionally shooting a 3-year-old girl at point-blank range last month was captured by an LAPD-FBI task force in San Bernardino County today after community members gave up his location, police said. Jonathan Banks of Los Angeles was named Monday by the LAPD as the man who killed Kaitlyn Avila and wounded her father, Cesar, during a Sept. 24 attack that stunned the Baldwin Village neighborhood. An alleged accomplice of Banks was arrested Friday."

Liquor Store Owner Fears Reprisals After Tracking Down Gang Members Who Robbed His Store. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Becerra, Winton) reports, "Ten times in the last month, the same group of robbers walked in and hauled away beer, chips and other food. Brandishing a knife, the robbers warned the store's owner: 'We know where you live.' But the owner of the Washington Boulevard shop would not back down. Instead, he installed video cameras around the store to capture images of the robbers. Then he roamed the neighborhood with the photos, getting their identities. The culmination of his detective work came Monday night when undercover Los Angeles police officers watched as several of the young men walked out of the store with two cases of stolen beer. The detectives chased the men and arrested two of them." But now, the store owner is "worried about reprisals."

DOJ_NMG_0078712

Three Men Charged In Robbery Murder. The Washington Post (10/11, B4, Partlow) reports, "Three Prince George's County men have been charged with attempting to rob a 41-year-old man of his backpack and cellphone, then beating him with a baseball bat and fatally shooting him, according to charging documents. The three men -- Timothy McLeod, 20, James D. Brumfield, 19, and Douglas I. Riley Jr., 21 -- are charged with first-degree murder in the killing of Jose Vicente Yaque, who lived along Edmonston Road in the Bladensburg area. They appeared yesterday via teleconference in Prince George's County District Court for a bond hearing."

CIVIL LAW:

Oracle Settles GSA Contract Fraud Charges With DOJ For $98.5 Million. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, B3, Vara) reports, "Oracle Corp. agreed to pay $98.5 million to the U.S. government to settle a lawsuit alleging PeopleSoft Inc., which Oracle acquired last year, overcharged the government on contracts for software and services." The Journal continues, "Under a General Services Administration program, vendors agree to disclose pricing policies for their private-sector customers in exchange for a chance to sell to government customers under one contract. … In this case, during PeopleSoft's negotiation with the government over an initial software contract and two extensions, the company understated the discounts it provided to commercial customers, according to a statement from the Justice Department. That meant most federal purchasers under the contract paid inflated prices between March 1997 and Sept. 2005, the Justice Department said."

The Washington Post (10/11, D3, Rich) reports, "The civil settlement, reached at U.S. District Court in Maryland, was disclosed at a news conference in Washington as officials announced a new task force targeting procurement fraud. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said the task force, established by the department's criminal division, would detect and prosecute fraud associated with increased contracting activity for national security and other government programs." The Post continues, "McNulty said the task force is modeled on efforts to combat fraud after Hurricane Katrina and a similar program he initiated last year when he was U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia. … The settlement with Oracle resolved allegations that PeopleSoft understated to the GSA the discounts it provided to commercial customers. GSA regulations require that a vendor disclose its commercial pricing policies during negotiations for a single contract that can give a vendor access to hundreds of government purchasers."

The AP (10/11, Jordan) reports, "The settlement with Oracle's PeopleSoft kicked off what the department called a crackdown on waste, fraud and abuse in federal contracts. … 'Criminals who cheat the government must be identified, stopped and punished,' Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told reporters in Washington. He estimated that 5 percent of federal agencies' annual revenues is wasted on faulty or otherwise illegal contracts."

The CNET News (10/11, Fried) reports, "The settlement was the largest ever related to the General Services Administration's Multiple Award Schedule program, the Justice Department said. The MAS program requires vendors to provide their commercial pricing information to the government in exchange for the ability to strike deals with hundreds of federal agencies under a single contract. The Justice Department said PeopleSoft's disclosures 'were not current, accurate and complete.' … 'The program works well when vendors follow the disclosure rules and provide GSA with the information it needs to negotiate good prices for government purchasers,' Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in a statement. 'This agreement demonstrates the department's determination to hold vendors accountable for abusing GSA's trust and damaging its programs.'"

CNN.com (10/11, Frieden) reports, "Justice Department officials said the Task Force would be modeled after the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, which they say has been successful in uncovering efforts to defraud the federal government."

Market Watch (10/11, Paige) reports, "The settlement resolved allegations that PeopleSoft provided inaccurate and incomplete pricing information for licenses of its software and related maintenance during negotiations with the government. As a result, federal agencies overpaid for software and maintenance between March 1997 and

DOJ_NMG_0078713

September of last year, according to the Justice Department. … A spokeswoman for Oracle, of Redwood Shores, Calif., said the company cooperated fully with the investigation of the PeopleSoft contract. … 'Oracle was not aware of the suit at the time of the acquisition,' said Deborah Hellinger, the spokeswoman. 'Oracle is pleased to have fully resolved this legacy PeopleSoft suit and all claims under the PeopleSoft contract.'"

High Court Finds For Small Tobacco Firms. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A10, Anderson, O'Connell, 2.03M) reports that Supreme Court was not convinced by 30 states seeking a High Court review of "whether three small tobacco companies can use one lawsuit to challenge state-by-state payment requirements related to a massive 1998 industry settlement. The court's decision not to consider the appeal means the three companies can proceed, in a New York federal court, to challenge payments to state accounts established to cover damages in tobacco lawsuits." The Journal adds, "But Grand River Enterprises Six Nations Ltd. of Gowanda, N.Y.; Nationwide Tobacco Inc. of Blaine, Wash.; and 3B Holdings Inc. of Lewiston, Idaho, challenged the payments in a lawsuit filed in New York, where the master agreement was negotiated and signed by the four major cigarette makers and 46 states. The small companies weren't party to the settlement."

Dow Jones (10/11) reports, "The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in September 2005 that a New York federal trial court could handle the challenge against all of the state escrow fund laws. The 30 state attorneys general said they believe the court decision violates state sovereignty because the tobacco company challenge deals with 30 different sets of state laws. … 'The Second Circuit's ruling...upsets the delicate relationship between the states and the federal courts,' the states said in their appeal."

The AP (10/11, Yost) reports, "The justices' decision allows the companies to continue to fight state laws requiring payments to accounts set up as part of a $206 billion financial settlement eight years ago with the largest tobacco companies. Each of the 30 states had passed a law requiring companies that didn't participate in that settlement to pay into the escrow funds to help cover future damage awards." The AP adds, "The three small companies sued, alleging the states violated antitrust law and the Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution. The laws each state passed were mostly identical to model legislation contained in an appendix to the settlement with the biggest tobacco companies. … The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, the state where the settlement negotiations had taken place, allowed the small companies to pursue the antitrust claims." The AP notes, "In asking the Supreme Court to take the case, the state governments say the appeals court is treating a state's most sovereign act, the passage of legislation, 'as though it were the culmination of a commercial antitrust conspiracy.' … The states wanted the court to consider whether principles of due process and state sovereignty permit a federal judge in New York to exercise jurisdiction over the state attorney general in another state."

Plame Parts Ways With Lawyer In Civil Suit. John McCaslin in his "Inside the Beltway" column in the Washington Times (10/11, 88K) writes that the latest issue of the American Lawyer suggests Valerie Plame's civil lawsuit has no merit as "one theory as to why" she "suddenly parted ways with her attorney, Proskauer Rose partner Christopher Wolf -- her next-door neighbor, no less -- shortly after her civil action was filed against senior Bush administration officials." McCaslin notes, "Headlined 'File and run,' the article quotes lawyer Victoria Toensing, a former chief counsel to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, as saying: 'I'm amazed Proskauer took the case in the first place.'"

US Challenges AIDS Funding Ruling. The AP (10/11) reports, "The Bush administration sought Tuesday to overturn a court decision that lets nonprofit AIDS groups apply for federal funding without signing a pledge opposing prostitution and sex trafficking." The AP continues, "At least one of the groups, DKT International Inc., has refused to sign the pledge because it helps distribute condoms to prostitutes and other sex workers in Vietnam." The AP adds, "DKT last year sued the U.S. Agency for International Development, contending their free speech rights were violated by a 2003 law requiring that they explicitly oppose prostitution and sex trafficking to qualify for part of a $15 billion AIDS program. … In May, U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan sided with DKT, saying the funding conditions insist that groups 'parrot' the U.S. government's position on prostitution. … But the Justice Department, in its appeal Tuesday, called the funding condition 'highly germane' to the overall goal of fighting the spread of AIDS and HIV. … The case now heads to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. A date for arguments has not yet been set."

DOJ_NMG_0078714

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Charges Black Political Leader In Mississippi With Suppressing White Vote. The New York Times (10/11, Nossiter) reports from Macon, MS, "The Justice Department has chosen this no-stoplight, courthouse town buried in the eastern Mississippi prairie for an unusual civil rights test: the first federal lawsuit under the Voting Rights Act accusing blacks of suppressing the rights of whites." The Times continues, "The action represents a sharp shift, and it has raised eyebrows outside the state. The government is charging blacks with voting fraud in a state whose violent rejection of blacks' right to vote, over generations, helped give birth to the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Yet within Mississippi the case has provoked knowing nods rather than cries of outrage, even among liberal Democrats." The Times adds, "The Justice Department's main focus is Ike Brown, a local power broker whose imaginative electoral tactics have for 20 years caused whisperings from here to the state capital in Jackson, 100 miles to the southwest. Mr. Brown, tall, thin, a twice-convicted felon, the chairman of the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and its undisputed political boss, is accused by the federal government of orchestrating -- with the help of others – 'relentless voting-related racial discrimination' against whites, whom blacks outnumber by more than 3 to 1 in the county. … His goal, according to the government: keeping black politicians -- ones supported by Mr. Brown, that is -- in office. … To do that, the department says, he and his allies devised a watertight system for controlling the all-determining Democratic primary, much as segregationists did decades ago."

Parties Agree To Stop Crossover Voting In South Carolina Primaries. The AP (10/11, Davenport) reports, "South Carolina Republican and Democratic party leaders have agreed to swap voter rolls in their 2008 presidential primaries to stop people from casting ballots in both contests." The AP continues, "Neither party likes the idea of voters casting a ballot in both primaries. … 'I don't want people who have voted in their primary attempting to vote in ours,' state Democratic Party Chairman Joe Erwin said Tuesday. … But that might not be an easy task in a state where the parties pay for and run the presidential primaries. Voters don't register by party and State Election Commission spokesman Chris Whitmire said the parties can set whatever rules they want. … 'We don't view it as a real election. We liken it more to a straw poll' that guides delegates at national conventions, he said." The AP adds, "A quarter of presidential primary voters here describe themselves as independents. The Legislature has repeatedly refused to require party registration in the presidential primaries. … The first party to hold a primary will hand over the voter rolls to the other party, leaders said. … Erwin said he's having legal experts look at the plan. … 'I want a legal opinion on whether or not a poll worker can deny anyone from voting because they are looking at a list,' Erwin said. … A U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman on Tuesday could not immediately answer questions about the plan."

Report Finds Little Evidence Of Polling Place Fraud. A preliminary report to the US Election Assistance Commission has found little evidence of the type of polling place fraud many states are instituting new voter registration and identification requirements to stop. USA Today (10/11, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "USA TODAY obtained the report from the commission four months after it was delivered by two consultants hired to write it. The commission has not distributed it publicly. At least 11 states have approved new rules for independent voter-registration drives or requirements that voters produce specific forms of photo ID at polling places. Several of those laws have been blocked in court, most recently in Arizona last week. The House of Representatives last month approved a photo-ID law, now pending in the Senate. The bipartisan report by two consultants to the election commission casts doubt on the problem those laws are intended to address. 'There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling-place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, 'dead' voters, non-citizen voting and felon voters,' the report says."

A separate story in USA Today (10/11, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that these new laws restricting who can register and vote "e have reduced the number of people who may have voted otherwise. Some of those laws have been blocked in court. Even so, critics say, the damage has been done." USA adds, "Advocates of registration and photo identification laws say they are needed to prevent fraud. They say the rules apply to all potential voters, regardless of race, ethnicity, income or ideology."

DOJ_NMG_0078715

SCOTUS Rejects Gay Marriage, Abortion Cases. The AP (10/11) reports, "The Supreme Court refused to intervene Tuesday in a legal fight over same-sex marriage, declining an appeal from a gay California couple who were denied a license to wed." The AP continues, "The justices declined without comment to take the case of Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer of Mission Viejo, Calif. The men had sought a marriage license in southern California's Orange County in 2004 and, after they were turned down, filed a federal lawsuit that challenged federal and state laws against same-sex marriage." The AP adds, "A U.S. District judge said the federal Defense of Marriage Act was constitutional but declined to rule on the state ban because a separate legal challenge is making its way through California state courts. … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed in May that the couple should await the outcome of the state court challenge. .. .Last week, a California appeals court upheld the state ban on same-sex weddings. That case appears headed for the California Supreme Court." The AP notes, "The Supreme Court on Tuesday turned aside the case of Sandra Cano, one of the women behind the legalization of abortion, who had sought to reverse the victory she won 33 years ago. … Cano says she never wanted an abortion and that her difficult early life resulted in her becoming the anonymous plaintiff in Doe v. Bolton, the lesser-known case which the justices ruled on the same day in 1973 as the landmark Roe v. Wade."

Marcus Concerned Over Popularity Of South Dakota Abortion Ban. Ruth Marcus in her column in the Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K) writes that "it's alarming that the vote on repealing the" South Dakota law banning abortions "may be so close. An independent poll in July found 47 percent of voters opposed, 39 percent in favor. But a more recent poll, commissioned by an antiabortion group, showed the gap much narrower, 47 to 44 percent. Four of the eight Republican state senators who had opposed the ban were ousted in primary elections." And the repeal effort, "rather than challenge the law in court, where it would almost certainly be overturned, carries twin risks -- failure and success." And if it is repealed "what happens if and when antiabortion forces come back with a version more palatable to South Dakotans? The July poll showing 47 percent of voters opposed to the ban found that 59 percent would support it with exceptions for rape and incest."

Real Estate Brokerage Accused Of Discriminatory Sales Practices. The New York Times (10/11, Scott) reports, "The National Fair Housing Alliance…charged yesterday that agents in the Brooklyn Heights office of the city's largest residential real estate brokerage, the Corcoran Group, had engaged in discriminatory sales practices, including racial steering and withholding information from African-American clients." The report said "an agent 'produced a map of Brooklyn and drew a red outline of the areas in which the white home seeker should consider living.' The agent used arrows to indicate neighborhoods that were 'changing.'" The Times adds, "Pamela Liebman, president and chief executive officer of Corcoran, said in an interview yesterday that her firm 'has always been devoted to fair housing' and recently required all of its agents to undergo four hours of training in fair housing law and practices. She said, 'I have never been given the specific charges as they relate to the Corcoran Group and I anxiously await them as we intend to defend ourselves vigorously.'"

NYTimes Celebrates US Diversity. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M)in an editorial writes that whoever becomes America's 300 millionth person "should get a bouquet and a thank-you card. It should be signed by President Bush on behalf of a grateful nation that is buzzing with a youthful energy for which the aging powers of Europe would gladly trade their pension obligations. If the newcomer is an immigrant, he or she should also get an apology from Mr. Bush for the scarcity of worker visas, and a promise to get right on that problem." The Times concludes, "Our teeming immensity keeps us from going stale, and despite some people's panic attacks, our population issues have mysterious ways of working themselves out. America has big problems, but it also has 300 million reasons to be hopeful."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Expected To Approve AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The AP (10/11, Dunbar) reports, "The Justice Department is expected to approve AT&T Inc.'s buyout of BellSouth Corp. without attaching any conditions to the deal, three people knowledgeable about the matter said Tuesday. … The proposed merger, now valued at about $78 billion, would create a telecommunications giant with both the largest landline and wireless networks in the nation. A Justice Department official declined to comment on the decision, and the sources who disclosed it declined to be identified because the action had not been formally announced." The AP continues, "The Justice Department is expected to approve the buyout Wednesday despite a plea from the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and other members of Congress that the deal not be allowed to go through until details related to two previous telecommunications mergers are settled and other concerns are addressed."

DOJ_NMG_0078716

Bloomberg (10/11, Rowley) reports, "AT&T, formed last year by SBC Communication Inc.'s takeover of AT&T, is the largest U.S. telephone company. The combination with BellSouth, the third-largest U.S. phone company, would provide service in 22 states. … The Federal Communications Commission is scheduled to vote on the deal two days from now. The FCC typically doesn't act on a takeover before the Justice Department has announced its decision. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has pushed for approving the transaction without conditions."

USA Today (10/11, Davidson) reports, "Justice could still shift course and require some last-minute concessions, these people say. But the department typically acts on telecom mergers before the Federal Communications Commission, which is scheduled to vote on the deal Thursday." US Aadds, "A Justice decision not to require concessions could embolden FCC Democrats to seek even tougher conditions than they might otherwise, say people with knowledge of the situation. They requested anonymity because Justice has not announced its decision. … FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican, has recommended approval without conditions."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A10, Schatz) reports, "Justice Department officials are expected to say that the merger of the two phone giants doesn't pose significant competitive threats that require divestures, conditions or a consent decree, the lawyers said. The Federal Communications Commission has scheduled a vote to approve the deal tomorrow. … The decisions by the Justice Department and FCC to approve the deal quickly come despite bipartisan requests from some congressional leaders to hold off until a federal judge rules on an antitrust review of the mergers last year of SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., and Verizon Communications Inc. and MCI Inc." The Journal notes, "Opponents of the AT&T/BellSouth deal, including smaller phone companies and consumer groups, have complained the deal will result in higher prices for consumers and high-volume business customers. The fact that the government appears to have few qualms about approving the deal so soon after the Baby Bell mergers last year shows how much the communications industry has changed in the 22 years since the government broke up Ma Bell."

Investor Claims Microsoft Helped Utah Firm Finance Linux Litigation. The AP (10/11, Foy) reports, "Microsoft Corp. helped a Utah company raise money for its legal challenge to the open-source Linux operating system, an investor said in a court filing." The AP continues, "In a sworn statement, Lawrence R. Goldfarb, a founder of BayStar Capital Management of Larkspur, Calif., said he invested $50 million in The SCO Group Inc. at the urging of Microsoft executives who promised to guarantee BayStar's investment against any losses. … Goldfarb says Microsoft reneged on the promise. In a statement to The Associated Press, Microsoft denied making any such assurance." The AP adds, "Goldfarb's statement was filed in federal court last week by IBM Corp. as the tech company asked a judge to throw out what remains of a long-running legal battle. SCO sued IBM for $5 billion in 2003, accusing it of donating SCO's proprietary Unix code to Linux developers. … A magistrate, however, has dismissed 182 of SCO's 294 claims against IBM. U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball has scheduled an Oct. 24 hearing to hear SCO's appeal of that ruling."

DOJ Launches Antitrust Probe Of Private Equity Firms. Bloomberg (10/11, Cole) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has begun an informal antitrust inquiry of private-equity firms and their collaboration on leveraged buyouts, a person familiar with the matter said today." Bloomberg continues, "Justice officials in recent weeks sent letters to firms seeking information about deals and business practices, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the probe isn't public. Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners were among those contacted, the Wall Street Journal reported earlier today. … 'It's very serious for the buyouts firms as this investigation could last up to a year,' Sean Boland, co-chair of the antitrust practice at Washington-based law firm Howrey LLP, said in a telephone interview."

The Financial Times (10/11, White, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The US private equity industry was hit on Tuesday by the revelation of a government inquiry into potentially anti-competitive behaviour by some of its top groups. The Department of Justice investigation appears to focus on whether buy-out groups colluded to keep asset prices down in company auctions, according to industry executives. In a letter to buy-out groups including Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Silver Lake Partners the government demanded information about deals dating back to January 2003, people familiar with the requests said on Tuesday. … The DoJ declined to comment, as did Carlyle, KKR, Silver Lake and other private equity groups."

DOJ_NMG_0078717

The New York Times (10/11, Sorkin) reports, "Two rival leveraged buyout firms make bids for the same company. At the 11th hour, one firm drops out of the auction, unwilling to pay more. … The remaining buyout firm is declared the winner. A month later, another company is put up for sale — only this time the two firms that had just been fierce competitors have teamed up to bid together for it. … Friendly competition? Or collusion?" The Times continues, "That question is what the Justice Department appears to be examining as part of a preliminary inquiry into possible anticompetitive behavior in the clubby private equity industry, according to people briefed on the investigation." The Times adds, "Several of the nation's largest firms, including Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, the Carlyle Group, Clayton, Dubilier & Rice and Silver Lake Partners, have received letters from the Justice Department seeking broad information about their business practices and involvements in auctions going back to 2003. … The letters, sent within the last 10 days, appear to be the beginning of a wide-ranging inquiry into private equity, an industry that has become an increasingly powerful force on Wall Street in recent years but remains relatively unregulated. Of particular concern has been the emergence of consortiums in many big buyouts."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C1, Berman, Sender) reports, "When hospital operator HCA Inc. announced a deal to be taken private by a trio of private-equity firms earlier this summer for $21.3 billion, the buyers worried that a rival bidding group would crash the party and force the price higher. But no such bid materialized. … At least some of these rivals held off, say people familiar with the decision making, because they feared a competing bid for HCA would open the door for other firms to jump in on the rivals' own, other buyout deals, these people said. (In other words, you don't bid on my deal, I won't bid on yours.)" The Journal adds, "Such calculations on whether to join forces or face off against competitors have been at the heart of private-equity investing over the last three years. Assessing these rules of engagement in the multibillion-dollar world of corporate buyouts is also part of a new Justice Department inquiry into private equity's auction practices since 2003, according to people familiar with the effort. .. .The inquiry, reported yesterday by The Wall Street Journal, centers on how groups of private-equity firms conduct their bidding in corporate auctions, according to people familiar with letters sent to buyout firms." The Journal notes, "In many of these transactions, powerhouse private-equity firms -- which pool large sums of capital from wealthy investors and institutions -- team up to make bids to take companies private, hoping to cash in by selling them later at a higher price. .. .The inquiry, run by the Justice Department's antitrust division in Manhattan, is preliminary and like other such matters, may eventually lead in a different direction or nowhere at all. Those receiving letters include Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Silver Lake Partners and Carlyle Group, according to people familiar with the matter, and the list is likely to grow."

Judge Delivers Split Ruling In Qualcomm-Broadcom Dispute. The AP (10/11) reports, "Semiconductor maker Qualcomm Inc. violated parts of a patent held by rival Broadcom Corp. that helps cell phones conserve battery power when out of cellular network range, a judge ruled Tuesday. … However, Qualcomm did not infringe two other patents on chips used in cell phones and other wireless devices, according to Charles E. Bullock, an administrative law judge hearing the case in Washington, D.C., on behalf of the International Trade Commission." The AP continues, "Qualcomm had challenged the patents held by Broadcom, but the judge ruled all three patents were valid. .. .The case was brought to the commission by Broadcom, based in Irvine, Calif." The AP adds, "Qualcomm, based in San Diego, said it would appeal the decision to the full commission as it explored designs to replace the disputed technology. … The judge's ruling will go to the full commission next year for a final determination. … Broadcom said it would ask the commission to review the portion of the ruling that favored Qualcomm." The AP notes, "The rival chip makers have 10 suits and countersuits pending in courts from California to Europe over trade and patent issues relating to technologies that power cell phones, Bluetooth devices and wireless Internet equipment. .. Last week, a federal court judge in San Diego ordered the billionaire founders of the feuding companies to face each other behind closed doors to try to resolve their differences. No agreement was struck and the judge was expected to order further sessions."

DOJ_NMG_0078718

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, B3, Clark) reports, "Qualcomm Inc. avoided a tough sanction in a legal skirmish with Broadcom Corp. But the chip makers continue to tangle on multiple fronts and face increasing pressure to reach a settlement. An International Trade Commission administrative law judge ruled that Qualcomm's chips infringed on a Broadcom patent. Judge Charles Bullock stopped short, however, of recommending that cellphones containing the chips be barred from importation to the US. He also ruled that Qualcomm didn't infringe on two other patents that Broadcom had cited. … Although the full ITC could contradict the judge's recommendation in a commission ruling expected in February, Qualcomm investors breathed a sigh of relief after yesterday's ruling. Qualcomm's shares were up 83 cents, or 2.3%, to $37.07 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Broadcom's shares were down 79 cents, or 2.7% to $28.80 on the Nasdaq."

SCOTUS Considers Case Pitting Telecoms Against Pay-Phone Providers. The AP (10/11, Rugaber) reports, "The Supreme Court heard arguments Tuesday in a case that could force telecommunications companies to compensate pay-telephone providers billions of dollars for so-called 10-10-220 calls made by consumers, legal experts said." The AP continues, "The case stems from federal laws and regulations requiring long-distance telephone companies to compensate pay-phone providers for calls that consumers make using special dialing codes, commonly known as 10-10-220 or coinless calls." The AP adds, "Metrophones Telecommunications Inc., based in Washington state, sued Global Crossing Telecommunications Inc. in 2003, alleging that Global Crossing had not fully compensated it for phone calls made from Metrophones pay phones. Metrophones claims Global Crossing owed it $31,330.42 in fees and interest. … While the dollar damages in that particular case are low, at issue is whether companies can sue in federal court over regulatory violations or whether they can only sue over violations of federal laws." The AP notes, "Global Crossing has argued that federal law does not necessarily require long-distance companies to compensate pay-phone providers, but instead directs the Federal Communications Commission to issue rules governing how the pay phone providers would be compensated. Telecom providers Verizon Communications Inc., AT&T Inc. and Sprint Communications have filed briefs in support of Global Crossing."

Sprint Nextel Losing Ground Since Last Year's Merger. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A1, Sharma) reports that since Sprint's Acquisition of rival Nextel last year, "Sprint Nextel Corp. has been losing ground. Millions of its cellphone subscribers have defected to competitors. Its remaining customers have increasingly been switching to less profitable calling plans. Yesterday, amid mounting troubles at Sprint Nextel, former Nextel CEO Tim Donahue said he was retiring as executive chairman. The move came just two months after Len Lauer, Sprint's chief operating officer, was let go after the release of dismal financial results." The Journal adds, "The Sprint-Nextel saga shows the perils of consolidation in an intensely competitive field where technology and customer expectations keep changing quickly. Instead of each company fixing the other one's weakness, the problems have just added up."

Texas Pacific Group, AXA To Buy 60% Stake In TDF. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C4, Singer) reports, "US private-equity firm Texas Pacific Group and one of its investors has clinched a deal to buy a 60% stake in French television and cellphone transmission business TDF SA for about €3.3 billion ($4.16 billion), according to people close to the deal. … The deal will bring fresh money into the company, which is seeing strong growth from the transfer of analog TV signals to digital service. Television transmissions account for the bulk of TDF's business." Texas Pacific Group "is buying the 60% stake with one of its investors, French insurance giant AXA SA."

Google To Pay $1.65 Billion For YouTube. The New York Times (10/11, Sorkin) reports, "Google, the online search behemoth, agreed yesterday to pay $1.65 billion in stock for…YouTube, the video-sharing phenomenon that is the darling of an Internet resurgence known as Web 2.0. … Google is expected to try to make money from YouTube by integrating the site with its search technology and search-based advertising program. But the purchase price has also invited comparisons to the mind-boggling valuations that were once given to dozens of Silicon Valley companies a decade ago. Like YouTube, those companies were once the Next Big Thing, but some soon folded.

DOJ_NMG_0078719

Google, with a market value of $132 billion, can clearly afford to take a gamble with YouTube, but the question remains: How to put a price tag on an unproven business?"

You Tubers' Have Mixed Reaction To Google Purchase. The Washington Post (10/11, D1, Goo) reports, "Dozens of YouTubers turned their cameras on themselves to share their opinions on the sale, while thousands responded to a video posted yesterday by YouTube founders Chad Hurley and Steve Chen. The reaction was mixed and displayed a range of emotions, from outrage and accusations that YouTube had sold out to corporate interests to admiration and optimism that Google will improve it."

Google Move Makes Yahoo Look Out Of Step With Internet Advertising. The New York Times (10/11, Hansell) reports that Google's purchase of YouTube "is making Yahoo look even more out of step with the fast-changing Internet advertising market. Yahoo itself tried to buy YouTube just a few weeks ago and got as close as negotiating price and terms, according to an executive briefed on the discussions. But the talks broke down, and Google swooped in and closed the deal quickly, just as it has in several recent partnership negotiations. Indeed, many Internet executives are noting just how often Yahoo appears to be late and slow, both in its own business and in negotiations with other companies." Google "has neutralized Yahoo's big competitive advantage on Madison Avenue: its ability to sell the full range of advertising, from splashy video campaigns to text ads on search results."

MySpace Looks To Expand Relationship With Google. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A3, Angwin) reports, "News Corp.'s MySpace.com, rebuffed in its effort to bid for YouTube Inc., is seeking to expand its relationship with the company that snatched the video-sharing Web site away, Google Inc. Google Chief Executive Eric Schmidt and Advertising Sales Vice President Tim Armstrong are expected to meet this week in Los Angeles with News Corp. executives, including Chairman Rupert Murdoch, to discuss new ways of working together. One possibility is to expand Google's recently signed ad deal with social-networking site MySpace to include video advertising on the Web." The Journal adds, "Plans for the meeting come just days after Google struck a $1.65 billion deal to buy YouTube, significantly boosting the search titan's presence in the fast-growing Web-video arena. But the deal poses a potential competitive threat to MySpace, which is a direct competitor with YouTube among Web sites that let users post their own content."

ENVIRONMENT:

Lettuce Tests Negative For E. Coli Bacteria.

The Washington Post/AP (10/11, D3) reports that officials of Nunes Co. said lettuces from California that was recalled amid E. coli fears tested negative for the bacteria. Nunes Co. "said multiple samples from among the more than 8,500 cartons of recalled green leaf lettuce tested negative for pathogenic E. coli O157:H7. That strain is the one responsible for the E. coli outbreak linked to spinach that killed at least three people and sickened 199 others. The company ordered the recall after irrigation water tested positive for E. coli. Follow-up testing of water samples determined it did not contain the pathogenic strain of the bacteria. … The Food and Drug Administration is also testing the company's irrigation water. The results should be available late today or tomorrow."

Regulators Urged To Set Guidelines For E. Coli. The Los Angeles Times (10/11) editorializes, "The Salinas Valley grower that recalled 8,500 cartons of lettuce this week did all the right things: The company tested its irrigation water, and when it found E. coli, it took its lettuce off the market even before the tests could show whether it was a dangerous strain. But the current E. coli outbreak, the 20th in a decade, indicates that not all farmers take all the steps they should." The Times adds, "Each time there is an E. coli breakout, the state and the US Food and Drug Administration demand that the industry clean up its act. The industry asks for precise guidelines on what to do, and it gets no answers. Regulators can start by outlining mandatory, common-sense safety practices to protect both public health and farming's reputation."

Federal Court Rulings Hinder Administration's Federal Land Development Strategy.

USA Today (10/11, Kenworthy) reports, "The Bush administration's push for more commercial development on federal land in the West is colliding with the environmental legacy of former president Richard Nixon." USA continues, "In a half-dozen cases since August, federal courts have slapped down the administration's plans to drill for oil and gas in Utah and Alaska, to allow road-building and logging in federal forests, to ease regulation of livestock grazing on public rangeland and to divert water from a Colorado national park." USA adds, "The judges in each case said the administration failed to comply with a landmark environmental law overwhelmingly passed by Congress and signed by Nixon in 1970 called the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA). … The law requires government agencies to study potential environmental consequences of federal projects and to allow citizens to comment on those actions. Agencies must prepare 'environmental impact statements' that can run hundreds of pages, or issue less extensive 'environmental assessments' on minor projects." USA notes, "In its nearly 40-year history, the law has had a broad impact on how government agencies decide on everything from constructing highways to logging forests to building dams. … In recent months, the law has been an effective tool for environmentalists seeking to block initiatives that would allow commercial activities on hundreds of millions of acres of public land."

DOJ_NMG_0078720

EPA Says Texas Copper Plant Illegally Burned Hazardous Waste. The New York Times (10/11, Blumenthal) reports, "A bankrupt copper giant facing billions of dollars in pollution claims across the nation pretended for years to recycle metals while illegally burning hazardous waste in a notorious El Paso smelter, according to a newly released Environmental Protection Agency document." The Times continues, "The agency, in a 1998 internal memorandum, said the company, Asarco, and its Corpus Christi subsidiary, Encycle, had a permit to extract metals from hazardous waste products but used that as a cover to burn the waste until the late 1990's, saving the high costs of proper disposal." The Times adds, "Among the more than 5,000 tons the company was accused of misrepresenting as containing metals for reclamation were more than 300 tons of nonmetallic residues from the former Army chemical warfare depot at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal outside Denver. (It is not clear what the arsenal's material contained.) … 'This activity, plain and simple, was illegal treatment and disposal of hazardous waste,' the environmental agency said in the memorandum, long held confidential but recently obtained by two El Paso environmental groups opposed to the smelter. 'Encycle's own business records provide compelling evidence of sham recycling.'" The Times notes, "Asarco was founded as the American Smelting and Refining Company in 1899 and was bought by Mexican interests in 1999. It has long faced complaints of contaminating broad swaths of downtown El Paso and borderland areas of Mexico with lead and other dangerous metals, and it has been the target of federal, state and local complaints involving at least 94 sites in 21 states. … But although the environmental agency reached a landmark national $20 million cleanup and penalty settlement with Asarco in 1999, the details of the violations had never been disclosed. The El Paso plant was shut down in 1999, but the company is now seeking permission to reopen it."

Ultralow-Sulfur Diesel Fuel To Debut In US Market. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, D9, Spector, 2.03M) reports, "Ultralow-sulfur diesel fuel will start hitting U.S. fuel pumps this month, opening the door for auto makers to expand the use of European diesel technology in U.S. cars and light trucks." The EPA and the Natural Resources Defense Council "yesterday hailed the expected arrival Sunday of ultralow-sulfur diesel fuels and the potential for modern diesel engines to use such fuels to help the U.S. reduce its oil consumption. The new diesel contains 97% less sulfur than the old version, officials said, emitting only 15 parts per million of sulfur, compared with 500 parts per million."

The New York Times (10/11, Barringer, 1.21M) says the Bush Administration "embraced this signal accomplishment as its own, ignoring the origins of the underlying regulation in the 1990's and the fact that it became effective in December 2000, before President Bush took office."

Environmentalist Faces Charges For Destroying Invasive Plant. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Pool) reports, "He has spent decades working to protect Los Angeles' endangered Ballona Wetlands. But did environmentalist Roy van de Hoek go too far when he took his pruning shears to a nonnative tree and plants in the Westside nature preserve? Los Angeles prosecutors say yes. They have filed six vandalism counts against Van de Hoek, alleging that he entered the wetlands without permission and destroyed city parks property when he cut down the invasive plants. If convicted, he could face six years in prison and fines of up to $15,000." Conservationists say "the prosecution is simply payback from those who for years have felt the sting of Van de Hoek's activism. The case, they suggest, is designed to scare away others from actively harvesting invasive plants from local nature preserves."

Supreme Court Upholds Ruling Requiring W.R. Grace To Pay For Asbestos Cleanup.

DOJ_NMG_0078721

The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Verhovek) reports that the Supreme Court yesterday "let stand lower court rulings that require W.R. Grace & Co. to pay a $54.5-million federal bill for asbestos cleanup in a Montana mining town described by federal regulators as one of the nation's most contaminated Superfund sites. The court rejected Grace's appeal of a decision in favor of the Environmental Protection Agency, which sued Grace five years ago to recover the cleanup costs at a vermiculite mine in the town of Libby. The government is also pursuing a criminal case involving several former executives or managers of the mining company for allegedly concealing health risks at the mine. That trial will not begin until next year at the earliest."

The Baltimore Sun (10/11, Connolly) reports, "Grace and seven current and former executives face criminal charges of covering up the extent of the contamination. Their federal trial was supposed to start last month but was delayed until late next year at the earliest, after prosecutors appealed several pretrial rulings. " The Sun adds, "Grace doesn't dispute it has a financial obligation to clean up the contamination. However, the company challenged the EPA's method of calculating the cost. Grace argued that those costs are capped at $2 million unless an analysis is conducted before the cleanup starts to ensure it is done cost effectively. … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals sided with the EPA, and wrote in its Dec. 1, 2005 decision that an 'immediate, aggressive response' was necessary and exempt from any cap. In August, Solicitor General Paul D. Clement issued a statement endorsing the appeals court's decision and urging the Supreme Court not to hear the case."

The AP (10/11) reports, "Grace argued in court papers that the EPA had no authority to hand the company the entire cleanup bill, as well as responsibility for future costs. The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals and a federal district judge sided with EPA, which sued Grace in 2001 to recover cleanup costs. … Grace said others appeals courts have ruled that companies can't be forced to pay the entire cost of cleaning a polluted site without being allowed to challenge whether the cleanup was necessary."

Congress, Bush Move To Cleanup Pacific "Garbage Patch." The Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Clayton, 58K) reports a "garbage patch in the Pacific is double the size of Texas. The president is likely to sign the cleanup law." A "biologically rich coral island chain in the Pacific Ocean northwest of Hawaii, which President Bush designated as a marine national monument, is under assault from floating garbage ranging from plastic bottlecaps to baby diapers." Hailed by "environmentalists as one of the president's most enduring contributions to the environment, the Montana-sized monument includes uninhabited islands home to some 7,000 marine species, at least a quarter of which are found nowhere else on earth. But the new national monument also resides on the edge what marine scientists call the great 'eastern garbage patch:' a section of slowly rotating Pacific Ocean currents - or gyre - double the size of Texas that acts as a giant garbage collector."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Six Indicted In Missouri Cocaine Trafficking Ring. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/30, Ratcliffe, 300K) reported Hillsdale Police Sgt. Christopher Cornell, tow-truck company owner Bruce Gales and alleged drug dealer Bobby Wood were among the six indicted by a federal grand jury on drug trafficking charges. "The FBI spent more than a year watching them, officials revealed…in announcing charges against six men that accuse them of trafficking in more than $2.4 million worth of cocaine. U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said the alleged leader, Wood, 37, arranged for out-of-state couriers to drive through Hillsdale, where…Cornell would stop the vehicles and arrest the drivers." Gales "took the couriers' cars away and then stole the drugs from hidden compartments, the indictments say. Gales allegedly received at least $35,000 for his role." The St. Louis Business Journal (9/29) also reported on the indictments, and the Kansas City Star (9/30, 278K) briefly noted the charges in "Across Missouri."

Baltimore Company's Online Painkiller Sales Lead To Arrests. The Baltimore Sun (10/11) reports that before federal agents "arrested its owners yesterday, Baltimore's Newcare pharmacy appeared to be a phenomenal success." However, authorities say the company this year has already bought 4.8 million doses of the drug commonly known as Vicodin. According to prosecutors, the "amazing performance concealed a lucrative cybercrime: The company sold more than $20 million worth of the painkiller to Internet customers without legitimate prescriptions. … Carl J. Kotowski, assistant special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's Baltimore office, said the operation at Newcare sparked the largest federal pharmaceutical drug investigation in the state's history." The Sun notes that Karen Tandy "told Congress in April that her agency had initiated 100 new Internet investigations involving the online sales of prescription drugs during the last fiscal year, arresting 62 people and seizing $44 million in cash, property, computers and bank account assets."

DOJ_NMG_0078722

Georgia Man Seeks To Return Home Before Drug-Trafficking Trial Begins. The Rome (GA) News-Tribune (10/11) reports a bond hearing "is set in federal court today for Rome businessman Mario Enrique Armas, who pleaded not guilty Oct. 5 to charges of money laundering and possession with intent to distribute more than a ton of marijuana. Armas and his defense team will present witnesses to U.S. District Magistrate Judge Walter L. Johnson showing reason why he should be allowed to return home before his trial. … Armas was arrested last Thursday, culminating what officials said was a two-year investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Drug Enforcement Agency and the Internal Revenue Service's Criminal Investigations Division."

Man Gets Stuck In Tunnel Trying To Enter US From Mexico. The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/10, Baker, Martinez, Kucher) reports 14 people "trying to enter the United States through a storm drain tunnel in Otay Mesa ran into a glitch Tuesday morning, when the third person exiting the narrow opening became stuck." The Union-Tribune says fire crews managed to pull the man out and notes that the San Diego Tunnel Task Force "has been working with Mexican authorities to investigate [border] crossings. The task force is made up of agents from the Border Patrol, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Arizona Couple Facing Federal Drug Charges Relinquishes Church Leadership. The AP (10/10) reports a Pima, Arizona couple "has stepped down as leaders of a church that considers marijuana a sacrament and deity. Dan and Mary Quaintance say pending federal charges against them have made it impossible to properly lead the church. In February, the two were arrested in a car that contained 172 pounds of marijuana in the New Mexican town of Lordsburg near the Arizona state line. … The government contends the church is a front for drug trafficking."

FARC Member's Trial To Begin In DC. The AP (10/11) reports the most senior member "ever captured from Latin America's largest rebel army goes on trial in a U.S. courtroom Thursday for the kidnapping of three Americans - a case that some fear could scuttle moves for the Americans' liberation. The fate of Ricardo Palmera, better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, is to be decided by a federal jury in Washington. … The Palmera prosecution is the latest sign the U.S. government is stepping up its pressure on the FARC, listed by the State Department as 'foreign terrorist organization' in 1997."

Prensa Latina (10/10) reports the trial of Palmera "began Tuesday following a protest for his liberation by mostly U.S. citizens. The protesters consider the trial interference in Colombian affairs and Tom Burke, head of the pro-release committee, says the administration lacks the legal and moral authority to judge him. He added that U.S. taxpayers contribute five billion dollars to Plan Colombia, but they do not wish their country's involvement since they consider it a violation of Colombian laws. In addition, the DEA denied FARC involvement in drug trafficking to the U.S. or terrorism in statements to the Bush Administration, he said." Presna Latina notes that Palmera will be tried in Washington for terrorism, drug trafficking and the death of a U.S. citizen.

US Cracks Down On Illegal Guns In New Orleans. The AP (10/11, Foster) reports, "A day after four people were wounded by gun violence that continues to mar this city's hurricane recovery, local and federal authorities announced their latest attempt to crack down on criminals with guns." The AP continues, "A hot line for reporting illegal firearms is being relaunched, they said at a Tuesday news conference. A similar hot line operated in the 1990s but was eventually discontinued as the city's murder rate declined, police said. The murder rate has picked up this year as the city has repopulated, reaching 113 so far." The AP adds, "Federal law prohibits anyone convicted of a felony from possessing a firearm, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. … 'And there's no early release in federal cases,' Letten said. 'If they're convicted they're going to serve the time.' … Police Chief Warren Riley is counting on that. … 'We have found that through the federal system once they are convicted we don't see them again,' Riley said. 'We have to get the guns and the people with them off our streets if this city is going to come back.'" The AP notes, "In 2005 law officers confiscated 2,787 illegal firearms in New Orleans. Since January, 1,522 have been confiscated, even though the city has only about 40 percent of the population it had before the storm. … 'Everyone knows the problem New Orleans has with gun violence,' Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives special agent Robert Browning. 'We're going after the illegal guns and the criminals who have them.'"

DOJ_NMG_0078723

West Virginia Attorney Sentenced To Six Months For Gun Violations. The Charleston Gazette (10/11, Searls) reports, "Dante di Trapano was sentenced to six months in prison Tuesday, after pleading guilty earlier to being a drug addict in possession of firearms. … Chief U.S. District Judge David Faber gave di Trapano the maximum time for the crime, after deciding government prosecutors could not prove the seven handguns found in di Trapano's Johnson Road, Charleston, residence were not collector's items." The Gazette continues, "He also sentenced di Trapano to three years of supervised release that will include special criteria to be worked out with the federal probation office and a $10,000 fine. … 'I think this is an extremely close call,' Faber said in ruling di Trapano had purchased the guns as collector items. He added, 'I believe [di Trapano] has just made the preponderance test.'" The Gazette adds, "Di Trapano, a Charleston lawyer and former agent for National Football League wide receiver Randy Moss, has already served about three months in jail, time that he will be given credit for by the federal Bureau of Prisons. … Monica Dillion, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, had called several witnesses in an effort to show di Trapano used the guns for protection because he had a large stash of drugs in his residence. … Prosecutors also failed to show there were drugs in the residence when it was raided last April. Initially, the government said field tests showed a white powder residue on a laptop computer was cocaine. Laboratory tests, however, showed that was not so. … But Faber also showed his disdain for the defendant, noting he did not tell the truth when testifying in September about cocaine use. Faber had released di Trapano on bond in August to receive drug treatment, but revoked that after an initial urine tests showed he had used cocaine."

Washington Gang Sweep Nets 40 Arrests. The Seattle Times (10/11, Green) reports, "Federal and local law enforcement officials today announced the arrests of 40 violent gang leaders, half of whom were taken into custody in the last week." The Times continues, "In a four-month investigation dubbed 'Operation Crackdown,' members of the Violent Gang Task Force - which is led by the local office of the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) targeted violent gang members suspected in a rash of drive by shootings, narcotics deals and other offenses. The task force also includes members of Seattle police, the King County Sheriff's Office and the FBI." The Times adds, "At a news conference in the Henry M. Jackson Federal Building in downtown Seattle, ATF Special Agent in Charge Kelvin Crenshaw gestured to an assortment of assault rifles and pistols laid out before him. … 'What's so unique about these firearms is that they were actually found in the possession of individuals,' he said. 'They weren't lying on a bed or leaning against a chair… these people were carrying them around.' … Of the 40 people arrested, 10 are facing federal charges, including two who will be charged as armed career criminals; a federal statute that carries a mandatory 15-year prison term for anyone caught with a firearm after previously being convicted of three violent crimes or drug distribution charges, said Andrew Friedman, an assistant U.S. Attorney who is coordinating the office's gang prosecutions."

IMMIGRATION:

High Court Refuses To Hear Deportation Appeal Of Former Nazi Guard. McClatchy Newspapers distributes a Detroit Free Press story (10/11, Ashenfelter) that reports, "An 86-year-old former Nazi concentration camp guard who lives in Michigan and has Alzheimer's disease could be deported following the U.S. Supreme Court's refusal to review his case Tuesday. .. .It remains to be seen, however, whether the Justice Department will follow through with deportation proceedings against Iwan Mandycz of Sterling Heights, given his age and medical condition. Court records say Mandycz is incompetent." The Free Press continues, "Mandycz was stripped of his citizenship last year for not telling U.S. authorities before emigrating that he was a guard at two Nazi labor camps in Poland during World War II, including one where 14,000 Jews were murdered in a single day. … Mandycz, who emigrated in 1949, has denied being a Nazi camp guard."

DOJ_NMG_0078724

The AP (10/11) reports, "The Justice Department succeeded in revoking the U.S. citizenship of 86-year-old Iwan Mandycz. He could face deportation. His lawyers say the right that prevents the U.S. government from prosecuting a mentally incompetent person also should apply to citizenship cases, which are civil proceedings. … 'The accused should be able to assist in the preparation of his defense and consult with his attorneys before he may be punished by the government,' Mandycz's lawyers said in a filing that had asked the Supreme Court to take the case." The AP adds, "The Justice Department, which wants to remove him from the United States, initiated denaturalization proceedings, saying Mandycz had concealed that he worked for the Nazis. … Officials said that Mandycz was a guard in 1943 at the Trawniki and Poniatowa labor camps in Poland, where prisoners were starved, beaten and executed en masse. … Mandycz has denied working at the camps and has said he spent World War II working at his parents' farm in Poland and, later, as a forced laborer at a farm in Austria."

The Detroit News (10/11, Lynch) reports, "Fifty-one years ago, Iwan Mandycz became a U.S. citizen. On Tuesday, his last chance at remaining one appeared to slip away. … The U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear the case of the 86-year-old Sterling Heights resident, whom the U.S. Department of Justice has targeted for deportation because of his past as a Nazi prison guard." The News adds, "Federal prosecutors believe Mandycz was a guard for six months in 1943 at the SS prison camp Poniatowa in Poland. In that year, the Nazis conducted 'Operation Harvest Festival' -- a plan to kill Jews. A total of 42,000 Jews were killed. … Mandycz arrived in the United States in 1949 and became a citizen six years later. He has denied being a Nazi prison guard despite being identified as such by two former guards." The News notes, "In March 2005, a U.S. District Court judge ruled Mandycz was in fact a guard at the prison and stripped him of his citizenship. … 'I can't imagine what would be accomplished by deporting him at his age,' said Mandycz' neighbor, Eugene Winowski. 'But at the same time, I also understand the flip side -- everything (Jewish prisoners) went through -- you can't ignore that.'"

Groups Seek Freedom For Immigrant Detainees In California. The AP (10/11) reports, "Several legal advocacy groups asked a federal judge to order the immediate release of four immigrants who have been detained for months or years without receiving a hearing on why they're being held so long." The AP continues, "The motion filed Friday asks U.S. District Judge Terry Hatter to release the detainees under conditions of supervision or grant them hearings." The AP adds, "The move followed a class-action lawsuit filed Sept. 25 on behalf of six detainees by the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California, the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project and the Stanford Law School Immigrants' Rights Clinic. Two detainees have since been released. … The lawsuit alleges the U.S Department of Homeland Security held immigrants for long periods despite court rulings that banned indefinite detention."

Bush Seen As Avoiding Immigration Issue On Campaign Trail. The Washington Times (10/11, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Immigration is a dominant issue in congressional races from Arizona to Michigan to Pennsylvania -- just about everywhere but where President Bush is on the campaign trail. After having pressed all year to get a broad immigration bill, including legal status for illegal aliens from Congress, Mr. Bush now ignores the issue at campaign events and fundraisers, and Vice President Dick Cheney has even dropped what used to be a regular reference to immigration from his campaign stump speech." The Times adds, "It's an odd mixed message, given that many Republicans are running heavily -- and in some cases almost exclusively -- on the issue, promising an enforcement-first approach and attacking Democrats for supporting citizenship for illegal aliens." White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino "said they think the election will be decided on other issues. 'While immigration is an important issue, this election is also about the philosophical choices facing voters this November when it comes to national security and keeping taxes low,' Mrs. Perino said." She added that Bush "has been consistent in pushing for a broad approach 'because he believes that that is the only way to solve any of the individual immigration reform bills.'" But "most Republicans in Congress disagree, preferring an enforcement-first approach, of which the border fence is crucial."

Lawmakers Press Administration To Build Fence. The Washington Times (10/11, Seper, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Bush has signed off on a small down payment for a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, but legislators and fence advocates worry the barrier will never be fully funded and fear a lack of White House commitment." Lawmakers, " including Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee," are "forcefully reminding the Bush administration and Homeland Security officials that Congress' 'directive' that the fence be built is not optional." Hunter told the Times, "We didn't put the fence as a goal or an option or something that should be mixed with other solutions, we made it mandatory. … It is not an option for the Department of Homeland Security. What part of 'shall' don't they understand?"

DOJ_NMG_0078725

Banks Reaching Out to Illegals. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, B1, Jordan, 2.03M) reports, "As .. leaders craft policies to curb illegal immigration from Mexico, the US Federal Reserve is devising programs to extend banking services to undocumented immigrants. A new remittance program aims to bring Mexican migrants who send money home into the mainstream U.S. financial system, regardless of their immigration status." Dubbed "Directo a Mexico," the remittance program "enables US commercial banks to make money transfers for Mexican workers through the Federal Reserve's own automated clearinghouse, which is linked to Banco de Mexico, the Mexican central bank." To use the service, "a Mexican need only possess a matricula consular, an I.D. issued by the Mexican consulate in most major US cities to those with proof of Mexican birth or citizenship, or a picture ID card issued by the US or another foreign government. T he idea is to make it cheaper and safer for Mexican workers to send funds to their relatives."

Illegals Stuck In Cross-Border Pipeline. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Marosi, 918K) reports, "More than a dozen illegal immigrants were briefly trapped inside a cross-border pipeline structure Tuesday after a man got stuck in the narrow passageway and had to be rescued by San Diego firefighters." The immigrants "were crawling through a passageway connecting a Mexican-based industrial gas supplier with a holding tank on the U.S. side, according to Lauren Mack, spokesperson for Immigration and Customs Enforcement." This is "believed to be the first time in the San Diego area that migrants have been caught using an existing subterranean passageway that appears to be privately owned."

TAX:

Many US Expatriates Face Tax Increase This Year. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, D1, Herman, Spencer) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "The US Treasury Department removed part of the sting from a recent law that boosted taxes for many Americans working overseas, but many US expatriates still are facing sharp tax increases this year. A new Treasury notice allows Americans to deduct or exclude from their US taxes more of the cost of housing in many foreign locations, where rents frequently are higher than in the US, than they otherwise would have. Accountants say this new relief varies widely from place to place. Still, the revised rule, announced by Treasury in a notice issued Friday, offsets only a fraction of the higher tax bills that many individuals must pay this year. Among those hit the hardest are Americans with relatively high incomes working in places with high housing costs and low taxes, such as Hong Kong, and whose employers don't protect them from the additional tax cost of working abroad."

Minister Fights To Preserve Religious-Based Tax Breaks. The New York Times (10/11, Henriques, 1.21M) reports that for thousands of ministers, the Rev. Rick Warren will be remembered "as their champion in a fight over the most valuable tax break available to ordained clergy members of all faiths: an exemption from federal taxes for most of the money they spend on housing, which typically represents roughly a third of their compensation. Pastor Warren argued that the tax break is essential to poorly paid clergy members who serve society." The housing deduction "is one of several tax breaks that leave extra money in the pockets of clergy members and their religious employers. Ministers of every faith are also exempt from income tax withholding and can opt out of Social Security. And every state but one exempts religious employers from paying state unemployment taxes -- reducing the employers' payroll expenses but also leaving their workers without unemployment benefits if they are laid off."

Religious Activists Have Long Legislative Wish List. The New York Times (10/11, Henriques, 1.21M) reports that some "advocates for religious freedom" say "government must do more to protect religious institutions of all kinds from the hostile environment of modern America. A Congressional wish list supported by some religious leaders and other advocacy groups would accomplish that. One bill, H.R. 235, would exempt churches and other religious institutions — but not secular nonprofits — from the I.R.S. rule against partisan political endorsements by tax-exempt organizations." H.R. 27 "would grant religious employers even more leeway to discriminate on religious grounds in their hiring." H.R. 2679 would "prohibit the courts from awarding damages, lawyers' fees or costs to any plaintiff who successfully sues over possible violations of the establishment clause of the First Amendment." The Public Prayer Protection Act, H.R. 4364, "would protect the right of government officials 'to express their religious beliefs through public prayer' by barring federal courts, including the Supreme Court, from hearing lawsuits raising constitutional objections to those prayers." The Workplace Religious Freedom Act "would amend the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to require employers to be more accommodating to the religious observances of their employees." H.R. 1054, "would transform into law the executive orders that created President Bush's 'faith-based initiative,' to make federal grants and contracts more available to religious groups."

DOJ_NMG_0078726

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Warns Democrats Would Raise Taxes.

The AP (10/11, Loven) reports President Bush "portrayed Democrats on Tuesday as the party of big spending and high taxes, aiming to give increasingly endangered Republicans an edge in a midterm election debate dominated recently by congressional scandal and overseas crises." Speaking at a fundraiser for former Georgia Republican Rep. Mac Collins, Bush said, "If you want to keep your tax cuts, vote Republican on Nov. 7." The AP adds Collins is "challenging Rep. Jim Marshall, seen as one of the most vulnerable Democratic incumbents." Bush said, "Do we keep taxes low so we can keep this economy growing? Or do we let the Democrats in Washington raise taxes and hurt the economic vitality of this country? ... This decision will have a huge impact on the working people all across the United States of America." The AP adds the "taxes-and-terrorism pillars of the GOP midterm election strategy, the mainstays of Bush's campaign-trail speeches, have been partially drowned out of late."

Rangel, Reid, Baucus Deny Democrats Have Plans To Boost Taxes On Middle Class. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (10/11), Rep. Charles Rangel says, "President Bush and Republican campaign committees have attacked Democrats with a claim that we would raise taxes if elected to a majority in Congress. That's not true. Democrats have a long history of supporting targeted relief for middle-income families. In fact, many of the tax benefits extended by this administration began as Democratic initiatives." Democrats "want to pursue new priorities to strengthen relief for middle-class families that have been left behind during the Bush administration."

In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (10/11), Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and Sen. Max Baucus say, "The president, the majority party in Congress, and now your editorial page are attempting to convince the American public that Democrats are intent on increasing their taxes. We find it curious that Democrats are being accused of planning to increase taxes on middle-income families when decisions made by the current majority have already done so. Those in charge of the Congress now deliberately chose not to extend middle-class tax relief -- such as the deductions for college tuition, state and local sales taxes, and teachers' out-of-pocket classroom expenses -- before Congress adjourned for the elections. And President Bush's fiscal year 2007 budget failed to include relief beyond 2006 from the increasingly middle-class Alternative Minimum Tax."

White House Touts Shrinking Budget Deficit. Under the headline "Painting A Rosy Budget Picture," the Washington Post (10/11, A6, Abramowitz, Baker, 748K) reports, "The federal budget deficit shrank from $318 billion to less than $260 billion in the fiscal year that concluded in September, officials disclosed yesterday. It marks the second year in a row that the deficit has declined after ballooning in the early years of the Bush administration." White House officials "hailed the improving short-term budget picture as a vindication of President Bush's tax-cutting agenda, though the long-term prospects are considerably bleaker, given the escalating costs of health-care and retirement programs and, in the view of many economists, the red ink produced by tax cuts." The President "will step up his efforts to tout the economy at a White House event Wednesday, when officials said he will announce that he has met his target of cutting the deficit in half over five years -- three years ahead of schedule." But Robert D. Reischauer, "former director of the Congressional Budget Office and now president of the Urban Institute, gave the tax cuts little credit because the economic effect of putting that money back into the economy was offset by the debt incurred from extra spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and relief from Hurricane Katrina." Reischauer "agreed that revenue is stronger than most observers expected. "But what we're seeing is the calm before the storm," he said. 'Everyone knows that the current revenue and spending structures taken together will be unsustainable as the baby-boom generation begins to enter its retirement years.'"

DOJ_NMG_0078727

In Fiscal 2006, Medicaid Saw Smallest Spending Boost In A Decade. The Washington Post (10/11, A3, Lee, 748K) reports, "Medicaid spending rose by 2.8 percent in fiscal 2006, the smallest increase in a decade, according to a study released yesterday by the nonprofit Kaiser Family Foundation." At the same time, "state tax revenue grew by 3.7 percent as the economy continued to improve, the survey of 50 states and their Medicaid directors found." The Post adds, "Together those trends signal that the state-federal program that pays for health care for the poor and disabled is emerging -- at least temporarily -- from a period in which many states limited eligibility, benefits and reimbursement rates for health-care services in a drive to corral costs. For 2007, only five states plan to restrict eligibility, while 26 indicated they will restore benefits, relax application and enrollment restrictions and undertake new outreach efforts."

DOE Says Most Home Heating Costs Will Drop This Winter. The Energy Department's report that natural gas home heating costs will be lower this winter received considerable coverage, almost all of it portraying the news in a positive light. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 8, Williams, 9.87M) reported that during "that horrible spike in energy prices" a "few months ago," a "whole lot of Americans were fearing this coming winter, but sharp drops in oil and natural gas prices combined with a mild winter forecast are bringing some good news on that front tonight." ABC World News (10/10, story 9, 2:15, Potter, 8.78M) said DOE "says if you use natural gas, you can expect to save $119 compared to last winter. Electric and oil heat should cost slightly more, but fewer Americans use them."

The Washington Post (10/11, D1, Tse, 748K) reports that "as consumers revel in plummeting gas prices," the report from DOE's Energy Information Administration "offered another pleasant surprise: lower heating bills this winter. For the first time since the 2001-02 season, natural gas bills are expected to drop by an average of 13 percent." But "consumers using other fuels won't fare as well, according to the report. Households heated by electricity are likely to see their bills increase by an average of 7 percent, or $58, because of the higher costs late last year for fuels for electricity generation and the loosening of caps on rates. People who use heating oil can expect to pay 6 percent, or $91, more this winter. Users of propane, however, can expect an average decrease of 1.1 percent, or $15, in their heating bills."

The New York Times/AP (10/11) reports EIA "based its predictions on its forecast of a mild winter for most of the nation and its assessment of energy supplies and costs as the nation's oil and natural gas production and refinery output recover from hurricane damage in 2005." USA Today (10/11, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) said that "although this winter is expected to be warmer than normal in most of the USA, it is still expected to be colder than last year, which was exceptionally mild."

The Washington Times (10/11, Hill, 88K) says economists said consumers "are set to enjoy an energy dividend just in time for the holidays." The Chicago Tribune (10/11, Manor, 623K) says "it is by no means a sure thing, but your heating bill this winter could be a bit more reasonable than last year." But in one of the few negative reports, the Houston Chronicle (10/11, Ivanovich, 535K) says that while consumers "are likely to get some relief in their heating bills this winter, they should still expect to pay substantially more than they did just two years ago. In fact, if the government's energy forecasters are correct, ratepayers will still be paying nearly 30 percent more this winter than they did on average between 2000 and 2005." The Los Angeles Times (10/11, 918K) and Bloomberg (10/10, Smith, Tuttle) run similar reports.

Administration's Effort To End Homelessness Said to Neglect Rural Areas. The New York Times (10/11, Archibold, 1.21M) reports that as the Bush Administration "promotes a widely praised multibillion-dollar effort to end chronic homelessness in cities like Washington and San Francisco, a growing outcry is rising from rural areas that worsening problems far away from urban centers are being overlooked." Rural homelessness "has always taken a back seat to the more glaring problems in cities. Most studies estimate homeless people in small towns account for about 9 percent of the 600,000 or so homeless nationwide." But local officials "and advocates for the homeless in small towns say that economic distress in recent years, including closing plants, failing farms, rising housing costs and other troubles, has left more people without homes and in greater need of help."

Defense Contractors Consider Murtha As Majority Leader. The Hill (10/11, Tiron) reports, "The defense industry is assessing the impact that Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) will have on its fortunes if the Democrats retake the House in the midterm election. ... some within the industry believe that Murtha could be the man with whom to hedge their bets." Murtha has paradoxically become "a vehement critic of a war that has boosted defense contractors' coffers, but also a staunch supporter of a military and defense industry fed on big-ticket programs and well-placed earmarks." Industry insiders ponder his behavior if he becomes majority leader or chair of the defense appropriations committee: "As a majority leader, Murtha would bring defense to the forefront and stave off cuts that the Democrats have traditionally made, some industry insiders say. In such a position, Murtha would determine how the budget is put together and the amendments that would come to the floor, but he would lose the day-to-day touch on the appropriations committee, which to the defense industry is more important, said an industry source."

DOJ_NMG_0078728

DeMint Expected To Head GOP Steering Committee. The Hill (10/11, Allen) reports Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) "is in line to take the reins of the Republican Steering Committee, a cabal that serves as the base for conservative activism in the upper chamber." The Steering Committee "would play a much different role in the institution if Republicans are cast into the minority. The secretive committee now seeks to pressure GOP leaders to adopt more conservative policies, but it once served to block the liberal priorities of a Democratic majority." DeMint, "chosen for the job through an informal process, is a fierce partisan warrior who has one foot in leadership circles and the other in conservative circles. That combination could make him an effective leader whether Republicans retain control of the Senate or not."

FAA Administrator Seeks To Strengthen Agency's Public Profile. Al Kamen in his "In the Loop" column in the Washington Post (10/11, A17, 748K) writes, "Federal Aviation Administration chief Marion C. Blakey worries that people have been confusing her agency with the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), or worse, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA)." So in September she "signed an order establishing the FAA 'Branding Identity Program' (FAABIP) to clarify matters. The FAA does so many wonderful things, she notes in a cover message to the order, 'but it has not received proper credit for all the good work it does in so many areas because it does not have a strong brand identity.'"

Stalled Postal Reform Bill Examined. Stephen Barr, in his "Federal Diary" column in the Washington Post (10/11, D4, 748K), writes that National Association of Letter Carriers president William Young feels "badly" about "blocking legislation to overhaul the U.S. Postal Service. But he emphasized that his union members were his highest priority, making it impossible for him to accept a provision that would single out injured postal employees for different worker compensation rules than other federal employees." He "said that he was trying to contact Sen. Susan Collins (R), the chief sponsor of a compromise bill, who is traveling in her home state of Maine, 'to determine where our communications failed.'" While "the bill has drawn little public attention, it represented a decade-long effort to revamp Postal Service business operations."

NYTimes Urges High Court To Uphold Ruling On Courtroom Photos. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M)in an editorial writes, "When Mathew Musladin went on trial for murder, members of the victim's family sat near the jury every day wearing buttons with the dead man's photograph. A federal appeals court held that those buttons in the courtroom deprived Mr. Musladin of a fair trial. The Supreme Court is hearing arguments in his case today. It should affirm the appeals court's ruling."

WPost Calls For Increasing Federal Funding For Education. The Washington Post (10/11, A18, 748K) in the seventh editorial in an occasional series on inequality writes, "Some commentators, pointing to the fact that schools in low-income districts already spend more per pupil than schools in affluent ones do, argue that failures at poor schools reflect complacent management rather than a lack of resources. Signaling at least partial acceptance of that theory, the Bush administration has tried to improve schools by holding them accountable and subjecting them to competition. Choice and accountability are attractive in principle, but studies of voucher programs in New York City, Milwaukee and Cleveland have found negligible gains from them. Costlier interventions must also be part of the solution." The Post argues for increasing spending on Head Start citing a "range of" studies that show "that high-quality programs have lasting effects on poor children. Upgrading the 900,000 children in Head Start programs to something like the Perry program might require around $2 billion a year, according to W. Steven Barnett of Rutgers University. But quality preschools reduce spending on special education, jails and welfare, saving money for society in the long term." The Post also argues for investing "in K-12 education directly. Although it's true that low-income districts already spend more per pupil than do rich ones, this slight advantage is swamped by the challenge of teaching poor children, who on average have more discipline problems and require more remedial attention -- and will continue to do so even if preschool is improved."

DOJ_NMG_0078729

OTHER NEWS:

Mortgage Debt Said To Color Voters' Perceptions Of The Economy. The Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Trumbull, 58K) reports the "health of the economy is the subject of a major clash in which voters are hearing starkly different views." Last week, President Bush said, "Today we got more good news," citing "lower unemployment, rising wages, and the creation of 6.6 million new jobs since August 2003." The Democratic National Committee "fired back in a statement" that "the Bush economy has been marked by falling wages and anemic job numbers that don't even keep up with population growth." The Monitor adds, "The numbers, shorn of partisan interpretation, point to an economy that is neither collapsing on its own weakness nor lifting all Americans to new heights of prosperity. In this climate, marked by the subsidence of an epic housing boom, personal debt may be the dividing line between those who are better off and those who are falling behind." It "could be especially tough on people who stretched to buy a home. A cooling real estate market means that rising home values have stopped adding to families' net worth, for now. Meanwhile, their monthly payments can jump by several hundred dollars as adjustable loan rates reset." This election cycle, Democrats "hope to capitalize on that edge of anxiety, the darker side of a housing-fueled economic expansion." Republicans, "struggling to maintain a majority in Congress and their governorships, are playing up brighter aspects of the economy, including a recent drop in energy prices."

Economy Taking Precedence Over Culture Issues In Ohio Gubernatorial Race. The Washington Post (10/11, A1, Fletcher, 748K) reports in a front page story that in the Ohio gubernatorial race, "The culture wars are being eclipsed as a voting issue by economic worries and Republican scandals that have altered the political dynamic here in striking ways. Several polls find" Republican Ken Blackwell "trailing his Democratic opponent, five-term Rep. Ted Strickland, by double digits with less than four weeks to go until the Nov. 7 midterm elections." The "difficulty Blackwell is experiencing winning support for his socially conservative message reflects the anxiety evident this year among voters in Ohio and elsewhere, some pollsters say." Strickland, "an ordained but non-practicing minister, has built his lead by speaking about the economic distress of this manufacturing state and by painting his opponent as a loyal soldier of a scandal-plagued Ohio Republican Party. At the same time, he is directly challenging Blackwell for values voters in ways that many analysts believe Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry did not two years ago."

Fed Governor Reconsiders Housing Slowdown. The Financial Times (10/11, Guha, Mackenzie) reports, "Influential voices inside and outside the Federal Reserve are challenging the notion that the US economy is heading for a deepening housing-led slowdown, cheering equity investors and sending bears in the bond market into retreat. The thesis, put forward by Fed vice-chairman Don Kohn last week, and endorsed by Alan Greenspan, the former Fed chairman on Friday, argues that the trough in housing market activity could be near, and that the economy should come through it in reasonable shape." Financial Times notes that while Kohn "argued that a sharp correction in construction activity and new home price inflation could soon bring down inventories and stabilise residential investment," "some experts" are "skeptical." For example, Fannie Mae chief economist David Berson "said inventories remained high, and there could be a significant decline in investor demand."

Falling Housing Prices Could Put Damper On Consumer Spending. In his column in the Washington Post (10/11, 748K), Robert J. Samuelson writes, "With fewer buyers, home construction, sales and prices have weakened. In August housing starts were 20 percent lower than a year earlier. Last year, sales of new and existing homes totaled almost 8.4 million; next year the NAR expects 7.4 million. Construction workers, real estate agents and mortgage bankers will lose jobs. Consumer spending will also suffer as the borrowing and buying against rising real estate values subsides." Seeing an "endgame" in the real estate market, Samuelson opines, "Even a leveling of home prices suggests that Americans will save more from current income and spend less. Up to a point, that's okay, especially if the lost spending is offset by higher exports and business investment. … Moody's Economy.com forecasts falling prices in 100 metro areas and an average decline of 3.5 percent next year -- the first annual drop since the Great Depression, says chief economist Mark Zandi. There's the endgame's true danger: If prices drop too much or too persistently, the damage to confidence and spending won't be easily neutralized."

DOJ_NMG_0078730

S&P500 Firms Expected To Post 18th Consecutive Quarter Of Double-Digit Earnings Growth. USA Today (10/11, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Nothing, it seems, can slow the unprecedented boom in corporate earnings." Companies in "the Standard & Poor's 500 index on average are expected to post 14% higher profits in the third-quarter season, which unofficially kicked off Tuesday when Alcoa reported 86% higher profit of $537 million and biotech Genentech posted 58% higher profit of $568 million." If "earnings come in as expected, it'll be the 18th-consecutive quarter of double-digit earnings growth, S&P says. The unprecedented streak began just before the bear market ended four years ago this week and is a big reason the stock market has powered back, with the Dow Jones industrials on Tuesday closing at a new record of 11,867 and the S&P 500 setting another 5½-year high."

Stock Markets Finish Higher As Oil Futures Continue To Fall. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 6, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Turning to Wall Street today. Stocks turned slightly higher. They claimed another record. The Dow was up a little over 9 points [to close at 11,867.17]. NASDAQ was up almost 4 points [to close at 2,315.43]."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C1, McKay, 2.03M) reports stocks "nudged higher, helped by cheaper crude oil but hobbled by falling bond prices." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "gained 9.36 points, or 0.1%, to finish at a new closing high of 11867.17, up 10.7% on the year. It was the fifth gain in six days." As has "often been the case in recent days, crude prices fluctuated amid shifting expectations about a possible production cut by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries." Traders "increasingly suspected that Saudi Arabia, OPEC's largest producer, opposes a cut. Crude futures for November delivery plummeted $1.44, or 2.4%, to $58.52 a barrel, off 4.1% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange." The "broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.2%, or 2.76 points, to 1353.42, up 8.4% on the year."

Exposure Of Foley's Internet Contact With Pages Included Effort By Democrats. The Washington Post (10/11, A4, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Two of the news media's sources of Mark Foley's sexually explicit instant messages to former House pages said this week that they came forward to expose the Florida congressman's actions, not to help the Democrats in the midterm elections." But there "are indications that Democrats spent months circulating five less insidious Foley e-mails to news organizations before they were finally published by ABC News late last month, which prompted the leaking of the more salacious instant messages. Harper's Magazine said yesterday that it obtained the five e-mails from a Democratic Party operative, albeit in May, long before the election season." The "most sexually explicit material -- the instant messages that forced Foley's abrupt resignation on Sept. 29 and turned his actions into a full-fledged scandal -- appears to be disconnected from politics. The two former pages who revealed the correspondence to ABC News and The Washington Post, however, may never have come forward had Democratic operatives not divulged the five more benign e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana boy."

Foley Scandal Said To Have Left GOP In "Disarray." The Financial Times (10/11, Yeager) reports Republican leaders "scrambled on Tuesday to contain the fallout from a Capitol Hill ethics scandal amid growing evidence that the episode, and deepening dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq, will lead voters to support Democrats in the next month's midterm elections." A Washington Post-ABC News poll "showed registered voters favoured Democratic candidates over Republican candidates in House races by 54 per cent to 41 per cent, an advantage matched in several other new studies of public opinion." GOP officials "had hoped to use the final month of campaigning to highlight Republicans' stance on national security. But the public appears to be increasingly displeased with President George W. Bush's handling of Iraq, with strong majorities saying the war was not worth fighting. At the same time, Republicans have been in disarray for 10 days, plagued by questions about the handling of explicit electronic messages sent by" former Rep. Mark Foley.

AFP (10/11, Raab) reports polls "out four weeks before US Election Day showed Democrats wielding a solid lead in the race to control the US Congress, sending Republicans who now control the legislature scrambling." Conservative commentator Bill Bennett "told the National Review," "Now is the time for all good men -- and women -- to come to the aid of the party." The AFP adds the GOP is "worried socially conservative voters may stay home."

DOJ_NMG_0078731

Minnesota Voters Said To Be Interested In Substance, Not Washington Politics. The New York Times (10/11, Clemetson, 1.21M) reports that for residents of Anoka, Minnesota "interviewed here over two days at coffee shops and bars, schools and small businesses, on sidewalks and at kitchen tables, the topics that have had Washington hopping in the final weeks before the midterm elections — Congressional scandals, new books saying there was administration in-fighting over the war in Iraq — were little more than distant political chatter, best tuned out." The "conclusions drawn by Republicans and Democrats alike sounded a similar theme: People craved substance and not rhetoric, wanting to hear about the nuts and bolts of national issues like health care, local ones like a proposed light rail system and international concerns like a better strategy for the war in Iraq."

More Commentary. In a USA Today op-ed (10/11) titled "People Like Foley Are Gays' Worst Nightmare," novelist and playwright Steve Kluger says, "Thirty years ago, singer, former beauty queen and human being Anita Bryant sat before Florida's Dade County Metro Commission and demanded the repeal of the recently passed ordinance that prohibited discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation." From "the day he was sworn in as the representative from Florida's 16th District," all Foley "was missing was Bryant's hair. There was the matter of his very public Christianity, his endorsement of the so-called Defense of Marriage Act (which, incidentally, puts adult same-sex couples who wish to pledge lifelong fidelity into a category with national security threats), his authorship of numerous Internet restrictions to protect children from homosexuals and others online, and his repeated use of the word 'revolting' to describe rumors that he's gay. Then he became Bryant's worst nightmare. And ours, too."

Rove's Fundraising For GOP Candidates Seen As Unprecedented. The Hill (10/11, Bolton) reports, "White House politico Karl Rove, whose legacy as a strategist hinges on Republicans' fate at the polls on Nov. 7, has raised more than $12 million for GOP candidates this election cycle." The "total is remarkable for a White House staffer, more than any aide has been known to raise before, and confirms Rove's place among the most celebrated strategists in American political history." Rove's "personal stake in the upcoming election is undeniable. If Republicans hang on to power, Rove's reputation as a political genius will be secure, say political observers. But if they lose, Republicans may look back at Rove's ambitious and unsuccessful efforts to reform Social Security and immigration policy with bitterness."

Democrats Hope To Take Advantage Of Dissatisfaction With Iraq War. CBS Evening News (10/10, story 9, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With the Congressional elections just four weeks away, our latest CBS News/'New York Times' poll shows a growing number of Americans say the Iraq war is the number one issue facing the country, far ahead of terror and the economy. Two out of three Americans polled say the war is going badly, and it's not just Democrats. 39% of Republicans agree. Against this backdrop, a number of Democratic candidates with real combat experience are fighting a new battle." Democratic candidate Patrick Murphy: "I'm an Iraq war veteran, Democrat running for Congress." Couric: "The Democratic party has high hopes for this group of Iraq war vets who are battling for congressional seats hoping the message voters are getting is this: We're against the war, but tough on national defense. And we have the medals to prove it."

Scholar Says Congress Failing It Its Oversight Role. The Washington Post (10/11, A17, Babington, 748K) in a Q& A with congressional scholars Thomas Mann and Norman Ornstein examines the problems with Congress, calling it "The Broken Branch." Asked about Congress' oversight role, Mann said, "It is striking, the extent to which the Republican majority in Congress deferred to the president in the face of one of the most aggressive and ambitious assertions of executive authority in American history. … They are now paying a political price for the policy consequences of their inattention. In Iraq, for example, it has meant flawed planning, poor implementation and no midcourse corrections."

Democrats Said To Need Support Of Rural Red State Voters To Flip Senate. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Brownstein, 918K) reports Democrat Claire McCaskill's "ability to win votes in rural Missouri may determine whether she topples" Republican Sen. Jim Talent. More broadly, "it probably will signal whether Democrats can overcome the principal obstacle in their drive for a Senate majority: The Republican dominance of Senate seats in states that President Bush carried in 2000 and 2004." To gain "the majority, Democrats must win at least four, and maybe more, GOP-held seats in red states such as Missouri. Recent polls have buoyed their hopes. Democrats are running about even with or slightly ahead of Republicans in each of the hotly contested red-state Senate races except Arizona's." From "disenchantment over the Iraq war to the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), a national tide may be gathering behind Democrats. But for Republicans, the red states loom as the sea wall against that force. Election day will decide whether discontent over the nation's direction overrides entrenched GOP advantages, especially among rural voters, in these culturally conservative states." In "all but one of the key red-state Senate races, rural voters constitute a larger share of the population than they do nationally (Arizona is the exception). And that means that to gain Senate seats, Democrats need to minimize the GOP edge among culturally conservative exurban and rural voters."

DOJ_NMG_0078732

Many Democratic Candidates Taking Conservative Positions. The Washington Times (10/11, Hallow, 88K) reports that "across the South and Midwest," Democratic congressional candidates "from Illinois to Georgia are casting aside liberal loyalties to compete in conservative districts where they hope to gain the 15 seats needed for Democrats to take control of the House." National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) spokesman Jonathan Collegio said, "There are especially strong cases of 'blank slate' candidates with no voting records, trying to hedge on every issue -- in Pennsylvania, Illinois and Virginia, for example -- and other Democrats running like they're Republicans, in Georgia, Indiana and North Carolina." The Times adds the "reasons for the plethora of rightward-running Democratic candidates? Polls show Democrats will have a hard time winning in strong Republican and swing districts if they spout traditional Democratic positions." To "make a successful play for House control, Democrats have to win in Republican districts. But voter surveys consistently show that the national Democratic Party's liberal positions on taxes, abortion and other issues do not go down well in districts that supported Mr. Bush by 10 percentage points or more."

527 Groups Expected To Spend Over $300 Million On Midterm Election Ads. The New York Times (10/11, Broder, 1.21M) reports a "previously unknown group led by a Republican political consultant in Houston is financing television advertisements against nine Democratic House candidates from North Carolina to Arizona." The group, "Americans for Honesty on Issues, is spending more than $1 million on the advertisements, which accuse Democratic candidates of carpetbagging, coddling illegal immigrants, being soft on crime and advocating cutting off money for troops in Iraq." The group's ads "appear to be the first wave of a boatload of negative political advertising that will appear in the weeks before the Nov. 7 election. Many of the advertisements will be produced by independent organizations known as 527 groups, after the provision in the tax code that allows such groups to spend virtually unlimited sums on political activity as long as it is not formally coordinated with parties or candidates." The 527 groups "had raised nearly $200 million as of June 30, much of which appears to be available to be spent on pre-election activities. And if past trends hold, the total raised and spent by the groups on this election will surpass $300 million, eclipsing the $258 million spent by such groups in the last midterm election, in 2002." The leader "of Americans for Honesty on Issues is Sue Walden, a close ally of Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader who left Congress amid questions on ethics and fund-raising."

Belated Agreements Over Turnout Plan Funding Could Make Difference For Democrats. The Hill (10/11, Kaplan) reports the "clash" between DNC chair Howard Dean and DCCC chief Rep. Rahm Emanuel "over how much money the national party would spend to help congressional Democrats ended last month. But the heart of the disagreement, whether the national party has identified new and drop-off voters, could determine whether the Democrats retake the House and Senate in November." Emanuel, "chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and Dean agreed last month that the Democratic National Committee would spend $2.6 million on GOTV efforts; Dean reportedly reached a deal Monday with Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, to direct $5 million to state parties to help Democratic Senate candidates." In the months "preceding these agreements, the DSCC and DCCC set up their own field programs, which is something the DNC would have done in the past, said several Democratic strategists." Referring to "voters who cast ballots in presidential years but not in off-year elections," Emanuel said, "Did they [the DNC] waste a year and a half not targeting drop-off voters? Yes." However, he added, "House Democratic candidates would be fine, because, 'It's not like we have slouches over there … they [the DCCC] know what they're doing.'" The Hill adds Emanuel "hired Michael Whouley and Jack Corrigan, longtime Democratic field operatives, to implement the DCCC's strategy. The committee has worked with 70 campaigns devising a field strategy; it is helping pay for field programs in several campaigns, said a senior Democratic aide."

DOJ_NMG_0078733

DSCC Launches $1 Million Ad Campaign For Webb. The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (10/11, Germanotta) in an article titled "Democratic Senate Group Backs Webb In A Big Way" reports, "Forget about the polls, what really sends a message is money, and on Tuesday the Democratic Senate Caucus' political arm bought in big-time with an anti-George Allen ad." The Virginian Pilot notes, "The 30-second ad lumps together a number of anti-Allen charges" including "references to Allen's calling a Webb campaign worker of Indian descent 'macaca,'…as well as citations of stories that have emerged during the campaign about Allen not reporting stock options and of having used racial slurs while in college."

The AP (10/11, Lewis) reports the $950,000 DSCC ad "is among the largest yet in a race the latest polls indicate is tied or very close." In response "Allen's campaign quickly labeled the DSCC's ad as 'deceitful' and immediately sought to tie it to national Democrats, particularly New York Sen. Hillary Clinton." The DSCC ad "opens mocking Allen's appeal last week for restoring the campaign to issues" and "accuses him of voting against body armor for U.S. troops, favoring tax breaks for energy companies that gave his campaign $322,000, and voting to boost his own salary while opposing increases in the minimum wage." But "Allen's campaign released a list of rebuttals to each point, particularly the claim he opposed body armor for American troops."

Allen, Webb Trade Charges On Taxes. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports, "Taxes have moved to the forefront of Virginia's Senate race, with Republican Sen. George Allen accusing Democrat James Webb of plotting to raise taxes on millions of Virginians." The Post notes, "Allen made the allegations at the candidates' final debate Monday and is repeating them in a statewide television commercial. But the accusations are based almost entirely on Webb's support from national Democratic leaders and on two vague statements by Webb questioning whether Congress should make federal tax cuts permanent." And Webb "has angrily denied the charge and on Tuesday began airing a commercial defending his views. The Democrat's ad also examines Allen's voting history to accuse him of raising taxes on retirement savings, increasing the cost of tuition and giving tax breaks to oil companies. Webb also told reporters which tax cuts he would keep and what tax loopholes he would consider closing."

The Washington Times (10/11, Bellantoni, 88K) notes, "Virginia conservatives say an unrelenting focus on taxes will give" Allen "a win over" Webb. On "Monday night, Mr. Allen, a Republican, hammered Mr. Webb on taxes and yesterday kept up the attack. The Allen campaign Web site yesterday declared: 'Hillary Clinton gave James Webb Jr. 1,000,000 reasons to raise taxes on 3 million hard-working Virginians.'" And "Conservatives irritated with national Republicans on fiscal issues say Mr. Allen finally has landed on a winning strategy in the final weeks of the race, one of the hottest in the nation with the major candidates nearly tied in the polls."

Allen Campaign Runs Ad In Support Of Gay Marriage Ban In Rural Areas. The AP (10/11, Lewis) notes the Allen campaign has also begun "airing a radio ad" costing $60,000 in rural areas "making his strongest link yet to groups supporting a referendum on the Nov. 7 statewide ballot that would write a ban on same-sex marriages or anything resembling it into the Virginia Constitution's Bill of Rights." The ad states, "There are those who would like to change the definition of marriage. Jim Webb is one of those people. … This Election Day you'll have an opportunity to stand up to the Jim Webbs of the world, to the people who want to weaken marriage."

Character Seen As Key Issue In Virginia Senate Race. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Barnes, 748K) reports, "If Virginia voters want to pick their next U.S. senator based on issues, Democratic challenger James Webb and Republican incumbent George Allen give them plenty to work with. They disagree on taxes, the war in Iraq, support for the Bush administration, the deficit, how the government should fight terrorism, and a constitutional amendment aimed at same-sex marriage." Yet "if the character of the candidate is the deciding factor, Virginians are entering murkier territory." Democrats are worried Webb "is still an attractive resume in search of a campaign persona. His appearances on stage with Allen have been described by party professionals as feisty but chilly. And, strapped for cash, he was not able to introduce himself to voters on television before Allen put him on the defensive, especially with women, key voters for any Democratic candidate." Meanwhile Allen "has not looked comfortable defending his lead, which polls show may be down to almost nothing." During Monday's debate "neglected to mention his record of loyal support to President Bush. But he intoned the endorsement of Virginia's senior Republican, Sen. John W. Warner, who more regularly bucks his party's leadership, at least three times."

DOJ_NMG_0078734

Ford, Corker Seek To Seek To Establish Independent Credentials. The AP (10/11, Rucker) reports, "Tennessee's U.S. Senate candidates traded caricatures during a debate Tuesday night that painted a grim choice for voters: rubber stamp or political insider." Democratic Rep. Harold Ford said, "If you want a rubber stamp, don't vote for me," while "Republican Bob Corker accused the Memphis congressman of being a Washington insider who benefited from the 'machine-style' politics of his politically connected family."

Poll Shows Lieberman Leading Lamont 48%-40%. The Hartford Courant (10/11, Pazniokas, 195K) reports Connecticut Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman leads Ned Lamont (D) "by eight percentage points" 48%-40% "in the Senate race, although a majority of voters agree with Lamont on the war in Iraq and the need for change in Washington, a Courant/University of Connecticut poll says." The survey conducted Oct. 4-9 "found that 60 percent of voters believe going to war was wrong, and a slim majority favors a deadline for withdrawal, issues Lamont used to defeat Lieberman in the Democratic primary." Yet Lieberman "enjoys a 57 percent approval rating and has managed to capture 67 percent of Republican vote, while keeping 35 percent of Democrats in his camp. Unaffiliated voters prefer him over Lamont 45-37 percent."

Lamont Contributes Additional $2 Million To His Campaign. The AP (10/11, Miga) reports, "Wealthy Democratic businessman Ned Lamont is pumping another $2 million of his personal fortune into his bid to unseat three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman, whom he trails in a recent statewide poll." He "has personally contributed $8,751,500 to his campaign." Both candidates "are spending heavily for TV ad campaigns as the fall race intensifies. Lamont has criticized Lieberman for missing Senate votes in a new commercial. One Lieberman ad receiving heavy air play accuses the Greenwich millionaire of lacking the experience to be an effective senator."

Trial Lawyer Pledges $5 Million To Jump Start Bell Bid For Texas Governor. The Washington Times (10/11, Aynesworth, 88K) reports Houston trial lawyer John O'Quinn's "huge political contribution" of $5 million "may tighten the Texas gubernatorial race in the final weeks." He "said yesterday he had donated $1 million and would give or raise an additional $4 million toward the campaign of Chris Bell, a Democrat challenging Gov. Rick Perry in the Nov. 7 election. The $5 million would be the largest single donation ever in a state race." While Texas Gov. Rick Perry and "independent challenger Carole Keeton Strayhorn have been spending heavily on television ads" Bell "and independent candidate Kinky Friedman have not had the campaign money to keep up the pace." But the "O'Quinn injection immediately energized the Bell campaign. Spokeswoman Heather Guntert said the Democrat already had placed more television ads in Houston and planned to buy heavily in other major markets this week."

Friedman Resists Calls By Democrats To Drop Campaign. The Dallas Morning News (10/11, Garrett, Jeffers, 500K) reports, "Democratic nominee Chris Bell is trying to persuade independent Kinky Friedman to quit the race for governor, but Mr. Friedman insisted Tuesday that he's in to stay." While "Bell campaign aides said that Mr. Friedman performed poorly in Friday night's candidate debate and that Friedman supporters have told the Democrat that they'd support him if he could persuade Mr. Friedman to step aside," Friedman "said of Mr. Bell and his advisers: 'They're desperate and scrambling.'" Yet "Bell's debate performance has won generally strong reviews, giving the Democrat hope he can emerge as the main challenger to Mr. Perry."

Poll Show Crist With Ten Point Lead In Florida Governor's Race. Greg Pierce in his "Inside Politics" column in the Washington Times (10/11, 88K) notes, "Florida Attorney General Charlie Crist has a commanding lead over Democratic nominee Rep. Jim Davis in their race to replace Gov. Jeb Bush, a new poll shows." He "was backed by 53 percent of likely voters, compared with 43 percent who said they favored the Democratic congressman from Tampa, with 3 percent undecided." A "random telephone survey of 783 likely voters was taken between Oct. 3 and 8 by Quinnipiac (Conn.) University Polling Institute. Mr. Crist was favored by 50 percent to Mr. Davis' 39 percent in a larger sampling of 968 registered voters."

DOJ_NMG_0078735

The Wall Street Journal (10/9, Schatz, 2.03M) in its "Washington Wire" column notes Crist's "lead wasn't exactly the worst news in the poll for Davis. A full 57% of the 968 registered Florida voters polled didn't know enough about him to form an opinion. What's worse, 54% of Democrats said they hadn't heard enough to know how they felt about him. Actually, that was an improvement for the five-term congressman. According to the poll, which has been taken every month since February, the percentage of respondents who hadn't heard enough about him dropped 20 points from the 74% to 77% range."

Taylor Benefited From Earmarks For District. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A1, Wilke, 2.03M) reports NC11 Rep. Charles Taylor (R), "wealthy businessman and banker, owns at least 14,000 acres of prime land in western North Carolina." So when he "steers federal dollars to his district, sometimes he helps himself, too." Last year, Taylor "added $11.4 million to a big federal transportation bill to widen U.S. Highway 19, the main road through Maggie Valley, a rural resort town in the Great Smoky Mountains. His companies own thousands of acres near the highway there and had already developed a subdivision called Maggie Valley Leisure Estates." Taylor also "got $3.8 million in federal funds for a park now being built in downtown Asheville with fountains, tree-shaded terraces and an open-air stage. It's directly in front of the Blue Ridge Savings Bank, flagship of his financial empire. He is among the richest congressmen with assets of at least $72 million, records show." Taylor is "one of at least a half-dozen House members whose public actions in directing special-interest spending known as earmarks have also benefited their private interests or those of business partners, according to congressional, corporate and real-estate records. Among them is a senior Democrat, Rep. Alan Mollohan of West Virginia."

Rural Areas Benefit From More Charitable Giving. The New York Times (10/11, Leonhardt, 1.21M) reports, "The economics of rural America have not really changed. If anything, the advantages that Chicago, Dallas, New York and other big cities have over Nebraska have only continued to grow." But the Nebraska city of "Ord has finally figured out how to fight back" with the help of charitable donations. For example the New Tithing Group "tries to persuade Americans to base their charitable giving on their assets as well as their income, given how many now have substantial assets." The Group has compiled a list ranking charitable efforts and "What is striking about the top of NewTithing's list is that it is dominated by a group of states that run from the Rockies through the Plains and down into the Southeast."

Stark Says Private Sector Not More Efficient Than Medicare On Prescription Drugs. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (10/11), Rep. Pete Stark says, "Your Oct. 4 editorial 'Markets and Medicare' implies that the private sector is more efficient than Medicare. Medicare trustees suggest the opposite, finding that administrative costs for the new prescription drug program's private drug plans average 12% -- six times Medicare's historic 2% ratio." Stark adds, "You also claim that 'competition' is responsible for a decline in the drug program's cost. But these reductions are primarily a result of a trend of lower drug spending that is unrelated to Medicare. And you allege that the Veterans Administration limits drug access. But the VA covers 16,000 prescription drugs on its formulary, and ensures access to other drugs when necessary. VA patient satisfaction is high and the VA negotiates price discounts far below those in Medicare's private plans."

As China Signals Support For Sanctions, Rice Says US Not Planning To Attack North Korea. North Korea's claimed nuclear test received heavy coverage last night and this morning, leading two network newscasts and receiving over 16 minutes of airtime amongst all three networks. Major papers also ran multiple stories, including front page stories. The New York Times (10/11, A1, Shanker, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that the United States did not intend to invade or attack North Korea, but she warned the North's leaders that they now risked sanctions 'unlike anything that they have faced before.'" She also "stressed that 'the diplomatic path is open' for the North, and that giving up its nuclear program would 'lead to all kinds of benefits for North Korea.'" China also said "that tough measures were in order, though its representatives said the punishments might not necessarily be the harsh ones that Washington was proposing." US Ambassador to the UN John R. Bolton, said, "I'm pleased by the positive nature of the discussions and look forward to more progress tomorrow." When "Asked if he would limit the American demands in the interests of speeding the process of drafting a resolution, he said: 'We want firmness and swiftness, and I think we can have both.'" Administration officials say that the US "is pursuing a two-track approach: trying at the United Nations to persuade other countries to cut off economic ties with the North, and using American banking laws to punish banks overseas that deal with North Korean companies." Still, "even as the administration sought to push tough language into a Security Council resolution, the White House expressed doubts about the capacity of North Korea's nuclear program, based on evidence that the reported test had a smaller yield than expected."

DOJ_NMG_0078736

Rice said on CNN's The Situation Room (10/10), "The United States of America doesn't have any intention to attack North Korea or to invade North Korea." Asked if the military option is not practical, Rice said, "The President never takes any of his options off the table. But the United States somehow in a provocative way trying to invade North Korea, it's just not the case."

NBC Nightly News (10/10, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "as talks continue at the United Nations, Secretary of State Rice may move up a trip to Asia, perhaps leaving within a week. Another sign of how seriously the US considers the North Korean threat."

On ABC World News (10/10, story 3, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M), Rice was shown saying, "We are going to get sanctions passed because we can't tolerate a nuclear North Korea. The important things here is that you're getting universal condemnation. … But I do believe we have the right configuration now, both to make an agreement stick, if we get one. But also to pressure the North Koreans to take a different course." She later added, "The Chinese have said they will take serious steps to deal with the North Korean problem. We're going to have a sanctions resolution in the Security Council. We'll see how the North Koreans react to that. It is important that our security alliances make very clear to the North Koreans that we will not permit a deterioration of the security environment in this region. We have many arrows in our quiver. And we'll start to use them."

CBS Evening News (10/10, story 2, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Rice. Asked about the possibility of one-on-one talks with North Korea, Rice said, "You have to ask yourself…why are the North Koreans so insistent that there be bilateral talks? It's because they don't want the pressure of having China and south Korea and Russia and Japan at the table, too. They would like nothing better than to have all of the pressure be on the United States to deliver a deal." Rice added, "Well, certainly, one of the great worries if North Korea were to continue down this path is that it would try to transfer a weapon to either another state or perhaps even more alarmingly, to a non-state actor, a terrorist. But the President's made very clear that North Korea would be held fully accountable for any effort to try to use weapons technologies to threaten the security interests of the United States and its allies, and certainly the transfer of these technologies would do precisely that."

The AP (10/11, Gearan) reports, "The White House contends that North Korea wants to set up a confrontation with the United States and direct talks would play to that hand. By insisting on talks only in the awkward company of four other nations, the argument goes, the United States deprives the North of the chance to play David to the US Goliath." Instead, "the North also has South Korea, Japan, China and Russia to answer to." Another AP dispatch (10/11, Riechmann) quotes US Ambassador Bolton saying, "This is the way North Korea typically negotiates by threat and intimidation. It's worked for them before. It won't work for them now.'" McClatchy (10/11, Strobel), in a story discussing the US stance on direct talks, says the Administration is "under fire for policies that have failed to stop North Korea from advancing its nuclear weapons arsenal."

Rice was asked on Fox News (10/10) what North Korea is trying to accomplish. Rice said, "Far be it from me to try to read the mind of Kim Jong Il and the North Koreans. I can tell you what they could have. They could have a situation, if they give up their nuclear weapons ambitions, in which there's an opening to the international system, in which they begin to have more normal relations with countries." The Secretary was also asked how susceptible North Korea is to further sanctions, "if the sanctions that have imposed already haven't done the trick." She said, "Part of the goal is to make sure that it is really the countries that have leverage that are a part of the effort to pressure North Korea into coming back to the talks. The United States has some leverage, but not nearly the leverage that China has, not nearly the leverage that South Korea has."

DOJ_NMG_0078737

The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Spiegel, Miller, 918K) reports, "The sanctions demanded by US officials to punish North Korea for this week's weapons test are primarily aimed at what the Bush administration increasingly views as the greatest threat posed by North Korea: the spread of nuclear technology. On the high seas, the Pentagon has managed to track and even interdict weapons shipments coming out of North Korea. US spy planes, manned and unmanned, as well as naval ships have been able to keep close watch on cargo vessels leaving North Korean ports." But "as a result, North Korea has begun to avoid sending arms shipments by sea, government officials believe, sending cargo overland and by aircraft to the north, where they enter Chinese territory and become more difficult to follow, current and former US officials said."

The Financial Times (10/11, Fidler) reports that a resolution that includes searching cargo ships "raises many practical and legal questions about how such inspections would be carried out. To work, it would almost certainly need the backing of China, not only in the Security Council but also as a practical matter because many of the sea lanes out of North Korea pass close to China." Also, "the likelihood is that any attempt to board a North Korean cargo ship would be refused and the interdiction force would have to contemplate shooting across the ship's bows and mounting an opposed boarding," which "would probably be interpreted by North Korea as a hostile act, potentially leading to a significant further escalation of tensions in the region."

China's apparent shift toward supporting sanctions is receiving ample media attention. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Blitzer) reported China "is signaling today that it may be willing to support some punishment of its ally, North Korea." In a front page article, the Washington Post (10/11, A1, Lynch, Fan, 748K) also reports that China "expressed a rare willingness to support U.N. sanctions against its ally North Korea, but it said any punitive action would have to be narrowly targeted at the country's ballistic missile and nuclear weapons programs." It "opposes any deadlines or trade restrictions that would undercut North Korea's struggling economy," and "insists that any resolution must exclude the possibility, however remote, that force could be used against North Korea." Still, "officials in Beijing faced criticism at home over their diplomatic strategy" of relying "on the now-stalled six-nation talks." Meanwhile, the US and Japan "continued to press the U.N. Security Council to support far stronger economic and trade measures that would permit international inspections of all North Korean cargo to search for weapons and to strangle Pyongyang's ability to finance its nuclear program," even as "the Bush administration sought to assuage fresh worries by its foreign counterparts that the tough strategy may cause hardship for the country's impoverished population or topple the government."

The Financial Times (10/11, Daniel, Fidler, Fifield, McGregor, Pilling, Turner) says China's position is an "apparent retreat from its long-standing opposition to international sanctions against Pyongyang." China's ambassador to the United Nations, Wang Guangya, "said a 13-point US proposal - which included inspections of cargo ships entering and leaving North Korea - provided a 'good basis for working'." North Korea's nuclear and missile tests are "seen in China as a demonstration of the failure of Beijing's strategy of playing a moderating role between North Korea, regional neighbours and the US." USA Today (10/11, MacLeod, 2.27M), the AP (10/11, Wadhams), AFP (10/11, Aziakou), Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Montlake, 58K) and Washington Times (10/11, Pisik, 88K) run similar assessments of China's stance on the crisis.

A number of reports also note South Korea's shift away from its "sunshine policy" toward the North. In an front page article, the Washington Post (10/11, A1, Faiola, Cho, 748K) reports, "Monday's reported test cast a sudden chill on North-South relations, stalling Seoul's financial incentives to the North," as "the biggest potential casualty of the announced test appears to be" South Korea's sunshine policy. While "South Korean officials say it is too early to declare that detente is dead," there are "changing sentiments across South Korea in the wake of Monday's purported test, which was something of a national wake-up call in a country where the perception of a North Korean threat had all but evaporated after years of detente." With "the most significant step to date, President Roh Moo Hyun -- who had become South Korea's leading voice for engagement -- effectively acknowledged on Monday that the sunshine policy had failed," and "the leading voices for detente here…express a profound sense of shock and betrayal. A number of them are calling for a complete review of the policy they had long held up as the cornerstone of Korea's eventual reunification." This "marks a radical shift in thinking in South Korea."

The Financial Times (10/11, Fifield) says that "with Monday's provocative nuclear test it has become patently clear that South Korea has gained next to nothing for its efforts." While some analysts "doubt South Korea will jeopardise its primary goal of maintaining stability," others say "that Seoul has little to lose from wielding a bigger stick."

DOJ_NMG_0078738

In contrast, the New York Times (10/11, A8, Onishi, Fackler, 1.21M) reports, "South Korea and Japan, America's two major allies in this region, have grown increasingly apart in their attitudes and policies toward North Korea, even though President Roh Moo-hyun said Monday that the North's announcement of a nuclear test had put him on the same page as Japan's prime minister, Shinzo Abe," and "the calculations and interests that have led each country on its respective path have changed little." In interviews, South Koreans, "while expressing anger and disappointment, said they did not support the economic sanctions and other punitive measures sought by the United States and Japan, but called for continuing to engage the North, though with more sticks." By contrast, the Japanese "interviewed agreed that the country should take a firmer stance, both in punishing North Korea and in strengthening its own military."

US Experts Analyze North Korean Blast. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A4, Block, 2.03M) reports, "The US has marshaled a network of military aircraft, ships, seismic-listening posts, spy satellites and intelligence agents to glean as much as possible about North Korea's claim that it tested a nuclear device, and officials say they may have a good idea about what took place as soon as today." The objective "is to detect radioactive isotopes and gases released in the atmosphere, usually within 72 hours, after such a test. The presence or absence of these indicators will tell analysts if the device detonated underground Sunday was a nuclear weapon."

The New York Times (10/11, Sanger, Broad, 1.21M) reports, "The White House seized on further evidence on Tuesday that North Korea's proclaimed nuclear test had resulted in a surprisingly small blast, questioning at one point whether the test was, in the end, 'a big deal event.'" The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, "appeared to backtrack from that assessment later in the day, as he turned from mounting a defense of the administration's troubled history with North Korea to arguing that the only logical response to the test was to impose harsh sanctions." The Times adds that officials "said that their current assessment was that North Korea had in fact detonated a nuclear device, and that they were discounting some reports that North Korea had staged a hoax, trying to disguise a large conventional explosion as a nuclear blast. 'The working assumption is that this was a nuclear explosion of some kind,' one intelligence official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. 'The conventional explosion theory doesn't make a hell of a lot of sense, even for the North Koreans.'" But "that left the mystery of why the explosion appeared to be so small, less than a kiloton, or a fraction of the explosions at Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945."

The Washington Post (10/11, A14, Linzer, Ricks, 748K) reports a "Defense Department official" said "there are multiple ways" the US government "will seek to verify North Korea's claim that it detonated a nuclear device, the official said. But there is no hard information yet, the official said. Intelligence analysts are also reviewing intercepted communications and other data." The official "declined to be quoted by name, saying that the Pentagon is not playing a lead role in the US response and that he wanted to defer to the White House." Tony Snow "said there is a 'remote possibility' that US intelligence will be unable to fully determine whether the test succeeded." The Washington Times (10/11, Curl, 88K) quotes Snow saying, "You could have something that is very old and off-the-shelf here as well, in which case they've dusted off something that is old and dormant."

USA Today (10/11, Vergano, 2.27M), under the headline "Even A Small Nuke Poses Big Threat," reports, "Some analysts, such as physicist David Albright of the Institute for Science and International Security, suggest that the North Koreans may have miniaturized a bomb to arm missile warheads."

Earthquake Led Japan To Suspect A Second Test. The AP (10/11, Freire) reports, "A strong earthquake in northern Japan on Wednesday may have led the Tokyo government to suspect that North Korea had conducted a second nuclear test." In Washington, White House spokesman Blair Jones "said US officials had not detected any evidence of additional North Korea testing. 'Japanese officials are now saying that this occurrence may be related to an earthquake in northern Japan,' Jones said." The AP adds, "A senior State Department official said the US would not be surprised if there were multiple tests, but so far there is no sign of one. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation." Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's spokesman "confirmed the government was checking whether the North had tested another nuclear device. Shortly after that, the Japanese meteorological agency said a strong earthquake with a preliminary magnitude of 6.0 shook northern Japan."

DOJ_NMG_0078739

Abe Says Japan Will Keep Constitutional Nuclear Weapons Ban. The Washington Times (10/11, Sands, 88K) reports, "Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said yesterday that North Korea's claim it conducted a nuclear test will not affect his country's constitutional ban on developing nuclear weapons, but all of the North's neighbors face fundamental military and foreign policy questions in the wake of the test." Abe, "a hard-liner who has long pushed for a more assertive Japanese defense, told a parliamentary committee that fears in the region that Japan will seek a nuclear deterrent in response to North Korea's test are unfounded."

Crisis' Effect On Asian Stability Examined. The Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Grier, 58K) reports, "North Korea's apparent test of a nuclear device could have a devastating effect on the world's long struggle to contain the spread of the most powerful military weapon known to man. Experts have long worried that if the Pyongyang regime flaunted its atomic hardware, Asia might be drawn into an arms race reminiscent of the early days of the cold war. The spiral could develop like this: Threatened, Japan and South Korea start their own weapons programs. China piles up bombs to protect its regional superpower status. India strives to catch China, and then Pakistan tries to counter India, and then...." But "this nightmare scenario is far from inevitable, point out experts. Everything depends on what the US and other interested governments do to try to repair a nonproliferation system that, despite its faults, has served the globe well for decades."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A4, Fairclough, Ramstad, Soloman, 2.03M) reports that while "the prospect of regime change in Pyongyang may cheer many in Washington," such "turmoil in North Korea could damage the economies of China and South Korea, set off a refugee crisis and lead to military conflict." Therefore, "How the U.S. and Asia assess these risks could influence the outcome of Security Council meetings to decide how to respond." Today, "many North Korean officials view U.S. policies as wholly focused on removing Kim Jong Il," and some US officials who have worked on North Korea policy in recent years "say the Bush administration's approach has largely been driven by what they describe as President Bush's hatred of Mr. Kim, and not a comprehensive strategy."

The New York Times (10/11, Greenlees, 1.21M) reports "military officials and analysts interviewed today said that the North closely watched conflicts elsewhere in the world, particularly the invasions of Iraq in 1991 and 2003, and saw that masses of tanks and artillery could be neutralized with ease by superior American military technology. So, methodically but with growing nervousness, the Communist regime sought a new trump card to maintain the security standoff on the peninsula."

Iran Seeks Distance From North Korea, Says It Opposes Nuclear Weapons. The Financial Times (10/11, Smyth) reports, "Iran on Tuesday distanced its own nuclear dispute from the North Korean crisis, reiterating its claim that it opposes nuclear weapons. While analysts abroad speculated that Tehran could be emboldened by North Korea's defiance, comments from officials and the media put the emphasis on the different paths taken by the two countries." Tehran, they stressed, "remained committed to the Nuclear non-Proliferation Treaty." Tehran "insists its nuclear experiments are designed for the production of energy but western governments suspect the Islamic Republic is intent on developing nuclear weapons."

The AP (10/11, Dareini) reports Iran also clamed "Washington for North Korea's reported test blast and vowing to keep developing its own suspect atomic program." Iran "appeared emboldened by North Korea's defiance as its hardline Islamic leaders pledged not to bow to international demands that Tehran suspend uranium enrichment."

Crisis Seen As Reducing Chances Senate Will Pass US-India Nuclear Deal. The Financial Times (10/11, Johnson) reports, "North Korea's nuclear test will reduce the chances of the Indo-US civilian nuclear energy agreement being passed by a lame duck session of the Senate in November and strengthen the non-proliferation lobby in the US, Indian security analysts warned on Tuesday." Bush "is expected to face renewed criticism that he is rewarding bad behaviour by allowing a resumption of civil nuclear trade and co-operation with India, despite its 1998 nuclear test and refusal to join the nuclear non-proliferation treaty."

More Commentary. Henry Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center, writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14, 2.03M), "For more than two decades, the US and its allies blinked at the regime's nuclear-weapons activities, even when they clearly violated international treaties Pyongyang had signed; bent the nuclear rules to accommodate North Korea's misbehavior; and groveled more than once before Pyongyang and Beijing to keep this duplicitous diplomacy afloat."

Thomas Friedman writes in his column in the New York Times (10/11, 1.21M) that "compared with the vast repression and nuclear standoff that characterized the cold war, the post-cold-war era has been much better for a lot of humanity. Too bad it's probably over." The new "era will be defined by three new features — if things continue as they are. First is a nuclear Asia, triggered by North Korea's flaunting of its nuclear weapons. … Second is a nuclear Middle East. … Third is a disintegrating Iraq in the heart of the Arab world, with its destabilizing impact on oil prices and terrorism." The current era "can be preserved only if Russia and China get over their ambivalence about U.S. power and if the Bush team gets over its ambivalence about Iran and North Korea." After all, "When an administration can't make up its mind between regime change and change of behavior, it gets neither. And that is what the Bush team has gotten." Still, while "we have to make up our minds, but so, too, must Moscow and Beijing." Their pressure can stop Iran and North Korea, but to do so, "They've got to start paying a price to preserve this world."

DOJ_NMG_0078740

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K), "The United States and its allies must begin constructing a system that can succeed where the Non-Proliferation Treaty has failed. A terrorist nuclear bomb in Manhattan or Washington isn't a thriller writer's fantasy; it's a probability, unless America and its allies establish new rules for nuclear accountability that are clear and credible."

McCain Says Clinton Policies Set Stage For Current North Korean Situation. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Blitzer) reported, "Republican Senator John McCain today accused directly the Clinton administration of setting the stage for the current situation by rewarding North Korea's bad behavior." McCain was shown saying, "We had a carrot and no sticks policy that only encouraged bad behavior. When one carrot didn't work, we offered another. Now we are facing the consequences of the failed Clinton administration policies and we must stop at long last reinforcing failure with failure."

The Washington Post (10/11, A10, Babington, 748K) reports, "In what sounded to many Washington ears yesterday like an early shot in the 2008 presidential campaign," McCain "singled out Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) as he denounced the Clinton administration's policies toward North Korea." Said McCain, "I would remind Senator Clinton and other Democrats critical of Bush administration policies that the framework agreement her husband's administration negotiated was a failure." McCain spoke "in a speech near Detroit, where he was campaigning for a Republican Senate candidate." He added, "Every single time the Clinton administration warned the Koreans not to do something -- not to kick out the IAEA inspectors, not to remove the fuel rods from their reactor -- they did it. And they were rewarded every single time by the Clinton administration with further talks." The Post adds, "Aides said McCain was responding to Hillary Clinton's comments Monday, when she criticized North Korea for its announcement of having tested a nuclear weapon and added: 'Some of the reasons we are facing this dangerous situation is because of the failed policies of the Bush administration. I regret deeply their failure to deal with the threat posed by North Korea. And I hope that the administration will now adopt a much more effective response than what they have up until now.'"

The AP (10/11, Karush) reports Sen. Clinton's spokesman "dismissed McCain's criticism and argued that it was time for a new policy from the president. 'Now is not the time to play politics of the most dangerous kind -- with our policy on North Korea,' Philippe Reines, spokesman for Clinton, said in a statement. 'History is clear that nothing the Bush administration has done has stopped the North Koreans from openly testing a nuclear weapon and presenting a new danger to the region of the world.'"

Parties Scramble For Political Edge In Wake Of North Korean Claim. Under the headline "Test Byproduct: Quick Scramble To Point Fingers," the New York Times (10/11, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports "McCain's attack was part of an increasingly bitter partisan row over who was responsible for allowing North Korea to achieve nuclear ability." Republicans "sought to focus attention on what they said was a misguided and naïve policy of negotiating with North Korea during the 1990's. Democrats pressed the argument that North Korea's claimed advance was a byproduct of President Bush's decision to wage war against Iraq, which proved not to have any banned weapons, while doing too little to confront a real threat developing in North Korea. … With polls showing Republicans having difficulty holding on to their traditional strength when it comes to which party is better suited to keeping Americans safe, the candidates and parties have moved quickly to take political advantage of the crisis."

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 2, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The exchange was a sample of the national security debate likely to play out down the stretch of this congressional campaign. Democratic critics charge in the march to war against Saddam the White House ignored the growing threat from the North Korea." Kurt Campbell, Asia expert: "Behind the scenes, every country in Asia recognizes and knows that the United States at best, half-heartedly contemplated diplomacy with North Korea." NBC added that "the situation has worsened since Bush took office, and later vowed he would never tolerate a nuclear North Korea. Last summer, the Institute for Science and International Security estimated that North Korea's potential arsenal of nuclear weapon was four to 13 -- up from one or two in 2000. But Tony Snow argued it was 'silly to ask whether the President made mistakes in his approach to North Korea." Gregory: 'You don't think it's fair to ask for some accountability as to what happened and whether there were mistakes made?'" Tony Snow: "David, the accountability lies in North Korea, not in Washington." Gregory: "And now the White House argues, North Korea may be nuclear, but it's not necessarily lost, particularly, the White House says, since its Asian neighbors, namely China, are turning up the heat. Brian?"

DOJ_NMG_0078741

AFP (10/11, Lozano) reports the White House "rebuffed criticism that failed US diplomacy led to North Korea's nuclear test, while downplaying the significance of Pyongyang's blast, which rattled the world." White House spokesman Tony Snow "branded criticism faulting the US approach for failing to bridge differences with North Korea, Iran and Iraq and leading to the world-stunning test announced by Pyongyang Monday as 'back-seat generalship.'" Said Snow, "What you have is the fact that the United States has been engaged actively on all three problems. ... We are continuing to work aggressively on diplomacy with the Iranians and with the North Koreans." Snow "responded to comments especially from opposition Democrats that the administration of President George W. Bush had taken the wrong approach to dealing with perceived global threats, as signified by the North Korean nuclear test, which came after years of attempts to convince Pyongyang to not develop a bomb."

The AP (10/11, Hennessey) reports that speaking in Boulder City, NV, "Sen. John Kerry said Tuesday that a nuclear test in North Korea is evidence of the Bush administration's 'failed policies,' and called for the U.S. to engage in direct talks with Pyongyang." Said Kerry, "The president attacks the place that has no weapons of mass destruction and does nothing about the place that does."

William Perry, Defense Secretary under Clinton, writes in today's Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K) says the North Korean test "demonstrates the total failure of the Bush administration's policy toward that country. For almost six years this policy has been a strange combination of harsh rhetoric and inaction. … Our government's inattention has allowed North Korea to establish a new and dangerous threat to the Asia-Pacific region. It is probably too late to reverse that damage, but serious attention to this problem can still limit the extent of the damage."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14, 2.03M) editorializes that the crisis "may also have finally settled the question of how much time this and future Administrations will have available to deal with genuine foreign policy crises before they become merely political. The answer, it seems, can be measured in milliseconds." The Journal adds that "it would help if just once public discourse on the subject did not instantly degrade into an exercise in cynical political point-scoring. Fat chance."

Writing in The Hill (10/11), Dick Morris says, "In one deadly moment, North Korea has succeeded in doing what no amount of backtracking by Speaker Dennis Hastert or his beleaguered Republicans could do: It has changed the subject of the national debate. With nuclear weapons in the hands of the most deranged regime in the world, e-mails to pages will have to fade from the forefront of the public's attention. … There is nothing like a national security crisis to force Americans to realize the consequences of paralyzing a presidency by sending to Washington a Congress with which he cannot work. We fell into just that trap in the final years of the Clinton presidency and we would do so now at our peril. But Bush has to produce and has to do it in the next five weeks. Just like JFK did in 1962."

Rice Sidesteps Question On Whether Clinton's 1994 Agreement Was A Mistake. Rice was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (10/10) if she agrees with Sen. John McCain's comments blaming the Clinton administration for the missteps in dealing with North Korea in '93 and '94. Rice said, "There is no doubt that the North Koreans used the cover of the framework agreement to pursue a different path to a nuclear weapon through highly enriched uranium. There is no doubt that they did divert assistance. There is now doubt, also, that they got millions of dollars in assistance. But I don't want to get into the game of whether or not that was a mistake. We did sign the agreed framework. We went forward with it. We went forward with it on a bilateral basis, the United States and North Korea. Yes, there were some multilateral elements to pursuing the fuel through a consortium of states. But it was essentially bilateral. The United States and North Korea. And when they cheated, we had no one to stand with us and say to the North Koreans, you've cheated. And that's a problem not just for the United States but for China and for Japan and for Russia and South Korea. That's the difference in what President Bush has built."

DOJ_NMG_0078742

Carter Says North Korea Won't Back Down Unless Its "Basic Demand" Is Met. Former President Jimmy Carter, in the New York Times (10/11, 1.21M), says "it is unlikely that the North Koreans will back down unless the United States meets" its "basic demand" for direct one-on-one talks with the US. He adds that "Washington's pledge of no direct talks could be finessed through secret discussions with a trusted emissary like former Secretary of State Jim Baker, who earlier this week said, 'It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies.'" Carter concludes, "What must be avoided is to leave a beleaguered nuclear nation convinced that it is permanently excluded from the international community, its existence threatened, its people suffering horrible deprivation and its hard-liners in total control of military and political policy."

Officials From Six Nations To Discuss Possible Sanctions On Iran. The AP (10/11, Schweid) reports, "Senior officials of the United States and five other nations plan to confer Wednesday on possible U.N. sanctions against Iran for processing uranium as part of its disputed nuclear program." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns and his counterparts in Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China "will confer by video about what should be on a U.N. sanctions list, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Tuesday."

Olmert Dismisses Syrian Peace Overtures. The AP (10/11, Nessman) reports, "Israel has brushed off the Syrian president's recent calls to restart peace talks as a ploy by Bashar Assad to deflect international pressure from his increasingly isolated regime." But "some in Israel say Prime Minister Ehud Olmert may be making a major mistake in ignoring even a slim chance to pursue peace with one of his country's most implacable enemies." Israeli Vice Premier Shimon Peres, meanwhile, "invited the Syrian leader to come to Jerusalem." The AP adds, "Israeli-Syrian peace talks broke down in 2000, with Syria demanding assurances it would get back all of the Golan Heights, which Israel captured in the 1967 Mideast War and later annexed. Israel wanted slight modifications to the pre-1967 line, conforming to the international frontier, and insisted that issues of security and normalization be spelled out first." Assad "has sporadically called for new talks, but his appeals grew more intense following this summer's war between Israel and Lebanon's Hezbollah guerrillas, which Syria backed."

Israel Fences Off Village That Extends Into Lebanon. The New York Times (10/11, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "Little more than a week after Israeli troops withdrew from Lebanon, the shiny new fence around the northern portion of" Ghajar "is a reminder of the possible flash points that remain." For the Lebanese, the fence, erected over the past several weeks to separate the northern side of the village from the rest of Lebanon, amounts to a new occupation of their territory," but "to Israel, which says the fence is only temporary, it is a means of ensuring that Hezbollah fighters do not enter the village, which straddles the border, and attack Israelis." The village began in Israel and expanded over the boarder during Israel's occupation. Once they withdrew, the village was divided into Lebanese and Israeli sides. "The Israelis have now posted troops within the northern section of the village. Lebanese officials say the continued presence of Israeli soldiers on Lebanese soil is a violation of United Nations Resolution 1701, which settled this summer's conflict." While "Hezbollah official…have remained mute on the issue of Ghajar, opting to allow the government to negotiate a diplomatic solution," a Hezbollah representative noted that "patience is growing thin."

Hamas Rejects Conditions For Unity Government. USA Today (10/11, 2.27M) reports, "Qatar's attempt to mediate a growing crisis in the Palestinian territories took a blow Tuesday when Hamas rejected demands that it recognize Israel and renounce violence as a prerequisite for forming a unity government with the Fatah Party." It was "the latest setback in efforts to moderate the Islamic militant group Hamas and restore much-needed international aid to the Palestinians."

The Washington Post (10/11, A18, 748K) editorializes, "It's easy enough for global leaders to issue flowery appeals for action on the Middle East or to imply that progress would be possible if only the United States used its leverage with Israel. The stubborn reality is that there can be no movement toward peace until a Palestinian leadership appears that is ready to accept a two-state solution."

Bush Tells Peru's Garcia He Will Press For Trade Pact Approval. The AP (10/11) reports

DOJ_NMG_0078743

President George W. Bush Tuesday "assured Peruvian President Alan Garcia that he would work with US lawmakers to try to quickly push through a free trade agreement between the two countries." After meeting with Garcia, Bush told reporters, "The central issue facing us right now is the passage of a free trade agreement. I assured the president that I will work with Congress as soon as possible to get this agreement passed." Garcia "expressed satisfaction" with Bush's assurance, saying the pact would "help achieve stronger democratic institutions in Peru." The AP called the White House invitation "a demonstration of Administration support for the moderate policies Garcia espouses in contrast to leftist sentiment evident elsewhere on the continent."

LATimes Calls For Pact's Approval. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, 918K) editorializes that President Kennedy's program to develop Latin America called the Alliance for Progress "was invoked Tuesday by Peruvian President Alan Garcia during a news conference at the White House with President Bush," when he said "that the things the aid program failed to do in the 1960s, free trade could do today. Garcia is anxious over a free-trade pact that both the U.S. and Peru have signed but that has yet to be ratified by Congress" that replaces a previous trade pact. If, by the end of the year "the new pact isn't in place…thousands of Peruvian products will lose duty-free access to the U.S. market, which accounts for about 30% of Peru's exports." This "would be a disaster on many fronts," as the access helps "build diversified economies" that "lessen…reliance on coca." Also, "it will be playing into the hands of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and others trying to encourage the spread of anti-Americanism in the region." This "shouldn't be a tough decision by Congress, yet leaders have held up a vote until after the Nov. 7 election," but "Election-year politics should not be allowed to hijack this important trade deal."

Federal Taskforce To Pursue Cuba Sanctions Violators. The AP (10/11, Anderson) reports that in "the latest move by the Bush administration to tighten restrictions that were first imposed in the early 1960s and expanded frequently since," a new law enforcement task force "will aggressively pursue violators of the U.S. trade and travel sanctions that have been in effect against Cuba for more than four decades." It "includes the Treasury Department, FBI, and departments of Homeland Security and Commerce," and is intended to "bring greater emphasis to existing Cuba sanction enforcement efforts that are scattered among several federal agencies." It will "be coordinated by two senior prosecutors in Miami-based U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta's office." The move "comes about a month before U.S. elections in which Cuban-American voters in South Florida — most of them fervently anti-Castro — form an important Republican Party constituency."

Top Treasury Aide On China Quits. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A7, Phillips, 2.03M) reports, "Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's top China hand," Deborah Lehr, "quit just a month after coming aboard to run the Bush administration's new economic dialogue with Beijing." When Paulson "met with top Chinese officials, he had Ms. Lehr close by his side as a signal of her stature at Treasury and in the new two-way financial diplomacy." She "resigned for 'personal reasons,' not because of any disagreement over how the U.S. should approach China." Now the "task of organizing the strategic dialogue falls to Undersecretary for International Affairs Timothy Adams…and to former State Department aide Taiya Smith, the secretary's deputy chief of staff."

Libya Makes Deal With Nonprofit To Supply Its Schoolchildren With Laptops. The New York Times (10/11, Markoff, 1.21M) reports, "The government of Libya reached an agreement on Tuesday with One Laptop Per Child, a nonprofit United States group developing an inexpensive, educational laptop computer, with the goal of supplying machines to all 1.2 million Libyan schoolchildren by June of 2008." Conceived in 2005 by MIT computer researcher Nicholas Negroponte, the brother of the United States intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, "The project, which is intended to supply computers broadly to children in developing nations," already "reached tentative purchase agreements with Brazil, Argentina, Nigeria and Thailand, and has struck a manufacturing deal with Quanta Computer Inc., a Taiwanese computer maker."

Washington Gathering Pushes For Action On Uganda. The Washington Post (10/11, A13, Boustany, 748K) reports, "Donning yellow and orange T-shirts, 700 activists from across the country pressed legislators and Capitol Hill staffers yesterday on the need for high-level American involvement to bring peace to northern Uganda," as "A number of nonprofit civic groups participated in the two-day gathering." John Prendergast, a senior adviser to the International Crisis Group who has served in past U.S. administrations," said, "I think a deal" between the warring factions "is possible, but it won't happen unless the U.S. engages." He added, "The absence of the Bush administration from the talks is condemning millions of northern Ugandans to a fate little better than death." New Jersey Rep. Christopher H. Smith "said he was going to call Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to ask her to send an envoy to the Uganda peace talks."

DOJ_NMG_0078744

Europe's "Centrists" Growing Concerned Over Islam. The New York Times (10/11, Bilefsky, Fisher, 1.21M) reports, "Europe appears to be crossing an invisible line regarding its Muslim minorities: more people in the political mainstream are arguing that Islam cannot be reconciled with European values." The Times adds "centrists" across Europe are "angry at terror attacks in the name of religion on a continent that has largely abandoned it, and disturbed that any criticism of Islam or Muslim immigration provokes threats of violence." Now "Europeans are discussing the limits of tolerance, the right with increasing stridency and the left with trepidation" as "those normally seen as moderates — ordinary people as well as politicians — are asking whether once unquestioned values of tolerance and multiculturalism should have limits." However, some "Muslims say this new mood is suddenly imposing expectations that never existed before that Muslims be exactly like their European hosts." Also, "the line between open criticism of another group or religion and bigotry can be a thin one, and many Muslims worry that it is being crossed more and more."

TV Producer Calls For Understanding Arab Side Of Issues. Souheila Al-Jadda, associate producer of a Peabody award-winning show, "Mosaic: World News from the Middle East," on Link TV, writes in an op-ed in USA Today (10/11, 2.27M) that "people in the Middle East don't hate us; in fact, most like our Western culture and its values. What they hate is our foreign policy," and "To win the confidence of people in the Arab world and have them accept Western values, U.S. foreign policy must reflect these values." There is "a new trend…emerging, with Western and Middle East news outlets planning to reach out to the other side and build bridges of understanding between their nations and people," and "To spare future generations further conflicts and wars, the world must support these modest attempts to bring differing opinions to new audiences. Ultimately, though, the will to engage in a global dialogue must be backed by a will to understand and a desire to change."

Arab, Muslim Activists Call On US To Support Arab Democracy. Radwan A. Masmoudi and Amr Hamzawy adapt an open letter to President Bush signed by 103 other Arab and Muslim activists and thinkers in Arab countries, Europe, the United States and elsewhere who have worked in support of democracy in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K), "As Arab and Muslim intellectuals and activists concerned about the promotion of democracy in our region, we call on America and its president to reaffirm -- in words and actions -- its commitment to sustained democratic reform in the Arab world" and "entreat America to do all it can to ensure that a small number of authoritarian rulers will not control the future of more than 300 million Arabs." Some in the United States are "worried by recent Islamist gains among voters in Palestine and Egypt." However, "there is no way to advance liberty without inclusion of all elements that are willing to abide by democratic rules and reject violence," and "Democratic participation is the only way to combat extremism and pressure all groups, including Islamists, to moderate their stance in order to maximize their share of the vote." While "democracy is not easily attained and must ultimately come from within," it also "can receive encouragement and support, both of which it badly needs today in Arab countries." When "Arab citizens are able to have their choice, they will choose democracy, freedom, peace and progress."

NYTimes Urges US To Support Ban's Proposed UN Reforms. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M) editorializes, "This week the Security Council picked Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon of South Korea" to be Secretary General. "The United Nations is an essential organization for promoting American foreign policy goals and for achieving a fairer and more peaceful world. Yet the past few years have done serious damage," and "the single most ominous problem has been the sometimes hostile, sometimes aloof, but never constructively supportive attitude of the Bush administration." Secretary General Ban "cannot succeed without Washington's active cooperation, or without pushing through the reforms that fell short in the current term." He also needs "to cut back on obsolete study missions, layers of duplicative committees and sinecure staff positions that have piled up over decades without serious review. The United States strongly backed Mr. Ban's candidacy. If it supports Mr. Ban in doing his job, it would increase his chances for success."

DOJ_NMG_0078745

WSJournal Urges Costa Rica To Implement Flat Tax. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "The first country in Latin America that institutes a flat-tax regime is going to make history for that region." Former Estonian Prime Minister Mart Laar was in "Costa Rica last month to explain the groundbreaking structural change in his own country that sparked a free-market revolution all over Eastern Europe," but "the Costa Rican government is already trying to close the door on Mr. Laar's ideas." Instead, it "is promising an alternate plan that, if" President Oscar Arias's "rhetoric is any guide, will almost certainly raise taxes." However, the flat tax is supported by the press, and Arias's proposal may not pass his Congress. "Costa Rica has a chance to transform the region. It should take it."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Democrats Aim At The Red."
"U.S. Fears Export Of Technology."
"O.C.'s 'Ring' Cycle Is Heaven For World's Opera Buffs."
"Two More Finalists Disclosed In Search For L.A. Schools Chief Job."
"Biologist Bushwhacks His Way To Court."
"U.S. Fears Export Of Technology."
"L.A. Liquor Store Owner Dares To Stand Up To Gangs."

USA Today:
"Against All Odds, Barbaro Perseveres."
"Report Skeptical Of Fraud At Polls."
"A Flunked Nuclear Test?"

New York Times:
"Rice Asserts U.S. Plans No Attack On North Korea."
"Instant Fallout For Politicians: Finger-Pointing."
"Religion-Based Tax Breaks: Housing To Paychecks To Books."
"3rd Iraq Death Has One Town Shaken To Core."
"Across Europe, Worries On Islam Spread To Center."
"Far From Big City, Hidden Toll Of Homelessness."

Washington Post:
"China Says It Will Back Sanctions On N. Korea."
"In Ohio, 'Values' Decline As Voting Issue."
"In Marine's Death, Clues To A Son's Life."
"North-South Relations Suffer A Sudden Chill."
"FBI Agents Still Lacking Arabic Skills."
"The Handwriting Is On The Wall."

Washington Times:
"China Hints Agreement On N. Korea."
"Winter Heating Likely To Cost Less."
"Islamic Center Files Suit On Checks."
"Fence Funding In Budget Just The Start."
"Hastert Vows To Fire Staff In Foley Cover-Up."
"Democrats Veer To The Right In Fight For House."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Fulton Jail Not Fixed, Judge Told."
"Consumers Warm Up To Lower Energy Costs."
"N. Korea Strains Chinese Support."
"Google Deal Makes YouTube Founders Giddy Millionaires."

Houston Chronicle:
"Council Divided On Wider Smoking Ban."
"Rains Bring Deadly Decision."
"Sanctions Target Sale Of Nuclear Technology."
"My, How Children's Museum Has Grown."
"'King Of The Apartment Business.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Amish School Shooting-Transcripts; School Violence Summit; North Korea Nuclear Test; Possible Asian Nuclear Arms Race; Explosions In Baghdad; Military Recruiting Goals Met; Russian Journalist Killed; Foley Investigation; Warmer Winter; Working Mothers.
CBS: North Korea Nuclear Test; Condoleezza Rice Interview; Black Market-Nuclear Weapon Sales; Amish School Shooting- 911 Transcripts; School Safety; Explosions In Baghdad; Russian Journalist Killed; Foley Investigation; Veteran Candidates; Wade Zinkle Opinion-Iraq; Child Wakes From Coma.
NBC: Nuclear Test Reaction; Political Reaction-North Korea; Explosions In Baghdad; Russian Journalist Killed; Foley Investigation; Stock Market; School Violence Summit; Heating Prices Drop; Not Able To Retire; Bump Flights; Kids Making Money.

DOJ_NMG_0078746

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: North Korea Nuke Test; Iraq-US Ammo Dump Explosion; Bush-School Safety Summit; Midwest-Cold Snap.

CBS: China-North Korea Nuke Test; Hastert-Foley Scandal; Amish School Shootings-911 Calls; Bush-School Safety Summit; MLB Playoffs.

NPR: Japan-Earthquake; UN-North Korea Nuke Test; Durbin-Iraq Comments; Amish School Shootings-911 Calls; Bush-School Safety Summit; Foley Scandal Investigation; Philippines-Bombings; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with the Commander in Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Oval Office; meets with the President of the Southern Baptist Convention, Oval Office; speaks on the budget and the economy, Room 450, Eisenhower EOB.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Steve Chabot for Congress luncheon, Cincinnati Museum Center at Union Terminal, Cincinnati; participates in a Helping America's Youth event, Knoxville, Tenn.; speaks at a Bob Corker for Senate and Tennessee Republican Party reception, Knoxville.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRIME MINISTER GEIR HAARDE OF ICELAND _ Highlights: 4:30 p.m. Speaks at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies on U.S.-Iceland relations and future defense arrangements. room 500, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. Nw.

ARMY ASSOCIATION _ The Association of the United States Army holds its 2006 Annual Meeting & Exposition. Highlights: 11:30 a.m. Sustaining member reception/luncheon. Speaker: Kenneth J. Krieg, under secretary of defense for acquisition, technology and logistics, 12 p.m. Army Civilian Luncheon. Speaker: Under Secretary of the Army Pete Geren. 6 p.m. George C. Marshall Memorial Reception and Dinner. Marshall Medal receipient is former Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H. Location: Washington Convention Center.

BIOSCIENCE _ 8:30 a.m. 2006 Mid-Atlantic Bio: The Conference for Industry and Investors, the 2nd annual regional biotechnology forum. Highlights: 10:15 a.m. Plenary Session - Keynote Address. Keynote Address by Anthony S. Fauci, M.D., Director, NIAID, National Institutes of Health. Contacts: Alicia Moran, 703-739-2424 ext 110.

SCIENCE DEBATES _ 8:15 a.m. The American Association for the Advancement of Science holds a seminar to discuss how scientists, political strategists, reporters and others define science in debates over global warming, stem cells and other issues. Location: AAAS Auditorium, 1200 New York Ave. NW.

RUSSIA-GEORGIA _ 8:30 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a discussion with Russian experts discussing the situation in Georgia. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PUBLIC OPINION _ 8:45 a.m. The Chicago Council on Global Affairs, others, releases its 2006 Public Opinion Survey revealing important similarities and differences between public attitudes in the United States, China and India with regard to foreign policy priorities. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

CHINA _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a conference on expanding and improving interaction between U.S. and Chinese policy communities. Location: 4th floor conference room, 1800 K St. NW.

TRADE PREFERENCES _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. WITA hosts an off-the-record Insider panel discussion of the prospects for renewal of the Generalized System of Preferecnes (GSP) Program. Speakers include: Laura Baughman, Coalition for GSP and President, The Trade Partnership; Angela Ellard, Staff Director and Trade Counsel (Republican), House Ways and Means; Tim Reif, Chief Trade Counsel (Democrat), House Ways and Means. Location: Horizon Ballroom, ground level, Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

GLOBAL THREATS _ 10 a.m. The Brookings Institution holds a briefing to release the findings of a report on the use of force to confront the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, terrorism and grave humanitarian crises. Participants include James Steinbert of the University of Texas, former Botswana Amb. Alfred Dube, others. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0078747

IRAN _ 10 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich holds a briefing on the threat of war against Iran, with former nuclear weapons inspector David Kay, Joseph Cirincione at the Center for American Progress, President Trita Parsi of the National Iranian American Council, others. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

BASHAM-HOMELAND SECURITY _ 11 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce hosts a trade security business forum with Commissioner W. Ralph Basham, Customs and Border Protection, U.S. Department of Homeland Security. Basham will address the broader business community for the first time in his new role, and will discuss top issues affecting homeland security today. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, 1615 H St. NW.

NORTH KOREA _ 11 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a briefing regarding North Koreas nuclear test and associated issues. Location: B-1-B conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

ENVIRONMENTAL SCORECARD _ 12 p.m. The League of Conservation Voters holds a news conference to release its 2006 National Environmental Scorecard. Location: LCV offices, Suite 800, 1920 L St. NW.

HURRICANES-CLIMATE CHANGE _ 12 p.m. The Washington Roundtable on Science and Public Policy hosts a presentation on ``Hurricanes and Climate Change: Assessing the Linkages Following the 2006 Season," with Dr. William Gray, Colorado State University. Location: Capitol Hill Club, 300 First St. SE.

HEALTHCARE _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Former Senator John Breaux joins David Kendall, Senior Fellow for Health Policy and Director of the Health Priorities Project, Progressive Policy Institute; Peter Pitts, Director of the Center for Medicine in the Public Interest; and Professor James A. Thurber, Director, Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies, American University for a lunch forum as part of Breaux's ``Ceasefire on Health Care" campaign. Location: American University, Butler Ballroom, Butler Pavilion, 6th floor.

HEALTHCARE _ 12:15 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform co-sponsor a luncheon briefing, ``Measuring up: A Comprehensive Scorecard for America's Health System." A new assessment by Commonwealth finds that deficiencies in the nations health care system cost 100,000 to 150,000 lives and $50 to $100 billion annually. Panelists: Cathy Schoen, The Commonwealth Fund and Tom Miller, American Enterprise Institute. Senior congressional staff members will be on hand to react to panelist presentations. Ed Howard of the Alliance and Steve Schoenbaum of Commonwealth will moderate. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

VOTER SURVEY _ 1:30 p.m. The Civil Society Institute holds a telephone briefing to release a survey of likely voters who are ``red, white and green." Notes: Callin number: 800-860-2442; passcode: ``red, white and green voter survey."

IRAQ-REID _ 2:15 p.m. Sen. Jack Reid holds a news conference on his trip to Iraq. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

IRAQ _ 6 p.m. George Washington University's Public Diplomacy Institute will host ``Anatomy of a Failure: What Went Wrong in Iraq?" featuring Washington Post reporters Tom Ricks and Rajiv Chandresakaran, who have both recently written books on the subject. The forum will be followed by a book signing for both authors. Location: George Washington University Law School, LL102, Lerner Hall Lower Level, 2000 H St. NW.

MILITARY COMMISSIONS _ 7 p.m. Georgetown University holds a panel discussion on the Military Commissions Act of 2006, with university faculty. Location: Bunn Center Auditorium, on campus.

US-PALESTINE _ 7 p.m. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will deliver the keynote speech at the American Task Force on Palestine Inaugural Gala. Other participants include Prince Turki al-Faisal, Ambassador of Saudi Arabia; Ambassador Afif Safiyeh, Head of the PLO Mission to the U.S.; Sens. Carl Levin and John Sununu. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Albany Mosque Leaders Convicted Of Terrorism-Related Charges ... 3
FBI Still Has Few Arabic-Speaking Agents ... 3
NYTimes Says Navy Killed Lawyer's Career Following Hamdan Case ... 3

Homeland Response:

Tariq Ramadan Said To Have Chance Of Obtaining US Visa ... 4
Congress Sets Six-Month Deadline For DHS To Fix Watch Lists. 4
State Farm Alleged To Have Wrongfully Denied Katrina-Related Claims ... 4

War News:

Dozens Of Bodies Turn Up In Baghdad As Violence Continues ... 4
Study Estimates 600,000 Iraqis Killed Since 2003 ... 5
Five US Servicemen Killed In Iraq ... 6
Troops Often Need Iraqi Approval To Act ... 6
DNA Confirms Identity Of Dead Al Qaeda Militant ... 6
Snowe Seeks Policy Change On Iraq ... 6
Kurds Build Airport ... 6
Military Meets Recruiting Goals ... 6
Data Suggest Vast Disability Claims Lie Ahead ... 7
Schoomaker Says US Needs Consensus Against Terrorism ... 7

Corporate Scandals:

Bed Bath & Beyond Admits To Backdating Stock Options ... 7
Two Former Comverse Officials In Plea Talks With US ... 7
Skilling Wants Enron Conviction Overturned ... 8
Third Trial Begins For Cendant's Forbes ... 8
Buffett Warns Berkshire Managers Against Unethical Behavior ... 8
Dunn Defends Her Actions As H-P Chairman ... 9
Judge Orders Conrad Black Not To Sell Wife's Diamond Ring ... 9

Criminal Law:

President Holds School Safety Conference ... 10
911 Transcripts Released From Amish School Shooting ... 14
FBI Interviews Page Who Received Messages From Foley ... 14
Hastert Pledges To Fire Any Aides Involved In Foley "Cover Up." 15
Kolbe Clarifies His Knowledge Of Foley E-Mails ... 16
Records Suggest Abramoff Had Lobbying Contacts With Pombo 16
Judge Orders DOJ To Respond To Siegelman Evidence Preservation Order ... 17
DOJ Seeks Death Penalty In Puerto Rico Murder Case ... 17
High Court Considers Viability Of Flawed Indictments ... 17
Attorney For Suspect In Killing Of Washington Federal Prosecutor Declares Innocence ... 18
FBI Investigating Specter Aide Over Pentagon Contract To Lobbyist Husband ... 18
Ney To Appear In Court Friday ... 18
Malvo Pleads Guilty To Six Counts Of First Degree Murder ... 18
Judge Delays Wecht Trial Until 3rd Circuit Rules On FBI Records ... 19
California City Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Corruption Charges ... 19
Philadelphia Architect Sentenced To Probation For Illegal Contributions ... 19
Immunized Computer Technician Helped FBI Access Fumo Emails ... 19
Missouri Federal Prosecutors Begin Child-Porn Crackdown ... 20
Former California TV Reporter Charged In Alleged Child Sex Abuse Case ... 20
Aviation Experts Debate Whether Criminal Charges Should Follow Jet Crashes ... 20
Prosecutor Drops Assault Charge Against Maryland State Senate President ... 20
Missouri Nursing Home Operator Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud ... 21
Federal Officials Eye Woman's Property In Prostitution Case ... 21
DC Mosque Accuses Financial Manager Of Embezzlement ... 21
Chicago Police Question Suspect In Triple Homicide ... 21
Three Year Old Girl's Alleged Shooter Captured ... 21
Liquor Store Owner Fears Reprisals After Tracking Down Gang Members Who Robbed His Store ... 21
Three Men Charged In Robbery Murder ... 21

Civil Law:

Oracle Settles GSA Contract Fraud Charges With DOJ For $98.5 Million ... 22
High Court Finds For Small Tobacco Firms ... 22
Plame Parts Ways With Lawyer In Civil Suit ... 23
US Challenges AIDS Funding Ruling ... 23

Civil Rights:

DOJ Charges Black Political Leader In Mississippi With Suppressing White Vote ... 23

Parties Agree To Stop Crossover Voting In South Carolina Primaries ... 23
Report Finds Little Evidence Of Polling Place Fraud ... 24
SCOTUS Rejects Gay Marriage, Abortion Cases ... 24
Marcus Concerned Over Popularity Of South Dakota Abortion Ban ... 24
Real Estate Brokerage Accused Of Discriminatory Sales Practices ... 24
NYTimes Celebrates US Diversity ... 25

Antitrust:

DOJ Expected To Approve AT&T-BellSouth Merger ... 25
Investor Claims Microsoft Helped Utah Firm Finance Linux Litigation ... 25
DOJ Launches Antitrust Probe Of Private Equity Firms ... 26
Judge Delivers Split Ruling In Qualcomm-Broadcom Dispute ... 26
SCOTUS Considers Case Pitting Telecoms Against Pay-Phone Providers ... 27
Sprint Nextel Losing Ground Since Last Year's Merger ... 27
Texas Pacific Group, AXA To Buy 60% Stake In TDF ... 27
Google To Pay $1.65 Billion For YouTube ... 27

Environment:

Lettuce Tests Negative For E. Coli Bacteria ... 28
Federal Court Rulings Hinder Administration's Federal Land Development Strategy ... 28
EPA Says Texas Copper Plant Illegally Burned Hazardous Waste ... 29
Ultralow-Sulfur Diesel Fuel To Debut In US Market ... 29
Environmentalist Faces Charges For Destroying Invasive Plant 29
Supreme Court Upholds Ruling Requiring W.R. Grace To Pay For Asbestos Cleanup ... 29
Congress, Bush Move To Cleanup Pacific "Garbage Patch." ... 30

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Six Indicted In Missouri Cocaine Trafficking Ring ... 30
Baltimore Company's Online Painkiller Sales Lead To Arrests ... 30
Georgia Man Seeks To Return Home Before Drug-Trafficking Trial Begins ... 30
Man Gets Stuck In Tunnel Trying To Enter US From Mexico ... 30
Arizona Couple Facing Federal Drug Charges Relinquishes Church Leadership ... 31
FARC Member's Trial To Begin In DC ... 31
US Cracks Down On Illegal Guns In New Orleans ... 31
West Virginia Attorney Sentenced To Six Months For Gun Violations ... 31
Washington Gang Sweep Nets 40 Arrests ... 31

Immigration:

High Court Refuses To Hear Deportation Appeal Of Former Nazi Guard ... 32
Groups Seek Freedom For Immigrant Detainees In California ... 32
Bush Seen As Avoiding Immigration Issue On Campaign Trail .. 33

Tax:

Many US Expatriates Face Tax Increase This Year ... 33
Minister Fights To Preserve Religious-Based Tax Breaks ... 33

Congress-Administration:

Bush Warns Democrats Would Raise Taxes ... 34
In Fiscal 2006, Medicaid Saw Smallest Spending Boost In A Decade ... 35
DOE Says Most Home Heating Costs Will Drop This Winter ... 35
Administration's Effort To End Homelessness Said to Neglect Rural Areas ... 35
Defense Contractors Consider Murtha As Majority Leader ... 35
DeMint Expected To Head GOP Steering Committee ... 36
FAA Administrator Seeks To Strengthen Agency's Public Profile 36
Stalled Postal Reform Bill Examined ... 36
NYTimes Urges High Court To Uphold Ruling On Courtroom Photos ... 36
WPost Calls For Increasing Federal Funding For Education ... 36

Other News:

Mortgage Debt Said To Color Voters' Perceptions Of The Economy ... 37
Exposure Of Foley's Internet Contact With Pages Included Effort By Democrats ... 38
Rove's Fundraising For GOP Candidates Seen As Unprecedented ... 39
Democrats Hope To Take Advantage Of Dissatisfaction With Iraq War ... 39
Democrats Said To Need Support Of Rural Red State Voters To Flip Senate ... 39
Many Democratic Candidates Taking Conservative Positions ... 39
527 Groups Expected To Spend Over $300 Million On Midterm Election Ads ... 39
Belated Agreements Over Turnout Plan Funding Could Make Difference For Democrats ... 40
DSCC Launches $1 Million Ad Campaign For Webb ... 40
Ford, Corker Seek To Seek To Establish Independent Credentials ... 41
Poll Shows Lieberman Leading Lamont 48%-40% ... 41
Trial Lawyer Pledges $5 Million To Jump Start Bell Bid For Texas Governor ... 41
Poll Show Crist With Ten Point Lead In Florida Governor's Race 42
Taylor Benefited From Earmarks For District ... 42
Rural Areas Benefit From More Charitable Giving ... 42
Stark Says Private Sector Not More Efficient Than Medicare On Prescription Drugs ... 42
As China Signals Support For Sanctions, Rice Says US Not Planning To Attack North Korea ... 42
McCain Says Clinton Policies Set Stage For Current North Korean Situation ... 46
Officials From Six Nations To Discuss Possible Sanctions On Iran ... 48
Olmert Dismisses Syrian Peace Overtures ... 48
Hamas Rejects Conditions For Unity Government ... 48
Bush Tells Peru's Garcia He Will Press For Trade Pact Approval 49
Federal Taskforce To Pursue Cuba Sanctions Violators ... 49
Top Treasury Aide On China Quits ... 49
Libya Makes Deal With Nonprofit To Supply Its Schoolchildren With Laptops ... 49

DOJ_NMG_0078750

Washington Gathering Pushes For Action On Uganda 49
Europe's "Centrists" Growing Concerned Over Islam 50
TV Producer Calls For Understanding Arab Side Of Issues 50
Arab, Muslim Activists Call On US To Support Arab Democracy 50
NYTimes Urges US To Support Ban's Proposed UN Reforms... 50
WSJournal Urges Costa Rica To Implement Flat Tax..... 50

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 51

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 51

TERRORISM NEWS:

Albany Mosque Leaders Convicted Of Terrorism-Related Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/11, Virtanen) reports, "Two mosque leaders arrested in a terrorism-related sting were convicted Tuesday of federal money laundering charges. Yassin Aref, imam at the Masjid as-Salam mosque in Albany, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and a founder of the mosque, were never accused of being terrorists, but prosecutors said they laundered money in 2003-04 for an FBI informant." The AP notes, "Hossain was convicted on all 27 charges against him, including three counts of conspiracy. The jury…found Aref guilty of 10 of the 30 charges against him. … 'Obviously we had a couple of individuals that were prone to supporting terrorism,' U.S. Attorney Glenn Suddaby said after the verdict. 'The FBI did what they had to do.'"

The Albany Times Union (10/11, Lyons, 103K) notes, "Jurors on Friday asked to watch an FBI surveillance videotape of a key meeting between an undercover informant and Aref. At the meeting, which took place in January 2004, about six months after the sting began, the two men discussed the informant's plan to 'legalize' money that he was loaning to Hossain." Capital News 9 Albany (10/10, Ferrence) reported US Attorney Bill Pericak said, "This is a world where when we have suspicions about people, we have a choice. Do we do something or do we wait until something happens?" Pericak added that "the government sting operation nabbed two men who could have walked away from the FBI informant who pretended to be a missile dealer to a terrorist organization. But they didn't."

The New York Times (10/11, Wilson, 1.21M) reports, "A lawyer for Mr. Hossain, Kevin A. Luibrand, said that the defendants would appeal, and that the entrapment theory would again be raised. 'Before the government arrived on the scene, they were not committing any crimes and were not thinking about committing any crimes,' he said. The men are to be sentenced on Feb. 12. The lengths of their sentences were unknown Tuesday, with Mr. Luibrand estimating 20 years in prison for Mr. Hossain, who was convicted of more crimes than Mr. Aref."

FBI Still Has Few Arabic-Speaking Agents. Under the headline "FBI Agents Still Lacking Arabic Skills," the Washington Post (10/11, Eggen, 748K) reports in a front-page story that five years after 9/11, "only 33 FBI agents have even a limited proficiency in Arabic, and none of them work in the sections of the bureau that coordinate investigations of international terrorism, according to new FBI statistics. … The same challenge is facing the CIA and other agencies as the government competes with the private sector for a limited number of applicants with foreign-language proficiency, according to U.S. officials and experts." Georgetown associate professor Daniel Byman "said the FBI's continuing failure to attract Arabic-speaking agents is 'a serious problem' that hurts the bureau's relations with immigrant communities and makes it more difficult to gather intelligence on extremist groups." However, "Margaret Gulotta, chief of the FBI's language services section, said in an interview that the bureau has made significant progress since 9/11 in increasing the number of translators who speak Arabic and other foreign languages."

NYTimes Says Navy Killed Lawyer's Career Following Hamdan Case. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M) editorializes that Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift's "integrity helped spark" the debate over prisoner treatment at Guantánamo Bay when he refused "to represent Salim Hamdan, a Yemeni citizen accused of being a high-ranking member of Al Qaeda — for the sole purpose of getting him to plead guilty before one of the military commissions that President Bush created for Guantánamo Bay." Instead, Swift "did his duty and defended his client," only to see the Navy respond "by killing his military career. About two weeks after the historic high court victory in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Commander Swift was told he was being denied a promotion. Under the Navy's up-or-out system, that spelled the end of his 20-year career, and Commander Swift said last week that he will be retiring in March or April." The Times says the Navy's actions send a "chilling message…to remaining military lawyers about the potential consequences of taking their job, and justice, seriously."

DOJ_NMG_0078751

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Tariq Ramadan Said To Have Chance Of Obtaining US Visa. Rachel Ehrenfeld, director of the American Center for Democracy and Alyssa A. Lappen, a senior fellow at the American Center for Democracy, in an op-ed for the Washington Times (10/11, Ehrenfeld, Lappen, 88K) write, "Tariq Ramadan's latest attempt to legally obtain a visa to the United States was denied on Sept. 24.," on the grounds that his actions "constituted providing material support to a terrorist organization," according to State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus. Ramadan contends that his contributions to "the French-based Hamas front 'Committee for Palestinian Charity and Aid'" were made before it was listed as a terrorist organization and says that "his funding of Hamas was just an excuse. The 'Bush administration has barred me for a much simpler reason: It doesn't care for my political views.'" However, Ehrenfeld and Lappen write that Ramadan enjoys growing "popularity among the Europeans," and say he should not be counted "out, yet. The American Civil Liberties Union, which filled several lawsuits on his behalf, condemned the State Department's decision, and said, 'it was considering an appeal.' Stay tuned."

Congress Sets Six-Month Deadline For DHS To Fix Watch Lists. Government Executive/CongressDaily (10/10, Strohm) reported, "With frustration levels apparently reaching an all-time high, lawmakers have given the Homeland Security Department a hard deadline to revamp its process for clearing individuals who have been wrongly put on terrorist watch lists. The fiscal 2007 Homeland Security appropriations bill…requires the department within six months to 'establish revised procedures for expeditiously clearing individuals whose names have been mistakenly placed on a terrorist database list or who have names identical or similar to individuals on a terrorist database list.'" CongressDaily noted, "The FBI's Terrorist Screening Center is responsible for managing and consolidating all government watch lists. The FBI and TSA both issued statements in the last two days defending watch lists as valuable counterterrorism tools and clarifying current redress procedures."

State Farm Alleged To Have Wrongfully Denied Katrina-Related Claims. The National Law Journal (10/11, Geier) reports, "Allegations by whistleblowers and plaintiffs lawyers that State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. used a 'one-size-fits-all' engineering report to deny policyholders' Katrina-related claims are stirring up Mississippi's southern federal district." The Journal continues, "State and federal prosecutors and grand jurors are looking into allegations that insurance claims were denied on the basis of a biased engineering report. The allegations were brought to light by two claims adjusters who had worked for an Alabama risk management firm under contract with Bloomington, Ill.-based State Farm." The Journal adds, "Richard T. 'Flip' Phillips of Smith, Phillips, Mitchell, Scott & Nowak of Batesville, Miss., an attorney representing Judy M. Guice in a mass tort on behalf of Mississippi homeowners who lost their homes, alleges that State Farm's tactics reveal 'a calculated strategy of wrongful claims denial.' Guice v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., No. 06-cv-1 (S.D. Miss.). … 'If they're allowed to do this, the lesson the insurance industry will have learned is that in mass catastrophe situations, a calculated course of across-the-board, wrongful claims denial and trying one case at a time pays,' Phillips said. … State Farm spokesman Phil Supple said that the company has been resolving claims fairly and is cooperating with state and federal probes into its activities." The Journal notes, "Underlying the litigation is the issue of whether the damage to policyholders' homes was caused by Katrina's high winds, which most policies cover, or by the storm surge and high waters, against which many policyholders were not insured. The southern district of Mississippi so far has denied class certification on the ground that each case involves its own set of circumstances as to the percentage of wind to water damage. … But the plaintiffs allege that State Farm used a 'generic engineering report ... which concluded that all of the hurricane damage to property on the Mississippi Gulf Coast was caused by storm surge and not by hurricane wind,' in essence to deny all of their claims, according to an amended complaint filed in McFarland v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., No. 06-466 (S.D. Miss.)."

WAR NEWS:

Dozens Of Bodies Turn Up In Baghdad As Violence Continues. The New York Times (10/11, Luo, 1.21M) reports in a bleak article, "Dozens of bodies turned up in Baghdad and a series of bombs killed at least 17 people on Tuesday, indicating that the sectarian violence in the capital showed little sign of easing, despite efforts by the American military and its Iraqi counterparts to quell it. At least 50 bodies, riddled with bullets and many bearing signs of torture, were discovered across Baghdad."

The Iraqi immigration minister "said more than 300,000 Iraqis have fled their homes [while remaining in Iraq] since the American-led invasion in 2003, The Associated Press reported. Half of them left after the February bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra set off cascades of sectarian violence. He estimated that about 890,000 Iraqis have moved to Jordan, Iran and Syria since 2003."

USA Today (10/11, 2.27M) reports, "A bomb blew up Tuesday outside a bakery in a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad, killing 11 people who had been waiting in line. In addition, police told the Associated Press they had discovered the mutilated bodies of 60 men in different parts of Baghdad over the 24-hour period ending Tuesday morning."

DOJ_NMG_0078752

The AP (10/11, Al-Bashir) reports the bombing and observes that the "Iraqi government put forward a new idea to help stop sectarian violence: ensuring security checkpoints in the capital have an equal number of Shiite and Sunni troops." The AP also reports the ammunition fire on the US military base.

All three networks reported the ammunition dump explosion. ABC World News (10/10, story 5, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Still overseas tonight, several spectacular explosions have rocked a small US military base in southern Baghdad. An ammunitions storage area caught fire, possibly as the result of mortar fire. The blaze set off stores of ammunition and ordnance. There were no reports of injuries. Also in Baghdad, the bodies of 110 men have been found bumped across the city just since yesterday morning. Most of them had been bound, shot and tortured. Sectarian death squads are suspected."

CBS Evening News (10/10, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported it as an insurgent attack, saying, "Overseas tonight a US military base in Baghdad came under attack. An ammunition dump was hit, setting off huge explosions. The blast continued for hours, and the flames could be seen for miles. No injuries were reported, and it's not known who is responsible."

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 3, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We turn to Iraq, where there have been explosions in Baghdad tonight. A series of them on the outskirts of that city felt across a wide area." NBC (Engel) added, "These explosions at a forward operating base in south Baghdad, an ammunition depot caught fire, the US military is still not saying exactly why but thousands of tank, shells and artillery rounds were exploding into the night sky. Witnesses in the area said the base had been attacked by mortar rounds for about 20 minutes before this fire began. After the explosions erupted, the base was put on a state of high alert. Soldiers were ordered into bunkers. The fire brigade on the base was able to contain it and according to the US military, there were no casualties." Williams: "Another topic in Iraq, I know we'll have more reporting on it tomorrow night, but something in the news lately, this exodus of Iraqis out of that country. How big are the numbers?" Engel: "The numbers are staggering according to Iraq's minister of migration. Some of it happening in this area where the base was attacked, apparently this evening. According to the minister, the ethnic tension that has been on the rise in this country has caused about 300,000 Iraqis to flee their homes. These are internally displaced people. Shi'ites forced out of Sunni neighborhoods, Sunnis forced to leave Shi'ite areas. They call it ethnic cleansing and almost one million Iraqis have left the country all together, moving to neighboring countries. Right after the fall of Saddam, people here started to save their money. Some Iraqis, doctors and professionals, left the country looking for work. Now people are saving their money just so they can leave. Anyone who can get $1,000 together is trying to get themselves to Syria, Jordan or Iran."

The AP (10/11, Keath) reports, "A fire broke out at an ammunition depot at a U.S. base in southern Baghdad on Tuesday night, setting off a series of explosions from detonating tank and artillery shells that shook buildings miles away. ... It was not clear whether the depot at Forward Operating Base Falcon was hit by an attack." The base "is near the violence-torn district of Dora, where U.S. troops have been focusing in a 2-month-old sweep of the capital neighborhood-by-neighborhood aimed at rooting out militants and weapons."

The McClatchy Newspapers (10/11, Price) also reports the fire, noting, "An insurgent group called Al Fataheen Army took credit for the damage in a posting on an Islamic forum used by various insurgent groups in Iraq. The group said it had attacked the base with several missiles at 11:55 p.m., but that timing cast suspicion on the claim. The explosions, which could be felt throughout the city, had begun about an hour earlier."

AFP (10/10) reports, "The damage appeared to have been contained within the base, the US spokesman said, although Iraqi officials said that shells 'cooking off' in the fire had crashed down in five districts in the south of the city."

US Forces' Efforts Clean Up Violent Neighborhood Examined. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "The Amariya neighborhood has won a reputation as the most fearsome quarter of the capital, with car bombs, snipers and frequent clashes between U.S. forces and hardened Sunni Arab fighters. But over the last few weeks, U.S. officials and Iraqi residents say, life has improved markedly in the notorious district, thanks to an American-led effort to improve security and services." However, Lt. Col. Gian Gentile of the 4th ID "acknowledged in an interview that he had to move troops from nearby neighborhoods under his command to bolster security in Amariya, risking rising peril in those districts. He has also had to close off the western Baghdad neighborhood at all but two gateways ... And he has watched helplessly as the district's Shiite Muslim population has plummeted." Gentile "made strenuous efforts to build goodwill. Drawing lessons from previous commanders, he softened his tactical approach."

Study Estimates 600,000 Iraqis Killed Since 2003. USA Today (10/11, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "More than 600,000 Iraqis have died by violence since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to a study released today by researchers at Johns Hopkins University. The figure is based on surveys of households throughout most of the country. It vastly exceeds estimates cited by the Iraqi government, the United Nations, aid and anti-war groups, and President Bush." The study "estimates that 2.5% of the Iraqi population has died as a result of the conflict." The Pentagon and NSC "immediately challenged" the study.

DOJ_NMG_0078753

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A4, King, 2.03M) also reports the study, writing, "The findings are sure to draw fire from skeptics and could color the debate over the war ahead of congressional elections next month." Lead researcher Gilbert Burnham said, "What our data show is that the level of violence is going on throughout the country."

The New York Times (10/11, Tavernise, McNeil, 1.21M) reports in an article that quotes skeptics, "The figure breaks down to about 15,000 violent deaths a month, a number that is quadruple the one for July given by Iraqi government hospitals and the morgue in Baghdad and published last month in a United Nations report in Iraq. ... But it is an estimate and not a precise count, and researchers acknowledged a margin of error that ranged from 426,369 to 793,663 deaths." The findings of the 2004 predecessor study had been "criticized as high, in part because of its relatively narrow sampling of about 1,000 families, and because it carried a large margin of error." Academics Robert Blendon and Donald Berry expressed their misgivings about the current study's sample size and "inappropriate" "tone of accuracy."

The Washington Post (10/11, A12, Brown, 748K) reports that the findings will be "equally" as controversial as those of the 2004 predecessor study. Academic Ronald Waldman and Human Rights Watch official Sarah Leah Whitson are quoted giving credence to the study.

Five US Servicemen Killed In Iraq. The AP (10/10) reports the deaths of three Marines and two soldiers in a brief, factual article: "Three U.S. Marines and two soldiers were killed in fighting in Iraq, the U.S. command said Wednesday. The Marines, assigned to 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, died Monday from enemy action in Iraq's western Anbar province, the military said in a statement. It did not provide further details. Also Monday, a U.S. soldier was killed when his patrol was attacked by insurgents in an eastern part of Baghdad, the military said. The second soldier, attached to the 25th Combat Aviation Brigade, died of wounds from an explosion during a vehicle patrol Sunday north of the city of Tikrit."

Troops Often Need Iraqi Approval To Act. USA Today (10/11, Jervis, 2.27M) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi military forces battling militias in Baghdad often must seek permission from Iraq's government before launching even routine missions, complicating efforts to loosen the grip of religious violence in the capital. ... Tackling militias is a sensitive matter for Iraq's Shiite-dominated government. ... The political considerations have complicated matters for troops operating in Baghdad. ... some officers think a direct confrontation with the Mahdi Army may be inevitable."

DNA Confirms Identity Of Dead Al Qaeda Militant. The AP (10/10, Rising) reports, "DNA tests have confirmed that a man shot to death by British forces was a leading al-Qaida militant who embarrassed the U.S. military by making an unprecedented escape from a maximum-security military prison in Afghanistan, the U.S. command said Tuesday. Omar al-Farouq was shot and killed Sept. 25."

Snowe Seeks Policy Change On Iraq. The AP (10/11, Flaherty) reports, "Sen. Olympia Snowe joined a growing list of Republicans calling for a change of course in Iraq, a position that could undermine President Bush's election-year assertion that the nation shouldn't set a timetable for troops to come home. Snowe, a moderate who often bucks the Republican Party line, said in a statement Tuesday more should be done to pressure the Iraqis to take control of their country and make clear U.S. support is not unlimited." Her remarks "echoed" earlier ones by Sen. John Warner. Other Republicans voicing disappointment are "Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, along with Reps. Christopher Shays of Connecticut and Walter Jones of North Carolina." The AP adds, "As the Nov. 7 elections inch closer, more and more Republicans have grown louder in expressing their opposition to the White House's handling of the war."

Kurds Build Airport. The Washington Post (10/11, A17, 748K) reports, "The Kurds are building a new $300 million airport in Irbil that will take the biggest aircraft in the world, including the Russian Antonov 225 cargo plane and the American C-5 Galaxy ... The Kurds are hoping their dramatic mountain region, the one tranquil part of Iraq, will become a tourist haven as well as a transit refueling stop for international carriers between Europe and Asia or Australia." They also hope the facility becomes "a backup landing strip for NASA shuttles for emergency landings."

Military Meets Recruiting Goals. ABC World News (10/10, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And the Pentagon, today, said all four military branches have met recruiting goals this year, one year after the Army missed its mark by a wide margin. The Army topped its goal of 80,000 active duty recruits by 635, while the Navy, Marines and Air Force made their goals, as well. The Army offered cash bonuses, raised age limits and lowered test standards to help boost its numbers."

DOJ_NMG_0078754

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (10/11) editorializes, "Critics of the Iraq war often slam the Bush Administration for sending unwitting American soldiers off to an unwinnable battle. ... The Pentagon announced yesterday that in fiscal 2006 the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines all met or exceeded active-duty recruitment goals. ... Many of those young people, despite the luxury of choice, have decided to ship off to boot camp and join the world's finest all-volunteer military force. It'd be nice if a few more politicians and pundits respected their decision."

Data Suggest Vast Disability Claims Lie Ahead. The New York Times (10/11, Shane, 1.21M) reports, "Nearly one in five soldiers leaving the military after serving in Iraq and Afghanistan has been at least partly disabled as a result of service, according to documents of the Department of Veterans Affairs obtained by a Washington research group. The number of veterans granted disability compensation, more than 100,000 to date, suggests that taxpayers have only begun to pay the long-term financial cost of the two conflicts. ... [Veterans' advocate Paul Sullivan] said that if the current proportions held up over time, 400,000 returning service members could eventually apply for disability benefits when they retired."

Fallen Troops Remembered. Both the New York Times (10/11, Applebome, 1.21M) and Washington Post (10/11, A1, Morse, 748K) report on the grief felt by survivors of fallen troops. The New York Times (10/11, Applebome, 1.21M) writes that the town of Highland, N.Y., with a population of 10,000, has lost three servicemen in Iraq: "When Pfc. Michael K. Oremus — 'Mikey O' to his friends — was killed by a sniper bullet in Baghdad on Oct. 2, the numbers lost all meaning, washed away by tears ... Death is more tornado than hurricane, picking its spots with capricious malice, but a third soldier gone, Mikey O, in this close-knit throwback of a town, Grover's Corners on the Hudson, seemed particularly beyond grief, beyond pain, beyond knowing." The Times writes, "The funeral for Mikey O, dead at 21, could be the biggest in town history."

The Washington Post (10/11, A1, Morse, 748K) reports on the mother of Marine Sgt. Alex Carbonaro, an only child who died from wounds caused by a roadside bomb and "remains the only service member listed from Bethesda killed in Iraq or Afghanistan." The 2,628-word front page article describes his childhood and service in Iraq, as well as Marines' consolation of Mrs. Carbonaro after his death.

Schoomaker Says US Needs Consensus Against Terrorism. McClatchy (10/11, Brown) reports, "The United States needs to reach a consensus on how to fight terrorists and increase defense spending to make sure the Army stays ready to fight, the Army's chief of staff said Tuesday. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker also called on teachers, parents and other influential adults to encourage young people to serve in the military." He did not "give specific figures about the amount of defense-spending increases he thought was necessary. He said the Army had learned a 'bitter lesson' during the 1990s when 425,000 soldiers were cut from its ranks and expenditures fell to levels unseen since the late 1940s."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bed Bath & Beyond Admits To Backdating Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C4, Maremont) reports, "Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. admitted to rampant backdating of stock-option grants as part of a policy to provide extra incentives to insiders, but said an internal probe found no evidence of 'willful misconduct.' … Bed Bath & Beyond said its internal probe examining the period from its 1992 initial public offering through May 2006 found that the company had misdated options on 44 occasions, 37 of them in favor of the recipients. In many cases, the probe concluded, executives used 'hindsight' to select favorable grant dates in the past when the stock was trading at low points." The Journal adds, "The company said it doesn't intend to restate past financials to record the extra compensation expense associated with the backdated options. Instead, it said it will cut $66 million from the equity portion of its balance sheet, and expects to record another $8 million in expense in its fiscal third quarter."

The AP (10/11) reports, "The review committee found 31 off-cycle monthly grant dates not made on the 15th of the month as required by the company's policies, and 12 of them were 'at notable low prices.' Interviews and the documentation reviewed did not explain the selection of the dates, the company said. … 'The low prices were suggestive of the use of some hindsight in selecting the low price off-cycle grant dates,' according to the filing. However, the committee found no willful misconduct and no intent to mislead auditors. … At least 136 companies have disclosed internal, SEC or Justice Department investigations into the possible backdating of past stock options to artificially inflate their value."

Two Former Comverse Officials In Plea Talks With US. The Houston Chronicle/Dow Jones Newswires (10/11, Bray) reports, "Two former executives of Comverse Technology Inc. are engaged in plea discussions with the U.S. Justice Department to end the criminal fraud case against them, according to court documents filed late last week." Dow Jones continues, "In separate orders filed late Friday, U.S. Magistrate Judge Joan M. Azrack ordered that the time to indict former Comverse finance chief David Kreinberg and ex-senior general counsel William F. Sorin be extended by 30 days to Nov. 8." Dow Jones adds, "According to court documents, Sorin and Kreinberg are engaged in plea negotiations with the U.S. Attorney's office in Brooklyn, which 'they believe are likely to result in a disposition of this case without trial.' … Kreinberg and Sorin were charged, along with ex-Comverse Chief Executive Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud in August in an alleged scheme to improperly backdate options at the company. The men were charged at the time under a criminal complaint. … Alexander, who was arrested in the African nation Namibia last month, has since been indicted on charges of conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, mail fraud, wire fraud, money laundering and engaging in unlawful monetary transactions. Alexander was granted bail at a hearing last week in Namibia. … The SEC also has separately filed civil charges against the men."

DOJ_NMG_0078755

Brooklyn, Manhattan Federal Prosecutors Spar Over White-Collar Cases. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C1, Davies, Lattman) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Manhattan aren't used to being upstaged. But if Kobi Alexander, the fugitive executive arrested last month in Namibia, makes it stateside to answer stock-option-backdating charges, he will do so across the East River, in a different borough of New York City: Brooklyn." The Journal continues, "Ownership of the case -- involving Comverse Technology Inc., which Mr. Alexander co-founded -- is the latest in a string of white-collar cases overseen by the Justice Department's U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn. Known as the Eastern District of New York, its prosecutors lately have gained ground in a friendly, but sometimes-pointed, rivalry with their Southern District counterparts in the borough of Manhattan, who have stumbled recently on a few big cases." The Journal adds, "That rivalry between prosecutors in two of the country's 93 judicial districts is playing out amid a broader competition for business cases that has intensified nationwide since the dot-com collapse. Led by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, and Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, state and local prosecutors also have jockeyed for prominence, sometimes stepping on the toes of regulators, especially at the Securities and Exchange Commission, which has authority to bring only civil cases. … In the criminal realm, the Manhattan U.S. attorney's office is the 'old established group that considers itself the best,' says Alan Vinegrad, a former Brooklyn U.S. attorney. But now the scrappy underdog is 'on the map.' … Unwilling to concede much, Steve Peikin, former head of the Manhattan office's securities unit, quips that Brooklyn is a 'great second.'"

Skilling Wants Enron Conviction Overturned. Bloomberg News (10/11, News) reports, "Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, found guilty in May of directing a huge fraud, asked a judge to throw out his conviction, citing a successful appeal in another Enron case." Bloomberg continues, "In a filing yesterday in federal court in Houston, Mr. Skilling, 52, joined other convicted Enron executives in asking a trial judge to void his guilty verdict, based on an August ruling by a federal appeals court in New Orleans. Mr. Skilling's request came as part of a motion to remain free pending an appeal he said he planned to file after his sentencing, scheduled for Oct. 23." Bloomberg adds, "Mr. Skilling told Judge Simeon T. Lake III of the United States District Court that his conviction should be thrown out because the jury might have relied on a prosecution claim that he deprived the company of "honest services," a theory that caused the New Orleans court to overturn four other Enron-related convictions in August. … Mr. Skilling, convicted of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, faces a sentence of as much as 25 years in prison. Prosecutors gave jurors several situations under which they could find him guilty of defrauding Enron, which collapsed into bankruptcy in December 2001. Having deprived the company of his honest services was one. Deliberately deceiving investors was another. … Since the jury did not explain how it reached its guilty verdict, the fraud and conspiracy convictions were tainted by the possibility that 'honest services' played a part. Mr. Skilling argued that his entire conviction should be thrown out, using the logic the appeals court followed in August. … The government will respond to Mr. Skilling's motion 'in an appropriate court filing,' a Justice Department spokeswoman, Jaclyn Lesch, said."

Third Trial Begins For Cendant's Forbes. The third trial of former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes began yesterday with prosecutors accusing Forbes of masterminding an accounting fraud which inflated Cendant's earnings by $252 million. USA Today (10/11, Farrell) reports that "the government argued that Forbes, 63, founder of Comp-U-Card International, used CUC's merger-and-acquisition reserves as a slush fund through which his underlings padded the company's earnings." USA adds, "The government has already put Forbes on trial twice for his alleged actions. In a trial that began two years ago, a jury convicted Forbes' right-hand man, E. Kirk Shelton, of securities fraud, but it deadlocked on the question of Forbes' involvement. Shelton received a 10-year prison sentence. In a retrial of Forbes last year, a different jury also reached an impasse."

Buffett Warns Berkshire Managers Against Unethical Behavior. The Washington Post/AP (10/11, D2, Ross) reports in a letter to managers of his company, Berkshire Hathaway, Inc., Warren Buffett warned against unethical business practices, saying the excuse "everybody else is doing it" is no justification. Buffett "cautioned managers that many corporate scandals arise because questionable activity is accepted as normal behavior. … Buffett acknowledged that it is inevitable that someone among Berkshire Hathaway's almost 200,000 workers would give in to temptation. He called on his top executives to resist improper behavior and head it off in employees. 'Berkshire's reputation is in your hands,' Buffett wrote."

DOJ_NMG_0078756

Dunn Defends Her Actions As H-P Chairman. Former Hewlett-Packard chairman Patricia Dunn writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14), "When I agreed to accept the position of non-executive chairman of the Hewlett-Packard board during the tumultuous period surrounding Carly Fiorina's departure, I knew there would be challenging and difficult times ahead…. One of the first requests I received from my fellow directors was to find a way to stop leaks of confidential information emanating from our boardroom. … As I testified before Congress, the first thing I did after being directed by the majority of the board to find and stop the leaks was to approach one of my fellow directors… to ask him how I should proceed. I said I wanted to make sure that everything done was not only legal and proper, but in the H-P way." Dunn adds, "As a result of extraordinary negative publicity from these episodes, the board asked me to step down as chairman and director. Less than two weeks later I was charged by the California attorney general on four felony counts of fraud and conspiracy. Some have said they feel I have been made a scapegoat. That is not for me to say. What I will say is that throughout the process I asked the right questions of the right people at the right times. I have no reason to believe that the people who continually assured me that what was being done was being done both legally and properly did not believe this to be true. And, despite the outrage and incredulity with which my statements about accepting assurances that phone records could be obtained legally, my lawyers assure me that there are in fact ways this can be done."

Defendants In H-P Case May Turn On One Another. The New York Times (10/11, Richtel) reports that while the five defendants in the H-P case "must overcome a paper trail of evidence against them," they could "wind up with as much to fear from one another. At least one lawyer involved in the case and several outside legal experts said the five defendants might wind up turning on one another as part of a way to shift blame away from themselves." The Times adds, "It is not yet clear whether the defendants will be tried together or separately. It is possible that one or more defendants could choose to cooperate with the prosecution and testify against others. But lawyers for any of the defendants could also try to shade the evidence in a way that is more favorable to their client and less so to another defendant. If the cases are severed, evidence presented in one trial could be subpoenaed in another trial."

Three Private Investigators In H-P Scandal Arraigned In California. The AP (10/11, Robertson) reports, "Three private investigators who allegedly obtained confidential telephone records as part of Hewlett-Packard's boardroom spying probe pleaded not guilty Tuesday to identity theft and other felony charges." The AP continues, "Ronald DeLia of Massachusetts-based Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., Matthew DePante of Florida-based Action Research Group Inc. and Bryan Wagner of Colorado were arraigned in Santa Clara County Superior Court. Each was later booked and released on personal recognizance." The AP adds, "DeLia, DePante and Wagner are among five people criminally charged last week for their roles in the spying scandal at the computer and printer giant. Former HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn surrendered and appeared in court late last week, and the company's ousted ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker also turned himself in and was released. … The three investigators are accused of impersonating HP board members, employees and journalists to trick telephone companies into divulging their private phone logs. … All five are charged with using false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility; unauthorized access to computer data; identity theft; and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. Each charge carries a fine of up to $10,000 and three years in prison. … They are all scheduled to return to court Nov. 17."

Dowd Stresses Need For "Emphatic And Sensitive" Corporate Leadership. Maureen Dowd The New York Times (10/11, Dowd) reports, "Carly Fiorina prided herself on being adept at succeeding in a man's world without whining about sexism. … The male-dominated [H-P] board's handling of her exit was 'heartless in some ways and disrespectful in other ways," she said. "Maybe they took great pleasure in seeing me beat up publicly for weeks and weeks.'" Dowd adds, "With several of the few high-profile women at the top tanking, it's interesting to note that Columbia Business School has introduced a new program that teaches the importance of a more empathetic and sensitive leadership style in globalized business, as opposed to the command-and-control style that has dominated the White House and Pentagon for, lo, these many messed up years. … Neenu Sharma, an M.B.A. student in the new Columbia program, says the moral of the story is that leadership works best with both sexes involved."

Judge Orders Conrad Black Not To Sell Wife's Diamond Ring. The Toronto Star (10/11, Westhead) reports, "Conrad Black has been slapped with a restraining order that will bar him from selling a rare $2.9 million diamond ring he gave his wife Barbara Amiel-Black as a gift and other antique jewellery." The Star continues, "Black, accused of engineering a racketeering, fraud and tax evasion scheme when he was CEO of Chicago publisher Hollinger International Inc., successfully fought off an attempt by the U.S. Justice Department to force him to relinquish the 26-carat diamond ring he purchased in 2000 at British jeweller Graff Diamonds Ltd. Black has pleaded not guilty to the charges. He is on bail and living in Toronto." The Star adds, "He has said the ring and other antiques were gifts to Amiel-Black, who has not been charged with any wrongdoing. Nevertheless, in an Oct. 6 restraining order, Judge Amy St. Eve in Chicago barred Black from 'selling, transferring, assigning, pledging, distributing, encumbering, wasting, secreting, depreciating, damaging, or in any way diminishing the value' of the diamond ring and other antiques."

DOJ_NMG_0078757

CRIMINAL LAW:

President Holds School Safety Conference. The AP (10/11, Feller) reports, "President Bush urged the nation Tuesday to help prevent deadly school shootings, saying adults should intervene when they notice children are in trouble." At a conference he hosted on school violence, Bush "seemed most struck by one of the points raised by experts: When students plot violence, they often brag about it in advance to other students. Safety specialists say schools must encourage students to speak up when they notice any ominous behavioral changes." Bush called for "a cultural change inside schools, for teachers to become more aware and more active." But "there were no new policies nor new money announced." And "Democrats mocked the event as a photo opportunity with little substance." Still, "the White House, sensitive to the concerns of many parents, wanted to show it was doing something." US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "led three panel discussions." Experts said that "schools get safer when they take bullying seriously, practice their crisis plans, and talk to parents about what's happening." The conference "gave Bush a chance to emphasize education, the issue at the center of his domestic agenda."

All three networks covered the conference. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 7, Costello, 9.87M) reported, "Since the 1999 Columbine massacre, 225 people have died in school-related violence: 13 this school year alone, including five at an Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania and one at Platte Canyon High School in Colorado." So "today, law enforcement, educators, students and parents gathered to share their experiences and potential solutions, like getting dads more involved." Still, "critics point out the conference comes as the White House moves to cut more than $300 million in drug and violence prevention grant money to school districts. The Administration says those programs have proved to be ineffective and it's up to local communities to deal with violence issues."

ABC World News (10/10, story 2, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) said "the conference on school safety the President called was almost a carbon copy of a similar summit after Columbine. Similar solutions were proposed then. But what has really been done since Columbine?" ABC (Muir) added, "Seven years after Columbine, and school safety experts say it's still a struggle to get the number of reduced open doors," and "federal funding for safety in schools has decreased" from $180 million to "this fiscal year, it's not even in the budget."

CBS Evening News (10/10, story 5, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported "one school in the Midwest may be a model for the nation had when it comes protecting our children." CBS (Bowers) added, "These days, at Green Bay's East High School, students can't get past the front door without IDs. That's in addition to surveillance cameras and security officers. The school remains in full lockdown mode, less than one month after a student walked into the associate principal's office and told him some classmates were planning a Columbine-style massacre." And "experts say communication is key to school safety" because "in more than 80% of the cases, at least one kid who wasn't involved, knew about it ahead of time, and in more than half the cases, at least two kids knew."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Nguyen) reported, "President Bush says the nation must find a way to keep its children safe. He spoke at a White House-sponsored conference today on school violence. First Lady Laura Bush said children need to know adults are there to protect them. A survivor of the 1999 Columbine shooting was also at today's conference. Mr. Bush called the meeting after three recent deadly shootings in Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Colorado."

Newspaper coverage suggested the conference was part of a PR effort to show the President's involvement and concern in the wake of the recent shooting. A number of reports also noted the absence of new policy initiatives. The Washington Post (10/11, A3, Shaver, 748K) reports the Conference on School Safety was "hastily arranged last week." Bush "announced no new funding or policy initiatives to handle the problem." He "heard calls for more coordinated planning between schools and police, more character education, more peer mentoring programs, more parental involvement and more counseling." USA Today (10/11, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the president was "reacting to a spate of school shootings." He "attended the last hour of the event." The conference "pointed to the biggest challenge facing those who would stop school violence: There are different theories about what causes it and how to prevent it. Panelists and attendees floated at least a dozen theories."

The New York Times (10/11, Schemo, 1.21M) reports, "The federal government should not play the primary role in responding to school violence, President Bush said Tuesday, but should instead give out information about strategies to help parents and schools grappling with the threat of deadly outbursts in the nation's schools."

DOJ_NMG_0078758

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (10/11, Gilbert, 259K) reports the conference "was clearly meant to signal that the administration was actively engaged in the issue, even though the president and his education secretary pointed out that matters such as school security and school policy are largely a state and local domain."

The Baltimore Sun (10/11, Davis) reports, "President Bush urged Americans Tuesday to turn their anguish over school shootings in Pennsylvania and around the nation into "concrete action" to prevent further tragedies. … But he told a gathering of educators, activists and law enforcement officials that more federal funding and government regulation won't solve the problem. … 'In many ways, I'm sorry we're having this meeting,' Bush said as he wrapped up a conference hastily organized by the White House to respond to the recent spate of deadly school violence. 'In other ways, I know how important it is.'" The Sun continues, "Bush said the meeting, moderated by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, was part of 'a nationwide effort to help people who are responsible to protect our children.' … More than 300 local leaders and specialists from around the country spent about six hours trading ideas, from drafting strong school emergency plans to urging fathers to get more involved in school, to providing character education for kids." The Sun adds, "Bush took a seat at a three-sided table on the stage of a packed suburban Maryland auditorium in the headquarters of the National 4-H Council, a youth development organization. The administration had set up a mock classroom complete with fake wood paneling and a chalkboard backdrop emblazoned with the event's title, and Bush questioned participants about how best to share their experiences with others around the nation."

The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Mohammed) reports, "Conspicuously absent in the all-day session was any mention of the role of firearms in the shootings, a politically volatile issue sure to inflame partisan passions in a midterm election year." The Times adds, "Some participants argued that schools needed to do a better job of determining which students might bring weapons on campus. Psychologists pointed out that students who have suicidal tendencies often have thoughts of homicide too. And many panelists focused on the importance of building character in students, which they said had been degraded by media influences such as music and video games. … Harsher measures such as installing metal detectors in schools were viewed with skepticism. Gonzales said metal detectors may not be appropriate, noting that not all school shootings occur inside the buildings."

Gannett (10/11, King) reports Secretary Spellings said of the recent school tragedy, "This could really happen anywhere." Attorney General Gonzales "dismissed one questioner's call for increased gun control" and "panelists also didn't give metal detectors much of a thumbs-up."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch/Media General (10/11, Klein) reports, "Metal detectors won't stop school shootings, speakers at a conference on school safety told President Bush yesterday. Only listening to students, hearing about their problems and getting them help will stop the violence before it begins." Bush "heard Craig Scott describe how in April 1999 he hid under a table in the Columbine High School library as his two friends next to him were shot and killed." Bush "called on both departments to put together the best practices learned from this conference and distribute them to law-enforcement and education officials."

McClatchy (10/11, Hutcheson) reports, "Victims of school violence shared their horrific experiences" and the conference "ended with a call for more focus on character and values in the nation's classrooms." Experts "cited a host of factors that have contributed to the violence, including stress and feelings of alienation among students, negative media influences and inattentive parents." But "some advocates of character education offered implicit criticism of Bush's No Child Left Behind Act, which stresses academic achievement and requires frequent testing." Bush responded, "I think you can make sure a child learns, and I think you can instill character at the same time." He also "told the audience members that they shouldn't look to the federal government to bankroll character education or other school programs."

The Denver Post (10/11, Farrell, 256K) reports, "Bush said he wanted Tuesday's White House conference on school safety to produce a concrete plan of action. But tangible solutions like the use of metal detectors or a ban on assault weapons were rejected and eclipsed by testaments to the power of love." And "several speakers at Tuesday's conference urged Bush to purge America's coarse and violent culture, and to order that schools teach students about character, virtue and God. But the president noted the limitations of government in the battle against school violence." Bush said that "the best solution…is for parents, educators and students to find the love and compassion to reach out to troubled youths before they turn to violence." One panel said that "the purchase and operation of metal detectors and security cameras" were "overly expensive and easily evaded."

The Houston Chronicle (10/11, Mason) reports, "Keys to stopping what appears to be an epidemic of school violence include learning how to spot troubled students, boosting their self-esteem and preparing for emergencies, according to panelists at a special White House conference Tuesday." The Chronicle continues, "Organized in response to a recent spate of deadly shootings at schools, the conference did not address gun control or firearms-related issues. Rather, it focused on values and community action. … 'The violence we've seen is upsetting to a lot of people and I know it's upsetting to the professionals who are with us,' President Bush told participants. 'But rather than be upset, it's best for all of us who are responsible for helping the folks not only to cope, but to prevent action from taking place.'" The Chronicle adds, "In an effort to make schools safer, many Houston schools employ cameras, uniformed officers and metal detectors — an approach that drew skepticism from Bush administration officials. … 'One panel member said that it sends the wrong message about what we think of our kids when we have them come to an environment where they're supposed to learn and have to pass through metal detectors,' said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales."

DOJ_NMG_0078759

Long Island Newsday (10/22, Dutton) reports, "Nearly 10 years ago, Daniel Gross' brother Matthew was shot in the head by a gunman while standing on an observation deck of the Empire State Building. After watching his brother slowly recover from a coma, Daniel started a gun violence prevention organization, PAX. … The group Gross co-founded runs a nationwide anonymous hotline that, he says, is helping kids fight school violence, 866-SPEAK-UP. … 'You could safely say hundreds of incidents have been averted,' Gross said. He cites 15,000 calls to the hotline in the past four years. 'New York has lagged behind a lot of other communities' in terms of school violence prevention, he said." Newsday adds, "Gross joined other advocates, law enforcement officers and educators from around the country yesterday in Chevy Chase, Md., for a conference on school safety. … The rate of violent crime in schools dropped over 10 years, according to the most recent figures from the Bureau of Justice Statistics and National Center for Education Statistics. In 1992, 48 of every 1,000 students would fall prey to violence at school, but in 2003 that number fell to 28 of every 1,000. … 'We are, however, seeing some indications in the last two years that those trends are changing,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/11, Sherman, 241K) says the conference "emphasized the faith-based approaches at the center of some of his domestic policies."

Dana Milbank writes in an analysis for the Washington Post (10/11, A2, 748K), "Bush has always been a disciplined man, but yesterday he set a new standard for self-control: He moderated an hour-long discussion about the rash of school shootings in the past week without once mentioning the word 'guns.'" First lady Laura Bush "was nearly as good, giving a seven-minute speech…without mentioning guns." Gonzales and Spellings "deftly led hours of panels at the National 4-H building in Chevy Chase with only a few glancing references to weapons." The White House "neglected to invite any gun-control advocates. In fact, how the killers had carried out their deeds might have remained a mystery if 19-year-old twin brothers Theo and Niko Milonopoulos hadn't infiltrated the gathering" and "pointed out to Gonzales that 'the common denominator in the rash of school shootings' has been access to high-powered guns." The lack of discussion about guns was "unusual" and "even the invited guests found it a bit odd." Also, "with gun control off the table, the questions and comments became a bit repetitious, too, as a long line of participants echoed the belief that school violence would be reduced by values education and religious belief." Bush "had been having trouble finding his voice on school shootings" and "labeled the violence 'inexplissible,' apparently merging 'inexplicable' and 'inexpressible.'"

FNC's Studio B with Shepard Smith (9/10, 3:53 p.m.) reported, "From the daily school shootings in Colorado, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania to violent bullies on campuses across the nation, the potential for school violence is a real concern for millions of parents and students across the nation. Today, President Bush responding by convening a conference on school safety, a way for educators and law enforcement to share ideas to make schools a safer place, that according to the White House. Joining us now from Washington is one of the speakers at today summit, Alberto Gonzales, the attorney general of the United States. What did we learn today, sir?" Alberto Gonzales said, "Well, we learned we've got by and large a good system of providing quality education to our students in a safe environment. We are seeing some troubling trends in recent years and we need to watch it very carefully. But clearly your child is safer in school than they are at the mall, for example. I think we also learned that law enforcement agencies are doing a good job in working with educators to make our schools as safe as possible. But we looked at a lot of issues today. I think we made good progress talking about what's already being done at the federal, state and local level, and making sure we find some kind of mechanism to educate and inform people about all the resources that are available to make sure our kids are safe at school." FNC's Shepard: "A federal program was put into place after the Columbine massacre called COPS, that's an acronym. And today, the Democrat of New York Anthony Weiner said it's a shameful hypocrisy that the program has been cut from some 150 million in the beginning to 5 million this year. Why the cuts and how do you respond to that?' Alberto Gonzales: "Well, we have spent billions of dollars since President Bush became President with respect to state and local assistance and we have spend millions of dollars to provide specifically safety for our schools. I think what we need to look at is everything that we're doing to ensure our kids are safe. Look at the task forces that we have in place, working with state and local officials. Look at the prosecutions, the number of prosecutions for gun crimes since 2001. Gun prosecutions are up 62%. So, we're sending a very clear message that if you engage in gun crime you're going to pay severe time in our federal prisons. I think we're doing a lot. We talked a lot about the successes we've enjoyed working with state and local officials, and we also talked about what we can do going forward."

DOJ_NMG_0078760

Appearing on CNN's American Morning (10/10), Attorney General Gonzales said, "we obviously need to make sure that we have our laws -- we have good laws to deal with this kind of violence. We have really spent a lot of time prosecuting violent crime during the Bush administration. I think prosecutions are up on violent crimes about 10% since 2001. It really has been a focus to go against gun crimes. Most do involve guns. What we're doing is to send a very clear message that if you're going to engage a crime using a gun, there are going to be severe consequences for doing so." Gonzales added, "During the Bush administration, our primary focus is on existing laws. We have seen violent gun crimes go down during the time of this president. The focus should be on criminals who break the law, not focusing on law-abiding citizens who follow the law. Obviously, we want to ensure we have an environment where our kids can learn. It's difficult for the kids to learn if they don't feel safe. One of the things that we can do is to educate people, to provide training to state and local officials at the federal level and to prosecute people who engage in violent gun crimes."

Local Television. Several local television networks reported on the first day of the national conference on school violence, being held in Chevy Chase, Maryland. The focus of the reporting centered around attorney general Alberto Gonzales' call for tougher enforcement of existing gun laws rather than the promotion of new ones. Some examples: WKRN-TV Nashville, (10/10, 6:16 p.m.) reported, "President Bush calls a summit on school safety. Attorney general Alberto Gonzales and education secretary Margaret Spellings each led discussion panels. People who have experienced the terror of school violence talked about the importance of communication as a means to safety."

WVLT-TV Knoxville, (10/10, 4:02 p.m.) reported, "First Lady Laura Bush and attorney general Alberto Gonzales gathered to speak about an issue that has gripped our nation, especially in the past two weeks: school violence."

KMSP-TV Minneapolis, (10/10, 5:47 p.m.) reported, "Some experts advocate better gun control laws. But attorney general Alberto Gonzales urged using current laws to more aggressively prosecute gun crimes. 'The focus should be on criminals who break the law, not focusing on law-abiding citizens who follow the law.' Track participants said schools must pay more attention to student bullying and spend more time rehearsing crisis plans, but agreed there is no single, simple answer to the problem."

KRON-TV San Francisco, (10/10, 6:01 p.m.) reported, "In the seven years since the Columbine school mass killing, many schools have installed video monitors, limited access and put panic buttons in classrooms. Today attorney general Alberto Gonzales rejected another idea allowing teachers to carry guns."

KDFW-TV Dallas, (10/10, 12:10 p.m.) reported, "Some people, including the U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzalez, believe part of the solution is tougher gun laws. 'What we're doing is sending a very clear message that if you're going to engage in a crime using a gun, there are going to be severe consequences. Schools need to create a culture where their encouraged to tell officials what they know and have a good crisis response plan.'"

WTMJ-TV Milwaukee, (10/10, 5:01 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales opposes the idea of allowing teachers to carry guns. 'Our teachers are there to train and teach our children. They're not there to protect the children.'"

California School Locked Down After Apparent Gun Prank. The Contra Costa Times (10/11, Graham) reports, "A rumor that a student had carried a firearm onto the Castro Valley High School campus today forced administrators to lock down the school for three hours while nearly two dozen deputies and investigators searched the campus. … No weapon was found, and police later attributed the scare to an apparent prank." The Times continues, "The lockdown was issued around 11:40 a.m. after school officials received word of the report. Teachers were ordered to lock all doors, close all windows and pull down all the window blinds, said Alameda County Sheriff's Sgt. Scott Dudek. … School officials informed the sheriff's office of the threat as soon as the rumor reached administrators. The sheriff's office responded by dispatching 25 deputies and three K-9 units to the 2,800-pupil campus at 19400 Santa Maria Ave., Dudek said." The Times adds, "Deputies cordoned off the campus, setting up a perimeter where worried parents gathered and waited in vain for about three hours, not sure what exactly had transpired at the 40-acre campus. … The lockdown occurred at a time when public awareness has been heightened by a recent series of deadly school shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania. … In response to the violence, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings convened a school safety conference today in Chevy Chase, Md."

Utah School Practices Lockdown In Preparation For The Worst. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/11, Lyon) reports, "At Bountiful (UT) High on Tuesday morning, the school was teaching a post-Columbine lesson in a subject most of us never expected to study: school violence. By practicing a lockdown situation as it has for several years, members of the staff learned what they need to do to keep students safe. The students taste what a scary situation at school could be like and how to help. … What was new at Bountiful High this year was the number of police agencies involved and the hostage twist. Schools have been reeling from the spate of shootings over the past few weeks that seemed to leave no community, even the peaceful Amish, untouched. On Tuesday, safety and education experts from across the country met in Maryland at a conference called by the White House." The Tribune adds, "Bountiful High is far from a fearful place. Students walk in the high school without having their bags searched or being screened by metal detectors. Several doors are open during the school day. Unlike some schools, it does have an on-campus school resource officer who can react immediately. … While the school lockdown may have been more for the school's benefit, officers Tuesday filmed their exercise and evaluators stood nearby taking notes. The police shouted commands and codes over their radios communicating with an improvised command post outside. Not communicating, as one officer put it, can be deadly."

DOJ_NMG_0078761

911 Transcripts Released From Amish School Shooting. CBS Evening News (10/10, story 4, 0:45, Couric) reported that "one week after Charles Roberts shot those ten Amish school children, killing five of them, officials released a transcript of the 911 call he made as police accomplice surrounded the schoolhouse. Roberts says 'I just took ten girls hostage, and I want everybody off the property, or else' When the dispatcher asked Robert's to hold. He said 'No … right now or they're dead in two seconds.' Asked again to hold. 'Roberts says, 'two seconds that's it!!' His last words before he opened fire."

ABC World News (10/10, lead story, 2:50, Donovan) reported that Roberts "made up his mind to die that day. … But his wife was first to suspect it. Marie Roberts. She was at home. This is the house. She called 911 herself. 'I am really scared,' she told the dispatcher. 'and I wonder if -- how I find out what's going on.' It was almost 11:00 when she made that call. She didn't know much. But she knew something was wrong, because she'd just heard from her husband, who had left suicide notes."

The New York Times (10/11, Hamill) reports, "An hour after walking into a small Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania last week with a small arsenal of guns and hardware, Charles C. Roberts IV told a dispatcher in a calm, dispassionate voice just what his emergency was. 'I just took, uh, 10 girls hostage and I want everybody off the property or, or else,' Mr. Roberts told a 911 dispatcher for Lancaster County." As the dispatcher tries to engage him, "Mr. Roberts threatens to kill the girls, but his voice 'is not angry, there is no yelling and screaming,' the county district attorney, Don Totaro, said in an interview." The Times adds, "The dispatcher's short conversation with Mr. Roberts, as well as calls from his wife, Marie, and the farmer who made the first 911 call, after a young teacher fled the schoolhouse to seek help, show how frantic Mr. Roberts's brief siege was."

The Washington Post/AP (10/11, A2, Scolforo) reports, "Before authorities could react, he started shooting inside the West Nickel Mines Amish School, killing five girls and wounding five others before killing himself. Police burst in after hearing the gunfire."

USA Today (10/11, Welch) reports that Totaro said, "They tried to keep him on the line as long as possible," adding, "They tried to diffuse the situation, but there was just no possible way for them to do so. It was clear he was intent on carrying out his mission."

Laura Bush Praises Amish Girls. The Lancaster Newspapers (PA) (10/10, Itkowitz) reports, "Two Amish girls who put their classmates' lives before their own represent the country's best, First Lady Laura Bush said during a school safety summit Tuesday. The first lady was referring to Marian Fisher, 13, and her 11-year-old sister, Barbie Fisher, both of whom beseeched Charles Carl Roberts IV to shoot them first, hoping he'd spare the lives of the younger Amish girls locked inside their one-room schoolhouse on Oct. 2."

FBI Interviews Page Who Received Messages From Foley. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 5, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "This is the public's first look at the former House page at the center of the Foley scandal. 21-year-old Jordan Edmond today in Oklahoma City where he met for two and a half hours with the FBI." Stephen Jones, attorney for Jordan Edmund: "I'm not able to discuss the interview except to say that it occurred and that our client answered their questions and cooperated to the fullest." Reid: "While serving as a page five years ago, Edmund, then 16, got to know Congressman Foley. After leaving the program, he reportedly received sexually explicit instant messages from Foley. 11 days ago, shortly before those messages were made public, Foley resigned." Edmond is "also expected to testify before the House Ethics Committee which already has 400 calls to align taking reports of potentially inappropriate contact with pages." ABC World News (10/10, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (10/10, story 8, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) also mentioned Edmond's interview.

CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported attorney Stephen Jones "said that he was contacted today by the House Ethics Committee, which…is conducting its own investigation. He's not clear, though, whether or not his client will be asked to appear before them."

Former House Clerk Emerges As Key Figure In Foley Investigation. The Chicago Tribune (10/11, Dorning, Zajac, 623K) reports former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, "who formerly controlled the administrative apparatus of the House," emerged "as a key figure in the scandal over former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate emails to underage pages." Rep. Jim Kolbe, who "was informed as early as 2000 of suggestive emails from Foley to a former page described a more significant role for then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl." Kolbe "said he passed the complaint on to Trandahl, who also was involved in handling a complaint in 2005 about inappropriate emails to another former page." The account "raises new questions about the quiet disposition of the later complaint, which officials handled by privately warning Foley to cease contact with pages." But House Speaker Dennis Hastert "defended his own staff's handling of the 2005 complaint about inappropriate emails from Foley, saying he could not find any fault in their actions based on what they knew at the time." However, Hastert said "he would dismiss any member of his staff involved in a cover-up, while Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) asked for an independent investigation of Republican leaders' handling of the complaints."

DOJ_NMG_0078762

Fordham To Appear Before House Ethics Panel Thursday. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported, "CNN has also learned…that Kirk Fordham, who is Foley's former chief of staff, he is scheduled to appear before the House Ethics Committee on Thursday. Now, remember, that Fordham claims that he told a senior member of House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office about these concerns about e-mails, or at least contact that was inappropriate between Foley and interns, going back three -- or, I should say, pages going back three years." CBS Evening News (10/10, story 8, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, testifies tomorrow before the House Ethics Committee."

McCain Calls For Independent Investigation Of House Page Scandal. ABC World News (10/10, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Republican Senator John McCain called for an independent investigation of the House page scandal."

Doubts Raised About Foley's Alleged Drinking Problem. The Hill (10/11, Young) reports photographs and "first-hand accounts of Foley's public drinking told by acquaintances in Washington and Florida could reinforce doubts about the veracity of the claim that a drinking problem fueled his behavior, which included carrying on sexually explicit instant-message chats with former pages." Though "no law-enforcement authority has filed charges against Foley, his attorney could cite alcohol addiction as part of a legal defense by arguing that Foley was not in complete control of his actions when he contacted former pages over the Internet."

Hastert Pledges To Fire Any Aides Involved In Foley "Cover Up." The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Simon, Levey, 918K) reports Speaker Dennis Hastert said Tuesday "that anyone who covered up information about contacts between then Rep. Mark Foley and male pages 'really ought to go.'" During a "question and answer session with reporters outside a meeting of the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce in Aurora, Ill., Hastert said that ongoing investigations in the sex scandal should determine if his staff or anyone in Congress covered up information about the former Florida representative, and the former pages, 'shouldn't continue to have their jobs.'" Hastert "noted that none of the pages were approached by Foley while they were in Washington — only after they had graduated from the program. Moreover, Hastert said he is still searching for a candidate to run the program. 'I asked (former FBI Director) Louie Freeh to do it and (House Democratic Leader) Nancy Pelosi rejected him for some reason.'"

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 5, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Hastert has been criticized for not doing more and today three new polls show large percentages of Americans think he should resign as Speaker. Hastert says he knew nothing about the Foley issue until the day Foley resigned but some of the staffers did know about Foley's less explicit emails months ago. Today Hastert was asked if any of those staff members should resign for not telling him." Rep, Dennis Hastert: "If anybody's found to have hidden information or covered up information, they really should be gone." ABC World News (10/10, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (10/10, story 8, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) also briefly reported the story.

CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported that House Speaker Dennis Hastert says "if anyone on his staff hushed up concerns about Mark Foley and the congressional pages, those people, in his words, will be fired." Hastert "acknowledged that complaints about Foley's conduct could have been handled better."

MSNBC's Hardball (10/10, Shuster) reported, "In Illinois today before a backdrop of a graveyard, House Speaker Dennis Hastert all but sacrificed his own staff." Hastert: "If there is a problem, if there was a cover-up, then we should find that out through the investigation process. They will be under oath. And we'll find out. If they did cover something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs."

USA Today (10/11, Kiely, Johnson, 2.27M) reports the story under the headline, "Hastert Says Fire Anyone Who 'covered' For Foley." The New York Times (10/11, Zeleny, Johnston, 1.21M) reports Hastert's remarks "were the first time he had used the term 'cover-up' in talking about the case. Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned late last month after explicit messages he had sent to a former page became public."

The Washington Post (10/11, A4, Babington, 748K) reports Hastert's remarks "came amid a quickening pace of investigations into Foley's relationships with teenage congressional pages and the House's handling of warnings about the Florida Republican's behavior." Hastert "again said he knew nothing of alarms raised in some circles about Foley's behavior toward pages until the day he resigned. Two high-ranking GOP House members have said they mentioned to Hastert concerns about 2005 e-mails that Foley sent to a former page from Louisiana."

DOJ_NMG_0078763

The Washington Times (10/11, Hurt, 88K) reports the story under the headline, "Hastert Vows To Fire Staff In Foley Cover-up."

Prominent Democrats Refrain From Seeking Hastert Resignation. The Hill (10/11, Schor, Sherman, O'Connor) reports while House Republicans "rush to contain the political damage from the Mark Foley scandal, Democrats have relied on their challengers to push for Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) resignation while party leaders and most vulnerable incumbents refrain from calling for Hastert's head." More than "20 Democratic opponents of vulnerable GOP incumbents have urged Hastert to abandon the Speakership," but "no elected Democratic leader and no Democratic incumbents in competitive races have echoed those challengers, according to a search of public statements conducted by The Hill." The "trend places" Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Democratic caucus chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), "all of whom have declined to urge Hastert to step aside, in a less combative camp than the conservative Washington Times editorial page, several conservative activists and at least one Republican candidate."

Hastert Meets Critic Of Handling Of Foley Scandal. The AP (10/11, Hernandez) reports House Speaker Dennis Hastert met "with an evangelist who hoped to persuade the Illinois Republican to step down because of the congressional page sex scandal. Hastert had no comment after the meeting at his home with Christian evangelist K.A. Paul, founder of the Global Peace Initiative." Paul said he "met alone with Hastert for about 30 minutes and prayed with him." Said Paul, "I am humbled with his humility and simplicity." Paul said "the scandal is distracting the country from other issues."

Hastert's Memoir Highlighted Claims About "Incredible" Memory. The Hill (10/11, Heil) reports Speaker Hastert's "memory lapses may cost him some points this fall." House Majority Leader John Boehner and NRCC chair Thomas Reynolds "have said they talked to the Speaker about suspicious e-mails that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to House pages. Hastert had not denied that those conversations took place, but maintains he does not recall them." Democrat John Laesch, who is challenging Speaker Hastert, "highlights a noteworthy paragraph in Hastert's 2004 autobiography" on his Website. In the memoir, Hastert says, "Some say I have an incredible memory or recall for exactly what happened when and who said what to whom. I do listen pretty diligently, more than a lot of people listen, and I do pick up facts that way." The Hill adds Laesch "may not win, but he certainly knows how to compile opposition research."

Kolbe Clarifies His Knowledge Of Foley E-Mails. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Koppel) reported that Rep. Jim Kolbe "sought to clarify his knowledge of e-mails that were received dating back to 2000, or on or about 2000, between yet another former page and Congressman Foley. According to Congressman Kolbe, he was notified -- or his office was notified -- on or about 2000 by this former page, who said that he had received e-mails from Congressman Foley that made him uncomfortable. He said, 'I was not shown the content of the messages and was not told they were sexually explicit.' And, so, he recommended that this be passed on to Congressman Foley's office and to the House clerk."

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 5, Reid, 9.87M) reported Kolbe "confirmed that he was told by another former page about six years ago of emails from Foley that made him uncomfortable. Kolbe says he sent the complaint to Foley's office. In statement, he says, 'I believe then and now that this is the appropriate way to handle this incident.' But Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert who was besieged by the media today, said Kolbe should have done more, including confronting Foley.

The AP (10/11, Taylor) reports Kolbe "said a former page he had sponsored contacted his office to complain of e-mails from Foley and that he 'passed along' the complaint to Foley, R-Fla., and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl. Kolbe said he did not take the matter to other lawmakers."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A6, Rogers, 2.03M) reports Kolbe "informed Kirk Fordham," then chief of staff to Foley, and "Jeff Trandahl, then the House Clerk, of the complaint." The complaint "appears to have been made between 2000 and 2002, or more than two years before a separate incident last fall, when a Louisiana family complained to their congressman of Foley emails to their teenage son, also a former page." In both cases, Foley was "warned directly or through his staff to cease contact with the former pages, and he apparently did. But following Mr. Foley's resignation on Sept. 29 -- and disclosure of his sexually explicit messages to former pages -- House Republicans are under fire for not having done more to investigate these early warnings of his behavior."

The AP (10/11, Talhelm) reports the issue has "thrust Kolbe, 64, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, into the spotlight just as he is preparing to leave Washington after 22 years in the House." It is "unclear whether Kolbe's role in the Foley saga will affect his post-Congress employment options. This week, he was named one of five finalists to head the Global Fund to Prevent AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, the central financing engine of international efforts to fight those diseases."

Records Suggest Abramoff Had Lobbying Contacts With Pombo. In an exclusive story, the AP (10/11, Werner) reports, "California Rep. Richard Pombo has insisted he was never lobbied by Jack Abramoff. Records show the disgraced lobbyist billed a client for at least two contacts with Pombo a decade ago." The AP continues, "The lobbying records released by the Northern Mariana Islands show that Abramoff billed once for calls to Pombo, chairman of the House Resources Committee, and a second time for a discussion with him, while lobbying in 1996." The AP adds, "On more than two dozen other occasions from 1996 through 2001, Abramoff associates called or met with members of Pombo's staff, including his chief of staff, the records indicate. As the contacts picked up, Pombo voted Abramoff's way on a bill important to Abramoff's clients. … Pombo spokesman Brian Kennedy disputed the reported contacts, saying direct lobbying by Abramoff 'never happened' and the staff-level contacts were 'greatly inflated.' Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in a congressional corruption investigation, is 'an admitted felon' who can't be trusted, Kennedy said. … 'I think any of these billing records should be taken with a grain of salt if not dismissed entirely,' Kennedy said. He noted that e-mails have surfaced showing Abramoff instructed associates to inflate their billing hours. … Still, the records put in question Pombo's campaign-trail assertions that he barely knew Abramoff and was never lobbied by him."

DOJ_NMG_0078764

Judge Orders DOJ To Respond To Siegelman Evidence Preservation Order. WSFA-TV, NBC 12, Montgomery, AL (10/11, Hammons) reports, "U.S. District Judge Mark Fuller has given the government until Friday, October 13, 2006 to show cause in writing why the emergency motion submitted by attorneys for Governor Don Siegelman, requesting preservation of evidence related to alleged jury misconduct, should not be granted. … The action of the judge is standard procedure." WSFA-TV continues, "Assistant United States Attorney Steve Feaga told WSFA.com, 'We will of course comply with the Court's order. We do not believe the motion is well founded and will so state in our response and provide our reasoning at that time.'" WSFA-TV adds, "Siegelman attorney David McDonald, responding to Mr. Feaga's comment told WSFA.com, 'I can't wait for the Justice Department to file a brief that opposes the preservation of evidence. I'm going to blow it up, frame it, and hang it on my wall.' … McDonald says he understands the government and the judge need time to respond to the motion concerning alleged juror misconduct and the possible introduction of extrinsic evidence into the jury room. However, McDonald says all he's asking is that all evidence be preserved while the judge takes the motions into consideration. 'How in the world is the government going to oppose that?" questions McDonald."

DOJ Seeks Death Penalty In Puerto Rico Murder Case. The AP (10/11, Rivera) reports, "Federal prosecutors on Tuesday urged a jury to choose capital punishment for a Puerto Rican man convicted of killing a hospital guard in what could be the first death sentence handed down in the U.S. territory in nearly 80 years." The AP continues, "Carlos Ayala Lopez was found guilty two months ago in the 2002 slaying of Jose Rodriguez Reyes, a guard at the Veteran's Medical Center in Rio Piedras. The jury reconvened Tuesday to decide if Ayala should be executed or sentenced to life in prison. … 'Justice will be to give him the punishment that he deserves ... and to sentence Carlos Ayala Lopez to death,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Jacabed Rodriguez told the jury of six men and six women." The AP adds, "One of the jurors cried as Rodriguez displayed photos of the crime scene at the hospital just outside San Juan. Prosecutors said Ayala shot the guard while trying to steal the man's gun for a planned drug trafficking operation. … Puerto Rico abolished capital punishment in 1929, but federal prosecutors can still seek the death penalty in some cases because the territory is subject to U.S. federal law. The island's last execution was in 1927, when a man was hanged for murder. The island's legislature approved a resolution reaffirming the anti-death penalty stance in May. … The only other case in which a federal jury in Puerto Rico had to decide whether to impose a death sentence was in 2005. The jury opted to give two men charged with murder a life sentence."

High Court Considers Viability Of Flawed Indictments. The AP (10/11, Sherman) reports, "Judges and prosecutors make mistakes, a Justice Department lawyer told the Supreme Court Tuesday, but sometimes those errors are so minor that they don't warrant reversing a conviction in a criminal case." The AP continues, "A jury convicted Juan Resendiz-Ponce of attempting to enter the United States illegally from Mexico. But the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals overturned Resendiz-Ponce's conviction because his indictment by a grand jury did not set out any specific acts showing how he tried to enter the United States. … The omission was so serious that it required automatic reversal of the conviction, the appellate court said." The AP adds, "Deputy Solicitor General Michael Dreeben told justices Tuesday, however, that Resendiz-Ponce received a fair trial at which the government proved that he had displayed two false pieces of identification in an effort to enter the country. Resendiz-Ponce presented his cousin's green card and driver license when he approached the border crossing at San Luis, Ariz., on June 1, 2003. … Dreeben conceded that prosecutors should have included more information in the indictment and, when they didn't, the trial judge should have dismissed the charge before the trial began. .. .Even so, he said, the conviction should stand. … 'Such an error violates the Fifth Amendment, but it is harmless,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0078765

Attorney For Suspect In Killing Of Washington Federal Prosecutor Declares Innocence. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (10/11, Shukovsky) reports, "The lawyer representing the prime suspect in the killing of federal prosecutor Tom Wales publicly declared his client's innocence Tuesday, rejecting the notion that he held a grudge against Wales and protesting the government's inquisitionlike investigation. … 'This is Richard Jewell all over again,' Seattle attorney Larry Setchell said, referring to the man wrongly suspected in the 1996 Olympics bombing." The P-I continues, "Setchell's client, a 45-year-old commercial pilot who recently moved to Snohomish, has been in the FBI's cross hairs since Wales was shot to death in his Queen Anne home five years ago today. … Next week, Setchell said, the pilot will provide agents with handwriting samples -- hoping to prove he wasn't the author of a bizarre, anonymous letter sent to the bureau earlier this year by someone claiming to be a hit man hired to kill Wales." The P-I adds, "After the Oct. 11, 2001, slaying, federal authorities launched a massive manhunt. If Wales was killed because of his job, he would be the first federal prosecutor murdered in the line of duty. … But in an interview with the Seattle P-I, Setchell said the FBI has 'no science' connecting the pilot to the scene of the killing. … 'They took everything from his house and they have nothing connecting him to Tom Wales. If they did, he wouldn't be walking the streets,' the attorney said. The P-I isn't identifying the pilot because he hasn't been charged with a crime." The P-I notes, "In 2001, Wales prosecuted the pilot, his business partner and others on charges that they improperly modified a surplus military helicopter for civilian use. Wales ultimately dropped the charges after an expert witness for the government was shown to have lied in another, similar case to the Justice Department, Federal Aviation Administration and the court, Setchell said. An internal investigative report from the Department of Transportation's Inspector General obtained by the P-I confirms that the expert witness lied. … FBI Special Inspector Robert Jordan, who this summer took charge of the investigation, will conduct a media briefing at noon today in which authorities will provide 'new information about the investigation.'"

FBI Investigating Specter Aide Over Pentagon Contract To Lobbyist Husband. USA Today (10/11, 5A, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "The FBI is investigating whether a member of Sen. Arlen Specter's staff broke the law by helping her husband, a lobbyist, secure almost $50 million in Pentagon spending for his clients, the senator acknowledged Tuesday. In an Aug. 21 letter, FBI official Joseph Persichini Jr. told Specter, R-Pa., that the bureau is investigating 'allegations of possible criminal misconduct' by staff member Vicki Siegel Herson. Persichini also asked for a copy of a report summarizing the results of an investigation of Siegel and other Specter employees with relatives who are lobbyists." USA notes, "Specter says he didn't know of the link to Siegel, who was one of his top advisers on spending issues until last fall. Specter says he did nothing wrong."

The Philadelphia Daily News (10/11, Davies, 109K) reports, "FBI agents have reviewed…Specter's financial disclosure statements" in the Siegel probe. "Specter said in a phone interview yesterday that he has not been interviewed by the FBI and neither he nor his staff has received subpoenas in the matter. 'Everything that was ever done here was within the [Senate] ethics rules,' Specter said." The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/11, Goldstein, 399K) adds, "'I really do not know' what the FBI was looking for, Specter said" of the review of his financial disclosures. "He said the FBI contacted neither him nor any member of his staff. … He has also changed the rules in his office to preclude any contact between office staff and relatives of employees engaged in lobbying.

Ney To Appear In Court Friday. Rep. Bob Ney, who has admitted to accepting gifts from lobbyists in exchange for legislative favors is due to appear in federal court Friday to formally admit wrongdoing. The Hill (10/11, Kucinich) describes Ney's scheduled appearance as "more bad news" for the GOP which is still reeling from the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contacts with house pages. The Hill notes that "to the dismay of Republicans," Ney is likely to make his court appearance as a sitting member of Congress. While Ney "has given up his gavels on the House Administration Committee and the Financial Services Housing and Community Opportunity subcommittee," he "has kept his seat. … A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee confirmed Ney is still on the congressional payroll. Ney makes $165,200 annually, or $452.60 per day."

Malvo Pleads Guilty To Six Counts Of First Degree Murder. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Londoano) reports that sniper Lee Boyd Malvo yesterday pleaded guilty to six counts of first degree murder, taking responsibility for his role in the October 2002 sniper shootings in Montgomery County. Malvo's attorneys said that before his scheduled November 9 sentencing hearing, "they will try to reach a 'global resolution,' which presumably would entail his pleading guilty to slayings and shootings in other parts of the country where he is a suspect. If such a deal is reached, Malvo, 21, could benefit by being allowed to serve time in a federal prison rather than a maximum-security penitentiary in Virginia, where he was first convicted of murder. Although defense lawyers raised the prospect of such an agreement, no negotiations appear to be underway."

The Washington Times (10/11, Wagner) reports, "State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said Malvo probably will be sentenced to six consecutive life terms without a chance for parole. The minimum sentence would be a single life term with a chance for parole." The Times adds, "According to an interstate agreement before the Montgomery trials, Mr. Gansler said Malvo will be returned to Virginia, where he was sentenced to life in 2003 for killing FBI analyst Linda Franklin, 47, on Oct. 14, 2002, in a parking lot outside the Home Depot in Falls Church."

DOJ_NMG_0078766

The Baltimore Sun (10/11, Siegel) reports, "Malvo's lawyers said Tuesday they will move quickly to try to reach an agreement by his scheduled Nov. 9 sentencing in Rockville, where prosecutors are seeking the maximum sentence of six consecutive prison terms of life without parole. … 'We are about to hopefully embark on some candid and frank discussions with some local prosecutors,' said William C. Brennan, Malvo's lawyer. He said he will try in the coming weeks to 'to effectuate a global resolution to Mr. Malvo's legal problems,' but he and prosecutors declined to specify which shootings might be involved. … Charges are pending against Malvo and Muhammad in Alabama, Louisiana and Washington, D.C.. The pair is suspected -- in some cases because Malvo reportedly told police about them -- in shootings in Arizona, California, Florida, Georgia, Texas and Washington state."

The AP (10/11, Manning) reports, "Malvo has already been convicted of shootings in neighboring Virginia. Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas Gansler said such a plea deal could mean Malvo may not serve his sentence there. … Malvo could plead guilty to the Oct. 3, 2002, shooting of Pascal Charlot in Washington, D.C. and serve his life term in the federal system, Gansler said. Federal prosecutors handle murder cases in the District of Columbia." The AP adds, "Gansler said the decision rests with Virginia authorities, who agreed to let Malvo and his one-time mentor, John Allen Muhammad, come to Maryland for new trials. Under an interstate agreement, Maryland must return Malvo after his sentencing. … Kevin Hall, a spokesman for Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine, said Kaine's staff has not had any recent discussions with Maryland prosecutors on a plea deal for Malvo. The Virginia prosecutors who first tried the pair were opposed when the idea was proposed a few months ago."

Judge Delays Wecht Trial Until 3rd Circuit Rules On FBI Records. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (10/11, Cato) reports, "The federal public corruption trial of Dr. Cyril H. Wecht will not begin next week as scheduled. U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab released the jury pool of nearly 300 people, effectively postponing the Oct. 16 trial start date indefinitely." The Tribune-Review notes that the 3rd US Circuit Court "has been asked to decide whether internal disciplinary records of the lead FBI agent in the case should be made public and whether a federal court rule in Pittsburgh that keeps lawyers from speaking to the media is constitutional." The AP (10/11, Mandak) adds, "Wecht's attorneys appealed to the 3rd Circuit after Schwab upheld FBI searches for Wecht's records and computers. Defense attorneys had attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who obtained the search warrants, but Schwab overruled some of their objections because he said they were filed too late."

California City Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Corruption Charges. Bay City News Wires (10/11) reports, "A Colma city councilman facing public corruption charges was arraigned Tuesday morning in San Francisco federal court." Philip J. Lum "pleaded not guilty before a U.S. Northern District Court judge to charges he failed to report gifts accepted from the owner of a Colma casino in exchange for voting favorably on City Council matters that benefited the casino." BCN notes, "The charges came after a three-year FBI investigation revealed that Lum, who has been on the Colma City Council since 1986, accepted first-class and coach airline tickets to the Philippines from 1999 until 2001 from the owner of Colma's Lucky Chances Casino, according to the U.S. attorney's office. … Lum was released on $100,000 bail."

Philadelphia Architect Sentenced To Probation For Illegal Contributions. The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/11, Shiffman, 399K) reports, "A Philadelphia architect who participated in a pay-to-play scheme in which $30,000 from a corporation was illegally funneled toward Mayor Street's reelection was sentenced to two years' probation yesterday. The case is part of a continuing FBI investigation into corruption at Philadelphia International Airport and is related to federal authorities' City Hall probe. The architect, Terry Crockett, had pleaded guilty to conspiracy and fraud and had helped authorities make a case against two codefendants." The Inquirer notes, "After Sky Sites paid Crockett, he gave $10,000 each to consultant Joseph Moderski and Eric Selby, a former vice president of Sky Sites. The three men then each gave $10,000 to a political action committee controlled by Ronald A. White, a chief Street supporter."

Immunized Computer Technician Helped FBI Access Fumo Emails. The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/11, Shiffman, Cattabiani, 399K) reports, "Last fall, agents on the FBI's public corruption squad faced a problem: They couldn't read encrypted e-mail seized from State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's offices. On Oct. 18, they got a break. Donald Wilson, a state Senate computer technician who had been granted immunity, suddenly remembered something, according to a newly unsealed FBI affidavit. He still had two portable data cards -- with all the passwords to open the e-mail. … With that breakthrough, the affidavit said, agents were able to read more Fumo office e-mails talking about destroying records and fretting about the FBI -- a trail that helped lead to obstruction-of-justice charges against two other Fumo computer technicians, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister." The Inquirer notes, "Prosecutors, who have been investigating Fumo for three years, say they will decide by Christmas whether to indict Fumo, or others."

DOJ_NMG_0078767

Missouri Federal Prosecutors Begin Child-Porn Crackdown. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/11, Patrick) reports, "Missouri's federal prosecutors said Tuesday that they are reinforcing the battle against an 'epidemic' of online child pornography, in an effort funded in part by well-known St. Louis concert promoter and philanthropist Steven Schankman." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Schankman) said he donated $100,000 toward the estimated $600,000 annual budget to help provide a more coordinated attack. He said his desire comes from various directions, including experiences of his employees' children. … Schankman said it had little or nothing to do with federal charges that sent his son, Jason P. Schankman, to prison in April for almost 16 years for producing and receiving child pornography here. The younger Schankman, 31 when he was charged last year, lived in Kirkwood." The Post-Dispatch adds, "Steven Schankman said his financial help was not intended to get his son a break from U.S. Attorney Catherine L. Hanaway's office. 'I'm too smart to say this will help my son and she's too smart to say it will,' he said. 'Catherine Hanaway did what she had to do.' … Hanaway said she had told Steven Schankman she could not work with him on the project while his son's case was open. … On Tuesday, her office announced creation of a child exploitation unit, which will refocus some prosecutors' efforts on child pornography. She also said the FBI is planning to bear down on pornographers who use 'peer-to peer' file-sharing networks that are commonly used to share music. … Several cases where child pornographers used the Kazaa network have been prosecuted in federal court in Kansas City, said Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri. Kazaa cases have also been handled in St. Louis, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeff Jensen said."

Former California TV Reporter Charged In Alleged Child Sex Abuse Case. The AP (10/11) reports, "A retired police sergeant and former television reporter was charged Tuesday in connection with several encounters between him and two 12-year-old boys in a cruise ship spa, authorities said." Roderick "Rod" Bernsen "was arrested at the Port of Los Angeles Saturday by FBI agents investigating a complaint by the mother of one of the boys, authorities said. He faces one count of abusive sexual contact. He made his first appearance in federal court Tuesday, where his bail was set at $850,000." The AP notes, "During an encounter in the steam room, the boys alleged that Bernsen inappropriately touched himself in front of them. They claim he later followed them to shower stalls where he inappropriately touched them, the affidavit said." The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Mozingo, 918K) adds after the boys' mother reported the alleged incident, "Bernsen went to ship security too, said nothing inappropriate had happened, but promised to stay away from the boys. A Princess Cruise Lines executive called the FBI that day to report 'a possible sexual assault of two 12-year-old boys by a 58-year-old man.' The FBI waited until the ship docked five days later to question and then arrest Bernsen."

Aviation Experts Debate Whether Criminal Charges Should Follow Jet Crashes. USA Today (10/11, Levin) reports, "Two U.S. charter pilots being held in Brazil following a fatal midair collision over the Amazon jungle are at the forefront of the latest debate over whether members of flight crews should face criminal charges in jet crashes, aviation experts said Tuesday. … Criminal investigations after an accident are part of 'an increasing and alarming trend,' said William Voss, president of the Flight Safety Foundation, a safety group. 'This tends to get in the way of the safety investigation, whose purpose is to find the causes and prevent future tragedies,' Voss said." USA adds, "The NTSB determines the 'probable cause' of accidents, but steers away from criminal cases or civil lawsuits. Groups such as the Flight Safety Foundation say that punishing individuals for mistakes does not help prevent accidents."

Prosecutor Drops Assault Charge Against Maryland State Senate President. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Wiggins) reports, "A Baltimore prosecutor dropped an assault charge yesterday against Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., who was accused last month of punching a developer," Leo Bruso, "in the jaw during a" County Council meeting. Gerard B. Volatile, "who was handling the case on behalf of the Prince George's County state's attorney's office, said he did not have enough evidence to move forward with the case. … 'After interviewing numerous potential witnesses, including the witnesses closest to Mr. Bruso at the council hearing and persons in a position to have the best perspective to see what happened, I do not believe that this allegation rises to a criminal matter,' Volatile told District Judge Thurman H. Rhodes yesterday." Volatile "said that he interviewed more than a dozen potential witnesses and that none corroborated Bruso's account."

DOJ_NMG_0078768

Missouri Nursing Home Operator Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/11, Patrick, 300K) reports Missouri nursing home company "American Healthcare Management and its former chief executive officer, Robert Wachter, reaped at least $4 million by slashing care while some patients lay dehydrated, underfed or in their own filth, officials said. One resident was covered in ants, one was bruised from falls, one wandered off across a six-lane intersection and one was beaten to death by an employee. … Wachter, AHM and three nursing homes pleaded guilty Tuesday to one count of conspiring to defraud the federally backed Medicare and Medicaid programs by taking payments for a level of care not provided." The Post-Dispatch notes, "State surveys originally alerted the Department of Health and Human Services to problems, said Roland Corvington, special agent in charge of the FBI at St. Louis, which joined the investigation."

Federal Officials Eye Woman's Property In Prostitution Case. The Washington Times (10/11, Emerling) reports, "Federal officials have filed suit against two California properties owned by a woman whose D.C.-based escort service is the subject of a money-laundering and prostitution investigation. A civil suit filed Oct. 3 by the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District lists two properties owned by Deborah Jean Palfrey -- one in Vallejo and one in Escondido, Calif. -- as subject to forfeiture pending the outcome of the criminal investigation. As of July, the properties were worth $495,000 and $480,000, respectively."

DC Mosque Accuses Financial Manager Of Embezzlement. The Washington Times (10/11, McElhatton) reports, "The Islamic Center of Washington, D.C., one of the most prominent mosques in the country, is accusing its longtime financial manager of embezzling hundreds of thousands of dollars by funneling checks to companies under his control. Farzad Darui of Falls Church was suspended last month as financial manager of the center, according to court records." Officials for the Islamic Center "have told their attorneys that they discovered more than $300,000 in canceled checks since 2000 that were paid by the center to at least two Virginia companies under Mr. Darui's control, court records show. … No criminal charges have been filed in the case."

Chicago Police Question Suspect In Triple Homicide. The Chicago Tribune (10/11, Heinzmann, Meisner) reports, "Chicago police were questioning a suspect Tuesday in the weekend slayings of an 80-year-old grandmother and two of her adult children and the assault of a teenage relative in their South Side home. The male suspect was in custody and charges were expected, but none had been filed Tuesday evening, Chicago police spokeswoman Monique Bond said. She declined to say how long he had been in custody or whether it was believed he acted alone." The Tribune adds, "The bodies of Elnora White, her son Curtis, 56, and her daughter Elnoria Countee, 54, were found Saturday afternoon in their first-floor apartment in the 8100 block of South Green Street in the Auburn Gresham neighborhood, police said. … According to the Cook County medical examiner's office, which conducted autopsies Sunday, Curtis White, who was disabled and found dead in bed, died of stab wounds in his face. Elnora White, who was found on the floor of the dining room, died of blunt trauma wounds. Countee, who was found on her bedroom floor, died of a stab wound in the chest."

Three Year Old Girl's Alleged Shooter Captured. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Winton, Hayasaki) reports, "A 17-year-old gang member accused of intentionally shooting a 3-year-old girl at point-blank range last month was captured by an LAPD-FBI task force in San Bernardino County today after community members gave up his location, police said. Jonathan Banks of Los Angeles was named Monday by the LAPD as the man who killed Kaitlyn Avila and wounded her father, Cesar, during a Sept. 24 attack that stunned the Baldwin Village neighborhood. An alleged accomplice of Banks was arrested Friday."

Liquor Store Owner Fears Reprisals After Tracking Down Gang Members Who Robbed His Store. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Becerra, Winton) reports, "Ten times in the last month, the same group of robbers walked in and hauled away beer, chips and other food. Brandishing a knife, the robbers warned the store's owner: 'We know where you live.' But the owner of the Washington Boulevard shop would not back down. Instead, he installed video cameras around the store to capture images of the robbers. Then he roamed the neighborhood with the photos, getting their identities. The culmination of his detective work came Monday night when undercover Los Angeles police officers watched as several of the young men walked out of the store with two cases of stolen beer. The detectives chased the men and arrested two of them." But now, the store owner is "worried about reprisals."

Three Men Charged In Robbery Murder. The Washington Post (10/11, B4, Partlow) reports, "Three Prince George's County men have been charged with attempting to rob a 41-year-old man of his backpack and cellphone, then beating him with a baseball bat and fatally shooting him, according to charging documents. The three men -- Timothy McLeod, 20, James D. Brumfield, 19, and Douglas I. Riley Jr., 21 -- are charged with first-degree murder in the killing of Jose Vicente Yaque, who lived along Edmonston Road in the Bladensburg area. They appeared yesterday via teleconference in Prince George's County District Court for a bond hearing."

DOJ_NMG_0078769

CIVIL LAW:

Oracle Settles GSA Contract Fraud Charges With DOJ For $98.5 Million. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, B3, Vara) reports, "Oracle Corp. agreed to pay $98.5 million to the U.S. government to settle a lawsuit alleging PeopleSoft Inc., which Oracle acquired last year, overcharged the government on contracts for software and services." The Journal continues, "Under a General Services Administration program, vendors agree to disclose pricing policies for their private-sector customers in exchange for a chance to sell to government customers under one contract. … In this case, during PeopleSoft's negotiation with the government over an initial software contract and two extensions, the company understated the discounts it provided to commercial customers, according to a statement from the Justice Department. That meant most federal purchasers under the contract paid inflated prices between March 1997 and Sept. 2005, the Justice Department said."

The Washington Post (10/11, D3, Rich) reports, "The civil settlement, reached at U.S. District Court in Maryland, was disclosed at a news conference in Washington as officials announced a new task force targeting procurement fraud. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said the task force, established by the department's criminal division, would detect and prosecute fraud associated with increased contracting activity for national security and other government programs." The Post continues, "McNulty said the task force is modeled on efforts to combat fraud after Hurricane Katrina and a similar program he initiated last year when he was U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia. … The settlement with Oracle resolved allegations that PeopleSoft understated to the GSA the discounts it provided to commercial customers. GSA regulations require that a vendor disclose its commercial pricing policies during negotiations for a single contract that can give a vendor access to hundreds of government purchasers."

The AP (10/11, Jordan) reports, "The settlement with Oracle's PeopleSoft kicked off what the department called a crackdown on waste, fraud and abuse in federal contracts. … 'Criminals who cheat the government must be identified, stopped and punished,' Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told reporters in Washington. He estimated that 5 percent of federal agencies' annual revenues is wasted on faulty or otherwise illegal contracts."

The CNET News (10/11, Fried) reports, "The settlement was the largest ever related to the General Services Administration's Multiple Award Schedule program, the Justice Department said. The MAS program requires vendors to provide their commercial pricing information to the government in exchange for the ability to strike deals with hundreds of federal agencies under a single contract. The Justice Department said PeopleSoft's disclosures 'were not current, accurate and complete.' … 'The program works well when vendors follow the disclosure rules and provide GSA with the information it needs to negotiate good prices for government purchasers,' Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in a statement. 'This agreement demonstrates the department's determination to hold vendors accountable for abusing GSA's trust and damaging its programs.'"

CNN.com (10/11, Frieden) reports, "Justice Department officials said the Task Force would be modeled after the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, which they say has been successful in uncovering efforts to defraud the federal government."

Market Watch (10/11, Paige) reports, "The settlement resolved allegations that PeopleSoft provided inaccurate and incomplete pricing information for licenses of its software and related maintenance during negotiations with the government. As a result, federal agencies overpaid for software and maintenance between March 1997 and September of last year, according to the Justice Department. … A spokeswoman for Oracle, of Redwood Shores, Calif., said the company cooperated fully with the investigation of the PeopleSoft contract. … 'Oracle was not aware of the suit at the time of the acquisition,' said Deborah Hellinger, the spokeswoman. 'Oracle is pleased to have fully resolved this legacy PeopleSoft suit and all claims under the PeopleSoft contract.'"

High Court Finds For Small Tobacco Firms. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A10, Anderson, O'Connell, 2.03M) reports that Supreme Court was not convinced by 30 states seeking a High Court review of "whether three small tobacco companies can use one lawsuit to challenge state-by-state payment requirements related to a massive 1998 industry settlement. The court's decision not to consider the appeal means the three companies can proceed, in a New York federal court, to challenge payments to state accounts established to cover damages in tobacco lawsuits." The Journal adds, "But Grand River Enterprises Six Nations Ltd. of Gowanda, N.Y.; Nationwide Tobacco Inc. of Blaine, Wash.; and 3B Holdings Inc. of Lewiston, Idaho, challenged the payments in a lawsuit filed in New York, where the master agreement was negotiated and signed by the four major cigarette makers and 46 states. The small companies weren't party to the settlement."

Dow Jones (10/11) reports, "The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in September 2005 that a New York federal trial court could handle the challenge against all of the state escrow fund laws. The 30 state attorneys general said they believe the court decision violates state sovereignty because the tobacco company challenge deals with 30 different sets of state laws. … 'The Second Circuit's ruling...upsets the delicate relationship between the states and the federal courts,' the states said in their appeal."

DOJ_NMG_0078770

The AP (10/11, Yost) reports, "The justices' decision allows the companies to continue to fight state laws requiring payments to accounts set up as part of a $206 billion financial settlement eight years ago with the largest tobacco companies. Each of the 30 states had passed a law requiring companies that didn't participate in that settlement to pay into the escrow funds to help cover future damage awards." The AP adds, "The three small companies sued, alleging the states violated antitrust law and the Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution. The laws each state passed were mostly identical to model legislation contained in an appendix to the settlement with the biggest tobacco companies. … The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, the state where the settlement negotiations had taken place, allowed the small companies to pursue the antitrust claims." The AP notes, "In asking the Supreme Court to take the case, the state governments say the appeals court is treating a state's most sovereign act, the passage of legislation, 'as though it were the culmination of a commercial antitrust conspiracy.' … The states wanted the court to consider whether principles of due process and state sovereignty permit a federal judge in New York to exercise jurisdiction over the state attorney general in another state."

Plame Parts Ways With Lawyer In Civil Suit. John McCaslin in his "Inside the Beltway" column in the Washington Times (10/11, 88K) writes that the latest issue of the American Lawyer suggests Valerie Plame's civil lawsuit has no merit as "one theory as to why" she "suddenly parted ways with her attorney, Proskauer Rose partner Christopher Wolf -- her next-door neighbor, no less -- shortly after her civil action was filed against senior Bush administration officials." McCaslin notes, "Headlined 'File and run,' the article quotes lawyer Victoria Toensing, a former chief counsel to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, as saying: 'I'm amazed Proskauer took the case in the first place.'"

US Challenges AIDS Funding Ruling. The AP (10/11) reports, "The Bush administration sought Tuesday to overturn a court decision that lets nonprofit AIDS groups apply for federal funding without signing a pledge opposing prostitution and sex trafficking." The AP continues, "At least one of the groups, DKT International Inc., has refused to sign the pledge because it helps distribute condoms to prostitutes and other sex workers in Vietnam." The AP adds, "DKT last year sued the U.S. Agency for International Development, contending their free speech rights were violated by a 2003 law requiring that they explicitly oppose prostitution and sex trafficking to qualify for part of a $15 billion AIDS program. … In May, U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan sided with DKT, saying the funding conditions insist that groups 'parrot' the U.S. government's position on prostitution. … But the Justice Department, in its appeal Tuesday, called the funding condition 'highly germane' to the overall goal of fighting the spread of AIDS and HIV. … The case now heads to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. A date for arguments has not yet been set."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Charges Black Political Leader In Mississippi With Suppressing White Vote. The New York Times (10/11, Nossiter) reports from Macon, MS, "The Justice Department has chosen this no-stoplight, courthouse town buried in the eastern Mississippi prairie for an unusual civil rights test: the first federal lawsuit under the Voting Rights Act accusing blacks of suppressing the rights of whites." The Times continues, "The action represents a sharp shift, and it has raised eyebrows outside the state. The government is charging blacks with voting fraud in a state whose violent rejection of blacks' right to vote, over generations, helped give birth to the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Yet within Mississippi the case has provoked knowing nods rather than cries of outrage, even among liberal Democrats." The Times adds, "The Justice Department's main focus is Ike Brown, a local power broker whose imaginative electoral tactics have for 20 years caused whisperings from here to the state capital in Jackson, 100 miles to the southwest. Mr. Brown, tall, thin, a twice-convicted felon, the chairman of the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and its undisputed political boss, is accused by the federal government of orchestrating -- with the help of others – 'relentless voting-related racial discrimination' against whites, whom blacks outnumber by more than 3 to 1 in the county. … His goal, according to the government: keeping black politicians -- ones supported by Mr. Brown, that is -- in office. … To do that, the department says, he and his allies devised a watertight system for controlling the all-determining Democratic primary, much as segregationists did decades ago."

Parties Agree To Stop Crossover Voting In South Carolina Primaries. The AP (10/11, Davenport) reports, "South Carolina Republican and Democratic party leaders have agreed to swap voter rolls in their 2008 presidential primaries to stop people from casting ballots in both contests." The AP continues, "Neither party likes the idea of voters casting a ballot in both primaries. … 'I don't want people who have voted in their primary attempting to vote in ours,' state Democratic Party Chairman Joe Erwin said Tuesday. … But that might not be an easy task in a state where the parties pay for and run the presidential primaries. Voters don't register by party and State Election Commission spokesman Chris Whitmire said the parties can set whatever rules they want. … 'We don't view it as a real election. We liken it more to a straw poll' that guides delegates at national conventions, he said." The AP adds, "A quarter of presidential primary voters here describe themselves as independents. The Legislature has repeatedly refused to require party registration in the presidential primaries. … The first party to hold a primary will hand over the voter rolls to the other party, leaders said. … Erwin said he's having legal experts look at the plan. … 'I want a legal opinion on whether or not a poll worker can deny anyone from voting because they are looking at a list,' Erwin said. … A U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman on Tuesday could not immediately answer questions about the plan."

DOJ_NMG_0078771

Report Finds Little Evidence Of Polling Place Fraud. A preliminary report to the US Election Assistance Commission has found little evidence of the type of polling place fraud many states are instituting new voter registration and identification requirements to stop. USA Today (10/11, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "USA TODAY obtained the report from the commission four months after it was delivered by two consultants hired to write it. The commission has not distributed it publicly. At least 11 states have approved new rules for independent voter-registration drives or requirements that voters produce specific forms of photo ID at polling places. Several of those laws have been blocked in court, most recently in Arizona last week. The House of Representatives last month approved a photo-ID law, now pending in the Senate. The bipartisan report by two consultants to the election commission casts doubt on the problem those laws are intended to address. 'There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling-place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, 'dead' voters, non-citizen voting and felon voters,' the report says."

A separate story in USA Today (10/11, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that these new laws restricting who can register and vote "e have reduced the number of people who may have voted otherwise. Some of those laws have been blocked in court. Even so, critics say, the damage has been done." USA adds, "Advocates of registration and photo identification laws say they are needed to prevent fraud. They say the rules apply to all potential voters, regardless of race, ethnicity, income or ideology."

SCOTUS Rejects Gay Marriage, Abortion Cases. The AP (10/11) reports, "The Supreme Court refused to intervene Tuesday in a legal fight over same-sex marriage, declining an appeal from a gay California couple who were denied a license to wed." The AP continues, "The justices declined without comment to take the case of Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer of Mission Viejo, Calif. The men had sought a marriage license in southern California's Orange County in 2004 and, after they were turned down, filed a federal lawsuit that challenged federal and state laws against same-sex marriage." The AP adds, "A U.S. District judge said the federal Defense of Marriage Act was constitutional but declined to rule on the state ban because a separate legal challenge is making its way through California state courts. … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed in May that the couple should await the outcome of the state court challenge. .. .Last week, a California appeals court upheld the state ban on same-sex weddings. That case appears headed for the California Supreme Court." The AP notes, "The Supreme Court on Tuesday turned aside the case of Sandra Cano, one of the women behind the legalization of abortion, who had sought to reverse the victory she won 33 years ago. … Cano says she never wanted an abortion and that her difficult early life resulted in her becoming the anonymous plaintiff in Doe v. Bolton, the lesser-known case which the justices ruled on the same day in 1973 as the landmark Roe v. Wade."

Marcus Concerned Over Popularity Of South Dakota Abortion Ban. Ruth Marcus in her column in the Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K) writes that "it's alarming that the vote on repealing the" South Dakota law banning abortions "may be so close. An independent poll in July found 47 percent of voters opposed, 39 percent in favor. But a more recent poll, commissioned by an antiabortion group, showed the gap much narrower, 47 to 44 percent. Four of the eight Republican state senators who had opposed the ban were ousted in primary elections." And the repeal effort, "rather than challenge the law in court, where it would almost certainly be overturned, carries twin risks -- failure and success." And if it is repealed "what happens if and when antiabortion forces come back with a version more palatable to South Dakotans? The July poll showing 47 percent of voters opposed to the ban found that 59 percent would support it with exceptions for rape and incest."

Real Estate Brokerage Accused Of Discriminatory Sales Practices. The New York Times (10/11, Scott) reports, "The National Fair Housing Alliance…charged yesterday that agents in the Brooklyn Heights office of the city's largest residential real estate brokerage, the Corcoran Group, had engaged in discriminatory sales practices, including racial steering and withholding information from African-American clients." The report said "an agent 'produced a map of Brooklyn and drew a red outline of the areas in which the white home seeker should consider living.' The agent used arrows to indicate neighborhoods that were 'changing.'" The Times adds, "Pamela Liebman, president and chief executive officer of Corcoran, said in an interview yesterday that her firm 'has always been devoted to fair housing' and recently required all of its agents to undergo four hours of training in fair housing law and practices. She said, 'I have never been given the specific charges as they relate to the Corcoran Group and I anxiously await them as we intend to defend ourselves vigorously.'"

DOJ_NMG_0078772

NYTimes Celebrates US Diversity. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M)in an editorial writes that whoever becomes America's 300 millionth person "should get a bouquet and a thank-you card. It should be signed by President Bush on behalf of a grateful nation that is buzzing with a youthful energy for which the aging powers of Europe would gladly trade their pension obligations. If the newcomer is an immigrant, he or she should also get an apology from Mr. Bush for the scarcity of worker visas, and a promise to get right on that problem." The Times concludes, "Our teeming immensity keeps us from going stale, and despite some people's panic attacks, our population issues have mysterious ways of working themselves out. America has big problems, but it also has 300 million reasons to be hopeful."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Expected To Approve AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The AP (10/11, Dunbar) reports, "The Justice Department is expected to approve AT&T Inc.'s buyout of BellSouth Corp. without attaching any conditions to the deal, three people knowledgeable about the matter said Tuesday. … The proposed merger, now valued at about $78 billion, would create a telecommunications giant with both the largest landline and wireless networks in the nation. A Justice Department official declined to comment on the decision, and the sources who disclosed it declined to be identified because the action had not been formally announced." The AP continues, "The Justice Department is expected to approve the buyout Wednesday despite a plea from the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and other members of Congress that the deal not be allowed to go through until details related to two previous telecommunications mergers are settled and other concerns are addressed."

Bloomberg (10/11, Rowley) reports, "AT&T, formed last year by SBC Communication Inc.'s takeover of AT&T, is the largest U.S. telephone company. The combination with BellSouth, the third-largest U.S. phone company, would provide service in 22 states. … The Federal Communications Commission is scheduled to vote on the deal two days from now. The FCC typically doesn't act on a takeover before the Justice Department has announced its decision. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has pushed for approving the transaction without conditions."

USA Today (10/11, Davidson) reports, "Justice could still shift course and require some last-minute concessions, these people say. But the department typically acts on telecom mergers before the Federal Communications Commission, which is scheduled to vote on the deal Thursday." US Aadds, "A Justice decision not to require concessions could embolden FCC Democrats to seek even tougher conditions than they might otherwise, say people with knowledge of the situation. They requested anonymity because Justice has not announced its decision. … FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican, has recommended approval without conditions."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A10, Schatz) reports, "Justice Department officials are expected to say that the merger of the two phone giants doesn't pose significant competitive threats that require divestures, conditions or a consent decree, the lawyers said. The Federal Communications Commission has scheduled a vote to approve the deal tomorrow. … The decisions by the Justice Department and FCC to approve the deal quickly come despite bipartisan requests from some congressional leaders to hold off until a federal judge rules on an antitrust review of the mergers last year of SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., and Verizon Communications Inc. and MCI Inc." The Journal notes, "Opponents of the AT&T/BellSouth deal, including smaller phone companies and consumer groups, have complained the deal will result in higher prices for consumers and high-volume business customers. The fact that the government appears to have few qualms about approving the deal so soon after the Baby Bell mergers last year shows how much the communications industry has changed in the 22 years since the government broke up Ma Bell."

Investor Claims Microsoft Helped Utah Firm Finance Linux Litigation. The AP (10/11, Foy) reports, "Microsoft Corp. helped a Utah company raise money for its legal challenge to the open-source Linux operating system, an investor said in a court filing." The AP continues, "In a sworn statement, Lawrence R. Goldfarb, a founder of BayStar Capital Management of Larkspur, Calif., said he invested $50 million in The SCO Group Inc. at the urging of Microsoft executives who promised to guarantee BayStar's investment against any losses. … Goldfarb says Microsoft reneged on the promise. In a statement to The Associated Press, Microsoft denied making any such assurance." The AP adds, "Goldfarb's statement was filed in federal court last week by IBM Corp. as the tech company asked a judge to throw out what remains of a long-running legal battle. SCO sued IBM for $5 billion in 2003, accusing it of donating SCO's proprietary Unix code to Linux developers. … A magistrate, however, has dismissed 182 of SCO's 294 claims against IBM. U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball has scheduled an Oct. 24 hearing to hear SCO's appeal of that ruling."

DOJ_NMG_0078773

DOJ Launches Antitrust Probe Of Private Equity Firms. Bloomberg (10/11, Cole) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has begun an informal antitrust inquiry of private-equity firms and their collaboration on leveraged buyouts, a person familiar with the matter said today." Bloomberg continues, "Justice officials in recent weeks sent letters to firms seeking information about deals and business practices, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the probe isn't public. Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners were among those contacted, the Wall Street Journal reported earlier today. … 'It's very serious for the buyouts firms as this investigation could last up to a year,' Sean Boland, co-chair of the antitrust practice at Washington-based law firm Howrey LLP, said in a telephone interview."

The Financial Times (10/11, White, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The US private equity industry was hit on Tuesday by the revelation of a government inquiry into potentially anti-competitive behaviour by some of its top groups. The Department of Justice investigation appears to focus on whether buy-out groups colluded to keep asset prices down in company auctions, according to industry executives. In a letter to buy-out groups including Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Silver Lake Partners the government demanded information about deals dating back to January 2003, people familiar with the requests said on Tuesday. … The DoJ declined to comment, as did Carlyle, KKR, Silver Lake and other private equity groups."

The New York Times (10/11, Sorkin) reports, "Two rival leveraged buyout firms make bids for the same company. At the 11th hour, one firm drops out of the auction, unwilling to pay more. … The remaining buyout firm is declared the winner. A month later, another company is put up for sale — only this time the two firms that had just been fierce competitors have teamed up to bid together for it. … Friendly competition? Or collusion?" The Times continues, "That question is what the Justice Department appears to be examining as part of a preliminary inquiry into possible anticompetitive behavior in the clubby private equity industry, according to people briefed on the investigation." The Times adds, "Several of the nation's largest firms, including Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, the Carlyle Group, Clayton, Dubilier & Rice and Silver Lake Partners, have received letters from the Justice Department seeking broad information about their business practices and involvements in auctions going back to 2003. … The letters, sent within the last 10 days, appear to be the beginning of a wide-ranging inquiry into private equity, an industry that has become an increasingly powerful force on Wall Street in recent years but remains relatively unregulated. Of particular concern has been the emergence of consortiums in many big buyouts."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C1, Berman, Sender) reports, "When hospital operator HCA Inc. announced a deal to be taken private by a trio of private-equity firms earlier this summer for $21.3 billion, the buyers worried that a rival bidding group would crash the party and force the price higher. But no such bid materialized. … At least some of these rivals held off, say people familiar with the decision making, because they feared a competing bid for HCA would open the door for other firms to jump in on the rivals' own, other buyout deals, these people said. (In other words, you don't bid on my deal, I won't bid on yours.)" The Journal adds, "Such calculations on whether to join forces or face off against competitors have been at the heart of private-equity investing over the last three years. Assessing these rules of engagement in the multibillion-dollar world of corporate buyouts is also part of a new Justice Department inquiry into private equity's auction practices since 2003, according to people familiar with the effort. .. .The inquiry, reported yesterday by The Wall Street Journal, centers on how groups of private-equity firms conduct their bidding in corporate auctions, according to people familiar with letters sent to buyout firms." The Journal notes, "In many of these transactions, powerhouse private-equity firms -- which pool large sums of capital from wealthy investors and institutions -- team up to make bids to take companies private, hoping to cash in by selling them later at a higher price. .. .The inquiry, run by the Justice Department's antitrust division in Manhattan, is preliminary and like other such matters, may eventually lead in a different direction or nowhere at all. Those receiving letters include Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Silver Lake Partners and Carlyle Group, according to people familiar with the matter, and the list is likely to grow."

Judge Delivers Split Ruling In Qualcomm-Broadcom Dispute. The AP (10/11) reports, "Semiconductor maker Qualcomm Inc. violated parts of a patent held by rival Broadcom Corp. that helps cell phones conserve battery power when out of cellular network range, a judge ruled Tuesday. … However, Qualcomm did not infringe two other patents on chips used in cell phones and other wireless devices, according to Charles E. Bullock, an administrative law judge hearing the case in Washington, D.C., on behalf of the International Trade Commission." The AP continues, "Qualcomm had challenged the patents held by Broadcom, but the judge ruled all three patents were valid. .. .The case was brought to the commission by Broadcom, based in Irvine, Calif." The AP adds, "Qualcomm, based in San Diego, said it would appeal the decision to the full commission as it explored designs to replace the disputed technology. … The judge's ruling will go to the full commission next year for a final determination. … Broadcom said it would ask the commission to review the portion of the ruling that favored Qualcomm." The AP notes, "The rival chip makers have 10 suits and countersuits pending in courts from California to Europe over trade and patent issues relating to technologies that power cell phones, Bluetooth devices and wireless Internet equipment. .. Last week, a federal court judge in San Diego ordered the billionaire founders of the feuding companies to face each other behind closed doors to try to resolve their differences. No agreement was struck and the judge was expected to order further sessions."

DOJ_NMG_0078774

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, B3, Clark) reports, "Qualcomm Inc. avoided a tough sanction in a legal skirmish with Broadcom Corp. But the chip makers continue to tangle on multiple fronts and face increasing pressure to reach a settlement. An International Trade Commission administrative law judge ruled that Qualcomm's chips infringed on a Broadcom patent. Judge Charles Bullock stopped short, however, of recommending that cellphones containing the chips be barred from importation to the US. He also ruled that Qualcomm didn't infringe on two other patents that Broadcom had cited. … Although the full ITC could contradict the judge's recommendation in a commission ruling expected in February, Qualcomm investors breathed a sigh of relief after yesterday's ruling. Qualcomm's shares were up 83 cents, or 2.3%, to $37.07 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Broadcom's shares were down 79 cents, or 2.7% to $28.80 on the Nasdaq."

SCOTUS Considers Case Pitting Telecoms Against Pay-Phone Providers. The AP (10/11, Rugaber) reports, "The Supreme Court heard arguments Tuesday in a case that could force telecommunications companies to compensate pay-telephone providers billions of dollars for so-called 10-10-220 calls made by consumers, legal experts said." The AP continues, "The case stems from federal laws and regulations requiring long-distance telephone companies to compensate pay-phone providers for calls that consumers make using special dialing codes, commonly known as 10-10-220 or coinless calls." The AP adds, "Metrophones Telecommunications Inc., based in Washington state, sued Global Crossing Telecommunications Inc. in 2003, alleging that Global Crossing had not fully compensated it for phone calls made from Metrophones pay phones. Metrophones claims Global Crossing owed it $31,330.42 in fees and interest. … While the dollar damages in that particular case are low, at issue is whether companies can sue in federal court over regulatory violations or whether they can only sue over violations of federal laws." The AP notes, "Global Crossing has argued that federal law does not necessarily require long-distance companies to compensate pay-phone providers, but instead directs the Federal Communications Commission to issue rules governing how the pay phone providers would be compensated. Telecom providers Verizon Communications Inc., AT&T Inc. and Sprint Communications have filed briefs in support of Global Crossing."

Sprint Nextel Losing Ground Since Last Year's Merger. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A1, Sharma) reports that since Sprint's Acquisition of rival Nextel last year, "Sprint Nextel Corp. has been losing ground. Millions of its cellphone subscribers have defected to competitors. Its remaining customers have increasingly been switching to less profitable calling plans. Yesterday, amid mounting troubles at Sprint Nextel, former Nextel CEO Tim Donahue said he was retiring as executive chairman. The move came just two months after Len Lauer, Sprint's chief operating officer, was let go after the release of dismal financial results." The Journal adds, "The Sprint-Nextel saga shows the perils of consolidation in an intensely competitive field where technology and customer expectations keep changing quickly. Instead of each company fixing the other one's weakness, the problems have just added up."

Texas Pacific Group, AXA To Buy 60% Stake In TDF. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C4, Singer) reports, "US private-equity firm Texas Pacific Group and one of its investors has clinched a deal to buy a 60% stake in French television and cellphone transmission business TDF SA for about €3.3 billion ($4.16 billion), according to people close to the deal. … The deal will bring fresh money into the company, which is seeing strong growth from the transfer of analog TV signals to digital service. Television transmissions account for the bulk of TDF's business." Texas Pacific Group "is buying the 60% stake with one of its investors, French insurance giant AXA SA."

Google To Pay $1.65 Billion For YouTube. The New York Times (10/11, Sorkin) reports, "Google, the online search behemoth, agreed yesterday to pay $1.65 billion in stock for…YouTube, the video-sharing phenomenon that is the darling of an Internet resurgence known as Web 2.0. … Google is expected to try to make money from YouTube by integrating the site with its search technology and search-based advertising program. But the purchase price has also invited comparisons to the mind-boggling valuations that were once given to dozens of Silicon Valley companies a decade ago. Like YouTube, those companies were once the Next Big Thing, but some soon folded. Google, with a market value of $132 billion, can clearly afford to take a gamble with YouTube, but the question remains: How to put a price tag on an unproven business?"

DOJ_NMG_0078775

You Tubers' Have Mixed Reaction To Google Purchase. The Washington Post (10/11, D1, Goo) reports, "Dozens of YouTubers turned their cameras on themselves to share their opinions on the sale, while thousands responded to a video posted yesterday by YouTube founders Chad Hurley and Steve Chen. The reaction was mixed and displayed a range of emotions, from outrage and accusations that YouTube had sold out to corporate interests to admiration and optimism that Google will improve it."

Google Move Makes Yahoo Look Out Of Step With Internet Advertising. The New York Times (10/11, Hansell) reports that Google's purchase of YouTube "is making Yahoo look even more out of step with the fast-changing Internet advertising market. Yahoo itself tried to buy YouTube just a few weeks ago and got as close as negotiating price and terms, according to an executive briefed on the discussions. But the talks broke down, and Google swooped in and closed the deal quickly, just as it has in several recent partnership negotiations. Indeed, many Internet executives are noting just how often Yahoo appears to be late and slow, both in its own business and in negotiations with other companies." Google "has neutralized Yahoo's big competitive advantage on Madison Avenue: its ability to sell the full range of advertising, from splashy video campaigns to text ads on search results."

MySpace Looks To Expand Relationship With Google. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A3, Angwin) reports, "News Corp.'s MySpace.com, rebuffed in its effort to bid for YouTube Inc., is seeking to expand its relationship with the company that snatched the video-sharing Web site away, Google Inc. Google Chief Executive Eric Schmidt and Advertising Sales Vice President Tim Armstrong are expected to meet this week in Los Angeles with News Corp. executives, including Chairman Rupert Murdoch, to discuss new ways of working together. One possibility is to expand Google's recently signed ad deal with social-networking site MySpace to include video advertising on the Web." The Journal adds, "Plans for the meeting come just days after Google struck a $1.65 billion deal to buy YouTube, significantly boosting the search titan's presence in the fast-growing Web-video arena. But the deal poses a potential competitive threat to MySpace, which is a direct competitor with YouTube among Web sites that let users post their own content."

ENVIRONMENT:

Lettuce Tests Negative For E. Coli Bacteria. The Washington Post/AP (10/11, D3) reports that officials of Nunes Co. said lettuces from California that was recalled amid E. coli fears tested negative for the bacteria. Nunes Co. "said multiple samples from among the more than 8,500 cartons of recalled green leaf lettuce tested negative for pathogenic E. coli O157:H7. That strain is the one responsible for the E. coli outbreak linked to spinach that killed at least three people and sickened 199 others. The company ordered the recall after irrigation water tested positive for E. coli. Follow-up testing of water samples determined it did not contain the pathogenic strain of the bacteria. … The Food and Drug Administration is also testing the company's irrigation water. The results should be available late today or tomorrow."

Regulators Urged To Set Guidelines For E. Coli. The Los Angeles Times (10/11) editorializes, "The Salinas Valley grower that recalled 8,500 cartons of lettuce this week did all the right things: The company tested its irrigation water, and when it found E. coli, it took its lettuce off the market even before the tests could show whether it was a dangerous strain. But the current E. coli outbreak, the 20th in a decade, indicates that not all farmers take all the steps they should." The Times adds, "Each time there is an E. coli breakout, the state and the US Food and Drug Administration demand that the industry clean up its act. The industry asks for precise guidelines on what to do, and it gets no answers. Regulators can start by outlining mandatory, common-sense safety practices to protect both public health and farming's reputation."

Federal Court Rulings Hinder Administration's Federal Land Development Strategy. USA Today (10/11, Kenworthy) reports, "The Bush administration's push for more commercial development on federal land in the West is colliding with the environmental legacy of former president Richard Nixon." USA continues, "In a half-dozen cases since August, federal courts have slapped down the administration's plans to drill for oil and gas in Utah and Alaska, to allow road-building and logging in federal forests, to ease regulation of livestock grazing on public rangeland and to divert water from a Colorado national park." USA adds, "The judges in each case said the administration failed to comply with a landmark environmental law overwhelmingly passed by Congress and signed by Nixon in 1970 called the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA). … The law requires government agencies to study potential environmental consequences of federal projects and to allow citizens to comment on those actions. Agencies must prepare

DOJ_NMG_0078776

'environmental impact statements' that can run hundreds of pages, or issue less extensive 'environmental assessments' on minor projects." USA notes, "In its nearly 40-year history, the law has had a broad impact on how government agencies decide on everything from constructing highways to logging forests to building dams. … In recent months, the law has been an effective tool for environmentalists seeking to block initiatives that would allow commercial activities on hundreds of millions of acres of public land."

EPA Says Texas Copper Plant Illegally Burned Hazardous Waste. The New York Times (10/11, Blumenthal) reports, "A bankrupt copper giant facing billions of dollars in pollution claims across the nation pretended for years to recycle metals while illegally burning hazardous waste in a notorious El Paso smelter, according to a newly released Environmental Protection Agency document." The Times continues, "The agency, in a 1998 internal memorandum, said the company, Asarco, and its Corpus Christi subsidiary, Encycle, had a permit to extract metals from hazardous waste products but used that as a cover to burn the waste until the late 1990's, saving the high costs of proper disposal." The Times adds, "Among the more than 5,000 tons the company was accused of misrepresenting as containing metals for reclamation were more than 300 tons of nonmetallic residues from the former Army chemical warfare depot at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal outside Denver. (It is not clear what the arsenal's material contained.) … 'This activity, plain and simple, was illegal treatment and disposal of hazardous waste,' the environmental agency said in the memorandum, long held confidential but recently obtained by two El Paso environmental groups opposed to the smelter. 'Encycle's own business records provide compelling evidence of sham recycling.'" The Times notes, "Asarco was founded as the American Smelting and Refining Company in 1899 and was bought by Mexican interests in 1999. It has long faced complaints of contaminating broad swaths of downtown El Paso and borderland areas of Mexico with lead and other dangerous metals, and it has been the target of federal, state and local complaints involving at least 94 sites in 21 states. … But although the environmental agency reached a landmark national $20 million cleanup and penalty settlement with Asarco in 1999, the details of the violations had never been disclosed. The El Paso plant was shut down in 1999, but the company is now seeking permission to reopen it."

Ultralow-Sulfur Diesel Fuel To Debut In US Market. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, D9, Spector, 2.03M) reports, "Ultralow-sulfur diesel fuel will start hitting U.S. fuel pumps this month, opening the door for auto makers to expand the use of European diesel technology in U.S. cars and light trucks." The EPA and the Natural Resources Defense Council "yesterday hailed the expected arrival Sunday of ultralow-sulfur diesel fuels and the potential for modern diesel engines to use such fuels to help the U.S. reduce its oil consumption. The new diesel contains 97% less sulfur than the old version, officials said, emitting only 15 parts per million of sulfur, compared with 500 parts per million."

The New York Times (10/11, Barringer, 1.21M) says the Bush Administration "embraced this signal accomplishment as its own, ignoring the origins of the underlying regulation in the 1990's and the fact that it became effective in December 2000, before President Bush took office."

Environmentalist Faces Charges For Destroying Invasive Plant. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Pool) reports, "He has spent decades working to protect Los Angeles' endangered Ballona Wetlands. But did environmentalist Roy van de Hoek go too far when he took his pruning shears to a nonnative tree and plants in the Westside nature preserve? Los Angeles prosecutors say yes. They have filed six vandalism counts against Van de Hoek, alleging that he entered the wetlands without permission and destroyed city parks property when he cut down the invasive plants. If convicted, he could face six years in prison and fines of up to $15,000." Conservationists say "the prosecution is simply payback from those who for years have felt the sting of Van de Hoek's activism. The case, they suggest, is designed to scare away others from actively harvesting invasive plants from local nature preserves."

Supreme Court Upholds Ruling Requiring W.R. Grace To Pay For Asbestos Cleanup. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Verhovek) reports that the Supreme Court yesterday "let stand lower court rulings that require W.R. Grace & Co. to pay a $54.5-million federal bill for asbestos cleanup in a Montana mining town described by federal regulators as one of the nation's most contaminated Superfund sites. The court rejected Grace's appeal of a decision in favor of the Environmental Protection Agency, which sued Grace five years ago to recover the cleanup costs at a vermiculite mine in the town of Libby. The government is also pursuing a criminal case involving several former executives or managers of the mining company for allegedly concealing health risks at the mine. That trial will not begin until next year at the earliest."

The Baltimore Sun (10/11, Connolly) reports, "Grace and seven current and former executives face criminal charges of covering up the extent of the contamination. Their federal trial was supposed to start last month but was delayed until late next year at the earliest, after prosecutors appealed several pretrial rulings. " The Sun adds, "Grace doesn't dispute it has a financial obligation to clean up the contamination. However, the company challenged the EPA's method of calculating the cost. Grace argued that those costs are capped at $2 million unless an analysis is conducted before the cleanup starts to ensure it is done cost effectively. … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals sided with the EPA, and wrote in its Dec. 1, 2005 decision that an 'immediate, aggressive response' was necessary and exempt from any cap. In August, Solicitor General Paul D. Clement issued a statement endorsing the appeals court's decision and urging the Supreme Court not to hear the case."

DOJ_NMG_0078777

The AP (10/11) reports, "Grace argued in court papers that the EPA had no authority to hand the company the entire cleanup bill, as well as responsibility for future costs. The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals and a federal district judge sided with EPA, which sued Grace in 2001 to recover cleanup costs. … Grace said others appeals courts have ruled that companies can't be forced to pay the entire cost of cleaning a polluted site without being allowed to challenge whether the cleanup was necessary."

Congress, Bush Move To Cleanup Pacific "Garbage Patch." The Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Clayton, 58K) reports a "garbage patch in the Pacific is double the size of Texas. The president is likely to sign the cleanup law." A "biologically rich coral island chain in the Pacific Ocean northwest of Hawaii, which President Bush designated as a marine national monument, is under assault from floating garbage ranging from plastic bottlecaps to baby diapers." Hailed by "environmentalists as one of the president's most enduring contributions to the environment, the Montana-sized monument includes uninhabited islands home to some 7,000 marine species, at least a quarter of which are found nowhere else on earth. But the new national monument also resides on the edge what marine scientists call the great 'eastern garbage patch:' a section of slowly rotating Pacific Ocean currents - or gyre - double the size of Texas that acts as a giant garbage collector."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Six Indicted In Missouri Cocaine Trafficking Ring. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/30, Ratcliffe, 300K) reported Hillsdale Police Sgt. Christopher Cornell, tow-truck company owner Bruce Gales and alleged drug dealer Bobby Wood were among the six indicted by a federal grand jury on drug trafficking charges. "The FBI spent more than a year watching them, officials revealed…in announcing charges against six men that accuse them of trafficking in more than $2.4 million worth of cocaine. U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said the alleged leader, Wood, 37, arranged for out-of-state couriers to drive through Hillsdale, where…Cornell would stop the vehicles and arrest the drivers." Gales "took the couriers' cars away and then stole the drugs from hidden compartments, the indictments say. Gales allegedly received at least $35,000 for his role." The St. Louis Business Journal (9/29) also reported on the indictments, and the Kansas City Star (9/30, 278K) briefly noted the charges in "Across Missouri."

Baltimore Company's Online Painkiller Sales Lead To Arrests. The Baltimore Sun (10/11) reports that before federal agents "arrested its owners yesterday, Baltimore's Newcare pharmacy appeared to be a phenomenal success." However, authorities say the company this year has already bought 4.8 million doses of the drug commonly known as Vicodin. According to prosecutors, the "amazing performance concealed a lucrative cybercrime: The company sold more than $20 million worth of the painkiller to Internet customers without legitimate prescriptions. … Carl J. Kotowski, assistant special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's Baltimore office, said the operation at Newcare sparked the largest federal pharmaceutical drug investigation in the state's history." The Sun notes that Karen Tandy "told Congress in April that her agency had initiated 100 new Internet investigations involving the online sales of prescription drugs during the last fiscal year, arresting 62 people and seizing $44 million in cash, property, computers and bank account assets."

Georgia Man Seeks To Return Home Before Drug-Trafficking Trial Begins. The Rome (GA) News-Tribune (10/11) reports a bond hearing "is set in federal court today for Rome businessman Mario Enrique Armas, who pleaded not guilty Oct. 5 to charges of money laundering and possession with intent to distribute more than a ton of marijuana. Armas and his defense team will present witnesses to U.S. District Magistrate Judge Walter L. Johnson showing reason why he should be allowed to return home before his trial. … Armas was arrested last Thursday, culminating what officials said was a two-year investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Drug Enforcement Agency and the Internal Revenue Service's Criminal Investigations Division."

Man Gets Stuck In Tunnel Trying To Enter US From Mexico. The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/10, Baker, Martinez, Kucher) reports 14 people "trying to enter the United States through a storm drain tunnel in Otay Mesa ran into a glitch Tuesday morning, when the third person exiting the narrow opening became stuck." The Union-Tribune says fire crews managed to pull the man out and notes that the San Diego Tunnel Task Force "has been working with Mexican authorities to investigate [border] crossings. The task force is made up of agents from the Border Patrol, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

DOJ_NMG_0078778

Arizona Couple Facing Federal Drug Charges Relinquishes Church Leadership. The AP (10/10) reports a Pima, Arizona couple "has stepped down as leaders of a church that considers marijuana a sacrament and deity. Dan and Mary Quaintance say pending federal charges against them have made it impossible to properly lead the church. In February, the two were arrested in a car that contained 172 pounds of marijuana in the New Mexican town of Lordsburg near the Arizona state line. … The government contends the church is a front for drug trafficking."

FARC Member's Trial To Begin In DC. The AP (10/11) reports the most senior member "ever captured from Latin America's largest rebel army goes on trial in a U.S. courtroom Thursday for the kidnapping of three Americans - a case that some fear could scuttle moves for the Americans' liberation. The fate of Ricardo Palmera, better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, is to be decided by a federal jury in Washington. … The Palmera prosecution is the latest sign the U.S. government is stepping up its pressure on the FARC, listed by the State Department as 'foreign terrorist organization' in 1997."

Prensa Latina (10/10) reports the trial of Palmera "began Tuesday following a protest for his liberation by mostly U.S. citizens. The protesters consider the trial interference in Colombian affairs and Tom Burke, head of the pro-release committee, says the administration lacks the legal and moral authority to judge him. He added that U.S. taxpayers contribute five billion dollars to Plan Colombia, but they do not wish their country's involvement since they consider it a violation of Colombian laws. In addition, the DEA denied FARC involvement in drug trafficking to the U.S. or terrorism in statements to the Bush Administration, he said." Presna Latina notes that Palmera will be tried in Washington for terrorism, drug trafficking and the death of a U.S. citizen.

US Cracks Down On Illegal Guns In New Orleans. The AP (10/11, Foster) reports, "A day after four people were wounded by gun violence that continues to mar this city's hurricane recovery, local and federal authorities announced their latest attempt to crack down on criminals with guns." The AP continues, "A hot line for reporting illegal firearms is being relaunched, they said at a Tuesday news conference. A similar hot line operated in the 1990s but was eventually discontinued as the city's murder rate declined, police said. The murder rate has picked up this year as the city has repopulated, reaching 113 so far." The AP adds, "Federal law prohibits anyone convicted of a felony from possessing a firearm, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. … 'And there's no early release in federal cases,' Letten said. 'If they're convicted they're going to serve the time.' … Police Chief Warren Riley is counting on that. … 'We have found that through the federal system once they are convicted we don't see them again,' Riley said. 'We have to get the guns and the people with them off our streets if this city is going to come back.'" The AP notes, "In 2005 law officers confiscated 2,787 illegal firearms in New Orleans. Since January, 1,522 have been confiscated, even though the city has only about 40 percent of the population it had before the storm. … 'Everyone knows the problem New Orleans has with gun violence,' Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives special agent Robert Browning. 'We're going after the illegal guns and the criminals who have them.'"

West Virginia Attorney Sentenced To Six Months For Gun Violations. The Charleston Gazette (10/11, Searls) reports, "Dante di Trapano was sentenced to six months in prison Tuesday, after pleading guilty earlier to being a drug addict in possession of firearms. … Chief U.S. District Judge David Faber gave di Trapano the maximum time for the crime, after deciding government prosecutors could not prove the seven handguns found in di Trapano's Johnson Road, Charleston, residence were not collector's items." The Gazette continues, "He also sentenced di Trapano to three years of supervised release that will include special criteria to be worked out with the federal probation office and a $10,000 fine. … 'I think this is an extremely close call,' Faber said in ruling di Trapano had purchased the guns as collector items. He added, 'I believe [di Trapano] has just made the preponderance test.'" The Gazette adds, "Di Trapano, a Charleston lawyer and former agent for National Football League wide receiver Randy Moss, has already served about three months in jail, time that he will be given credit for by the federal Bureau of Prisons. … Monica Dillion, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, had called several witnesses in an effort to show di Trapano used the guns for protection because he had a large stash of drugs in his residence. … Prosecutors also failed to show there were drugs in the residence when it was raided last April. Initially, the government said field tests showed a white powder residue on a laptop computer was cocaine. Laboratory tests, however, showed that was not so. … But Faber also showed his disdain for the defendant, noting he did not tell the truth when testifying in September about cocaine use. Faber had released di Trapano on bond in August to receive drug treatment, but revoked that after an initial urine tests showed he had used cocaine."

Washington Gang Sweep Nets 40 Arrests. The Seattle Times (10/11, Green) reports, "Federal and local law enforcement officials today announced the arrests of 40 violent gang leaders, half of whom were taken into custody in the last week." The Times continues, "In a four-month investigation dubbed 'Operation Crackdown,' members of the Violent Gang Task Force - which is led by the local office of the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) targeted violent gang members suspected in a rash of drive by shootings, narcotics deals and other offenses. The task force also includes members of Seattle police, the King County Sheriff's Office and the FBI." The Times adds, "At a news conference in the Henry M. Jackson Federal Building in downtown Seattle, ATF Special Agent in Charge Kelvin Crenshaw gestured to an assortment of assault rifles and pistols laid out before him. … 'What's so unique about these firearms is that they were actually found in the possession of individuals,' he said. 'They weren't lying on a bed or leaning against a chair… these people were carrying them around.' … Of the 40 people arrested, 10 are facing federal charges, including two who will be charged as armed career criminals; a federal statute that carries a mandatory 15-year prison term for anyone caught with a firearm after previously being convicted of three violent crimes or drug distribution charges, said Andrew Friedman, an assistant U.S. Attorney who is coordinating the office's gang prosecutions."

DOJ_NMG_0078779

IMMIGRATION:

High Court Refuses To Hear Deportation Appeal Of Former Nazi Guard. McClatchy Newspapers distributes a Detroit Free Press story (10/11, Ashenfelter) that reports, "An 86-year-old former Nazi concentration camp guard who lives in Michigan and has Alzheimer's disease could be deported following the U.S. Supreme Court's refusal to review his case Tuesday. .. .It remains to be seen, however, whether the Justice Department will follow through with deportation proceedings against Iwan Mandycz of Sterling Heights, given his age and medical condition. Court records say Mandycz is incompetent." The Free Press continues, "Mandycz was stripped of his citizenship last year for not telling U.S. authorities before emigrating that he was a guard at two Nazi labor camps in Poland during World War II, including one where 14,000 Jews were murdered in a single day. … Mandycz, who emigrated in 1949, has denied being a Nazi camp guard."

The AP (10/11) reports, "The Justice Department succeeded in revoking the U.S. citizenship of 86-year-old Iwan Mandycz. He could face deportation. His lawyers say the right that prevents the U.S. government from prosecuting a mentally incompetent person also should apply to citizenship cases, which are civil proceedings. … 'The accused should be able to assist in the preparation of his defense and consult with his attorneys before he may be punished by the government,' Mandycz's lawyers said in a filing that had asked the Supreme Court to take the case." The AP adds, "The Justice Department, which wants to remove him from the United States, initiated denaturalization proceedings, saying Mandycz had concealed that he worked for the Nazis. … Officials said that Mandycz was a guard in 1943 at the Trawniki and Poniatowa labor camps in Poland, where prisoners were starved, beaten and executed en masse. … Mandycz has denied working at the camps and has said he spent World War II working at his parents' farm in Poland and, later, as a forced laborer at a farm in Austria."

The Detroit News (10/11, Lynch) reports, "Fifty-one years ago, Iwan Mandycz became a U.S. citizen. On Tuesday, his last chance at remaining one appeared to slip away. … The U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear the case of the 86-year-old Sterling Heights resident, whom the U.S. Department of Justice has targeted for deportation because of his past as a Nazi prison guard." The News adds, "Federal prosecutors believe Mandycz was a guard for six months in 1943 at the SS prison camp Poniatowa in Poland. In that year, the Nazis conducted 'Operation Harvest Festival' -- a plan to kill Jews. A total of 42,000 Jews were killed. … Mandycz arrived in the United States in 1949 and became a citizen six years later. He has denied being a Nazi prison guard despite being identified as such by two former guards." The News notes, "In March 2005, a U.S. District Court judge ruled Mandycz was in fact a guard at the prison and stripped him of his citizenship. … 'I can't imagine what would be accomplished by deporting him at his age,' said Mandycz' neighbor, Eugene Winowski. 'But at the same time, I also understand the flip side -- everything (Jewish prisoners) went through -- you can't ignore that.'"

Groups Seek Freedom For Immigrant Detainees In California. The AP (10/11) reports, "Several legal advocacy groups asked a federal judge to order the immediate release of four immigrants who have been detained for months or years without receiving a hearing on why they're being held so long." The AP continues, "The motion filed Friday asks U.S. District Judge Terry Hatter to release the detainees under conditions of supervision or grant them hearings." The AP adds, "The move followed a class-action lawsuit filed Sept. 25 on behalf of six detainees by the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California, the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project and the Stanford Law School Immigrants' Rights Clinic. Two detainees have since been released. … The lawsuit alleges the U.S Department of Homeland Security held immigrants for long periods despite court rulings that banned indefinite detention."

DOJ_NMG_0078780

Bush Seen As Avoiding Immigration Issue On Campaign Trail. The Washington Times (10/11, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Immigration is a dominant issue in congressional races from Arizona to Michigan to Pennsylvania -- just about everywhere but where President Bush is on the campaign trail. After having pressed all year to get a broad immigration bill, including legal status for illegal aliens from Congress, Mr. Bush now ignores the issue at campaign events and fundraisers, and Vice President Dick Cheney has even dropped what used to be a regular reference to immigration from his campaign stump speech." The Times adds, "It's an odd mixed message, given that many Republicans are running heavily -- and in some cases almost exclusively -- on the issue, promising an enforcement-first approach and attacking Democrats for supporting citizenship for illegal aliens." White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino "said they think the election will be decided on other issues. 'While immigration is an important issue, this election is also about the philosophical choices facing voters this November when it comes to national security and keeping taxes low,' Mrs. Perino said." She added that Bush "has been consistent in pushing for a broad approach 'because he believes that that is the only way to solve any of the individual immigration reform bills.'" But "most Republicans in Congress disagree, preferring an enforcement-first approach, of which the border fence is crucial."

Lawmakers Press Administration To Build Fence. The Washington Times (10/11, Seper, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Bush has signed off on a small down payment for a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, but legislators and fence advocates worry the barrier will never be fully funded and fear a lack of White House commitment." Lawmakers, " including Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee," are "forcefully reminding the Bush administration and Homeland Security officials that Congress' 'directive' that the fence be built is not optional." Hunter told the Times, "We didn't put the fence as a goal or an option or something that should be mixed with other solutions, we made it mandatory. … It is not an option for the Department of Homeland Security. What part of 'shall' don't they understand?"

Banks Reaching Out to Illegals. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, B1, Jordan, 2.03M) reports, "As .. leaders craft policies to curb illegal immigration from Mexico, the US Federal Reserve is devising programs to extend banking services to undocumented immigrants. A new remittance program aims to bring Mexican migrants who send money home into the mainstream U.S. financial system, regardless of their immigration status." Dubbed "Directo a Mexico," the remittance program "enables US commercial banks to make money transfers for Mexican workers through the Federal Reserve's own automated clearinghouse, which is linked to Banco de Mexico, the Mexican central bank." To use the service, "a Mexican need only possess a matricula consular, an I.D. issued by the Mexican consulate in most major US cities to those with proof of Mexican birth or citizenship, or a picture ID card issued by the US or another foreign government. T he idea is to make it cheaper and safer for Mexican workers to send funds to their relatives."

Illegals Stuck In Cross-Border Pipeline. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Marosi, 918K) reports, "More than a dozen illegal immigrants were briefly trapped inside a cross-border pipeline structure Tuesday after a man got stuck in the narrow passageway and had to be rescued by San Diego firefighters." The immigrants "were crawling through a passageway connecting a Mexican-based industrial gas supplier with a holding tank on the U.S. side, according to Lauren Mack, spokesperson for Immigration and Customs Enforcement." This is "believed to be the first time in the San Diego area that migrants have been caught using an existing subterranean passageway that appears to be privately owned."

TAX:

Many US Expatriates Face Tax Increase This Year. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, D1, Herman, Spencer) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "The US Treasury Department removed part of the sting from a recent law that boosted taxes for many Americans working overseas, but many US expatriates still are facing sharp tax increases this year. A new Treasury notice allows Americans to deduct or exclude from their US taxes more of the cost of housing in many foreign locations, where rents frequently are higher than in the US, than they otherwise would have. Accountants say this new relief varies widely from place to place. Still, the revised rule, announced by Treasury in a notice issued Friday, offsets only a fraction of the higher tax bills that many individuals must pay this year. Among those hit the hardest are Americans with relatively high incomes working in places with high housing costs and low taxes, such as Hong Kong, and whose employers don't protect them from the additional tax cost of working abroad."

Minister Fights To Preserve Religious-Based Tax Breaks. The New York Times (10/11, Henriques, 1.21M) reports that for thousands of ministers, the Rev. Rick Warren will be remembered "as their champion in a fight over the most valuable tax break available to ordained clergy members of all faiths: an exemption from federal taxes for most of the money they spend on housing, which typically represents roughly a third of their compensation. Pastor Warren argued that the tax break is essential to poorly paid clergy members who serve society." The housing deduction "is one of several tax breaks that leave extra money in the pockets of clergy members and their religious employers. Ministers of every faith are also exempt from income tax withholding and can opt out of Social Security. And every state but one exempts religious employers from paying state unemployment taxes -- reducing the employers' payroll expenses but also leaving their workers without unemployment benefits if they are laid off."

DOJ_NMG_0078781

Religious Activists Have Long Legislative Wish List. The New York Times (10/11, Henriques, 1.21M) reports that some "advocates for religious freedom" say "government must do more to protect religious institutions of all kinds from the hostile environment of modern America. A Congressional wish list supported by some religious leaders and other advocacy groups would accomplish that. One bill, H.R. 235, would exempt churches and other religious institutions — but not secular nonprofits — from the I.R.S. rule against partisan political endorsements by tax-exempt organizations." H.R. 27 "would grant religious employers even more leeway to discriminate on religious grounds in their hiring." H.R. 2679 would "prohibit the courts from awarding damages, lawyers' fees or costs to any plaintiff who successfully sues over possible violations of the establishment clause of the First Amendment." The Public Prayer Protection Act, H.R. 4364, "would protect the right of government officials 'to express their religious beliefs through public prayer' by barring federal courts, including the Supreme Court, from hearing lawsuits raising constitutional objections to those prayers." The Workplace Religious Freedom Act "would amend the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to require employers to be more accommodating to the religious observances of their employees." H.R. 1054, "would transform into law the executive orders that created President Bush's 'faith-based initiative,' to make federal grants and contracts more available to religious groups."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Warns Democrats Would Raise Taxes. The AP (10/11, Loven) reports President Bush "portrayed Democrats on Tuesday as the party of big spending and high taxes, aiming to give increasingly endangered Republicans an edge in a midterm election debate dominated recently by congressional scandal and overseas crises." Speaking at a fundraiser for former Georgia Republican Rep. Mac Collins, Bush said, "If you want to keep your tax cuts, vote Republican on Nov. 7." The AP adds Collins is "challenging Rep. Jim Marshall, seen as one of the most vulnerable Democratic incumbents." Bush said, "Do we keep taxes low so we can keep this economy growing? Or do we let the Democrats in Washington raise taxes and hurt the economic vitality of this country? ... This decision will have a huge impact on the working people all across the United States of America." The AP adds the "taxes-and-terrorism pillars of the GOP midterm election strategy, the mainstays of Bush's campaign-trail speeches, have been partially drowned out of late."

Rangel, Reid, Baucus Deny Democrats Have Plans To Boost Taxes On Middle Class. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (10/11), Rep. Charles Rangel says, "President Bush and Republican campaign committees have attacked Democrats with a claim that we would raise taxes if elected to a majority in Congress. That's not true. Democrats have a long history of supporting targeted relief for middle-income families. In fact, many of the tax benefits extended by this administration began as Democratic initiatives." Democrats "want to pursue new priorities to strengthen relief for middle-class families that have been left behind during the Bush administration."

In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (10/11), Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and Sen. Max Baucus say, "The president, the majority party in Congress, and now your editorial page are attempting to convince the American public that Democrats are intent on increasing their taxes. We find it curious that Democrats are being accused of planning to increase taxes on middle-income families when decisions made by the current majority have already done so. Those in charge of the Congress now deliberately chose not to extend middle-class tax relief -- such as the deductions for college tuition, state and local sales taxes, and teachers' out-of-pocket classroom expenses -- before Congress adjourned for the elections. And President Bush's fiscal year 2007 budget failed to include relief beyond 2006 from the increasingly middle-class Alternative Minimum Tax."

White House Touts Shrinking Budget Deficit. Under the headline "Painting A Rosy Budget Picture," the Washington Post (10/11, A6, Abramowitz, Baker, 748K) reports, "The federal budget deficit shrank from $318 billion to less than $260 billion in the fiscal year that concluded in September, officials disclosed yesterday. It marks the second year in a row that the deficit has declined after ballooning in the early years of the Bush administration." White House officials "hailed the improving short-term budget picture as a vindication of President Bush's tax-cutting agenda, though the long-term prospects are considerably bleaker, given the escalating costs of health-care and retirement programs and, in the view of many economists, the red ink produced by tax cuts." The President "will step up his efforts to tout the economy at a White House event Wednesday, when officials said he will announce that he has met his target of cutting the deficit in half over five years -- three years ahead of schedule." But Robert D. Reischauer, "former director of the Congressional Budget Office and now president of the Urban Institute, gave the tax cuts little credit because the economic effect of putting that money back into the economy was offset by the debt incurred from extra spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and relief from Hurricane Katrina." Reischauer "agreed that revenue is stronger than most observers expected. "But what we're seeing is the calm before the storm," he said. 'Everyone knows that the current revenue and spending structures taken together will be unsustainable as the baby-boom generation begins to enter its retirement years.'"

DOJ_NMG_0078782

In Fiscal 2006, Medicaid Saw Smallest Spending Boost In A Decade. The Washington Post (10/11, A3, Lee, 748K) reports, "Medicaid spending rose by 2.8 percent in fiscal 2006, the smallest increase in a decade, according to a study released yesterday by the nonprofit Kaiser Family Foundation." At the same time, "state tax revenue grew by 3.7 percent as the economy continued to improve, the survey of 50 states and their Medicaid directors found." The Post adds, "Together those trends signal that the state-federal program that pays for health care for the poor and disabled is emerging -- at least temporarily -- from a period in which many states limited eligibility, benefits and reimbursement rates for health-care services in a drive to corral costs. For 2007, only five states plan to restrict eligibility, while 26 indicated they will restore benefits, relax application and enrollment restrictions and undertake new outreach efforts."

DOE Says Most Home Heating Costs Will Drop This Winter. The Energy Department's report that natural gas home heating costs will be lower this winter received considerable coverage, almost all of it portraying the news in a positive light. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 8, Williams, 9.87M) reported that during "that horrible spike in energy prices" a "few months ago," a "whole lot of Americans were fearing this coming winter, but sharp drops in oil and natural gas prices combined with a mild winter forecast are bringing some good news on that front tonight." ABC World News (10/10, story 9, 2:15, Potter, 8.78M) said DOE "says if you use natural gas, you can expect to save $119 compared to last winter. Electric and oil heat should cost slightly more, but fewer Americans use them."

The Washington Post (10/11, D1, Tse, 748K) reports that "as consumers revel in plummeting gas prices," the report from DOE's Energy Information Administration "offered another pleasant surprise: lower heating bills this winter. For the first time since the 2001-02 season, natural gas bills are expected to drop by an average of 13 percent." But "consumers using other fuels won't fare as well, according to the report. Households heated by electricity are likely to see their bills increase by an average of 7 percent, or $58, because of the higher costs late last year for fuels for electricity generation and the loosening of caps on rates. People who use heating oil can expect to pay 6 percent, or $91, more this winter. Users of propane, however, can expect an average decrease of 1.1 percent, or $15, in their heating bills."

The New York Times/AP (10/11) reports EIA "based its predictions on its forecast of a mild winter for most of the nation and its assessment of energy supplies and costs as the nation's oil and natural gas production and refinery output recover from hurricane damage in 2005." USA Today (10/11, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) said that "although this winter is expected to be warmer than normal in most of the USA, it is still expected to be colder than last year, which was exceptionally mild."

The Washington Times (10/11, Hill, 88K) says economists said consumers "are set to enjoy an energy dividend just in time for the holidays." The Chicago Tribune (10/11, Manor, 623K) says "it is by no means a sure thing, but your heating bill this winter could be a bit more reasonable than last year." But in one of the few negative reports, the Houston Chronicle (10/11, Ivanovich, 535K) says that while consumers "are likely to get some relief in their heating bills this winter, they should still expect to pay substantially more than they did just two years ago. In fact, if the government's energy forecasters are correct, ratepayers will still be paying nearly 30 percent more this winter than they did on average between 2000 and 2005." The Los Angeles Times (10/11, 918K) and Bloomberg (10/10, Smith, Tuttle) run similar reports.

Administration's Effort To End Homelessness Said to Neglect Rural Areas. The New York Times (10/11, Archibold, 1.21M) reports that as the Bush Administration "promotes a widely praised multibillion-dollar effort to end chronic homelessness in cities like Washington and San Francisco, a growing outcry is rising from rural areas that worsening problems far away from urban centers are being overlooked." Rural homelessness "has always taken a back seat to the more glaring problems in cities. Most studies estimate homeless people in small towns account for about 9 percent of the 600,000 or so homeless nationwide." But local officials "and advocates for the homeless in small towns say that economic distress in recent years, including closing plants, failing farms, rising housing costs and other troubles, has left more people without homes and in greater need of help."

Defense Contractors Consider Murtha As Majority Leader. The Hill (10/11, Tiron) reports, "The defense industry is assessing the impact that Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) will have on its fortunes if the Democrats retake the House in the midterm election. ... some within the industry believe that Murtha could be the man with whom to hedge their bets." Murtha has paradoxically become "a vehement critic of a war that has boosted defense contractors' coffers, but also a staunch supporter of a military and defense industry fed on big-ticket programs and well-placed earmarks." Industry insiders ponder his behavior if he becomes majority leader or chair of the defense appropriations committee: "As a majority leader, Murtha would bring defense to the forefront and stave off cuts that the Democrats have traditionally made, some industry insiders say. In such a position, Murtha would determine how the budget is put together and the amendments that would come to the floor, but he would lose the day-to-day touch on the appropriations committee, which to the defense industry is more important, said an industry source."

DOJ_NMG_0078783

DeMint Expected To Head GOP Steering Committee. The Hill (10/11, Allen) reports Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) "is in line to take the reins of the Republican Steering Committee, a cabal that serves as the base for conservative activism in the upper chamber." The Steering Committee "would play a much different role in the institution if Republicans are cast into the minority. The secretive committee now seeks to pressure GOP leaders to adopt more conservative policies, but it once served to block the liberal priorities of a Democratic majority." DeMint, "chosen for the job through an informal process, is a fierce partisan warrior who has one foot in leadership circles and the other in conservative circles. That combination could make him an effective leader whether Republicans retain control of the Senate or not."

FAA Administrator Seeks To Strengthen Agency's Public Profile. Al Kamen in his "In the Loop" column in the Washington Post (10/11, A17, 748K) writes, "Federal Aviation Administration chief Marion C. Blakey worries that people have been confusing her agency with the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), or worse, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA)." So in September she "signed an order establishing the FAA 'Branding Identity Program' (FAABIP) to clarify matters. The FAA does so many wonderful things, she notes in a cover message to the order, 'but it has not received proper credit for all the good work it does in so many areas because it does not have a strong brand identity.'"

Stalled Postal Reform Bill Examined. Stephen Barr, in his "Federal Diary" column in the Washington Post (10/11, D4, 748K), writes that National Association of Letter Carriers president William Young feels "badly" about "blocking legislation to overhaul the U.S. Postal Service. But he emphasized that his union members were his highest priority, making it impossible for him to accept a provision that would single out injured postal employees for different worker compensation rules than other federal employees." He "said that he was trying to contact Sen. Susan Collins (R), the chief sponsor of a compromise bill, who is traveling in her home state of Maine, 'to determine where our communications failed.'" While "the bill has drawn little public attention, it represented a decade-long effort to revamp Postal Service business operations."

NYTimes Urges High Court To Uphold Ruling On Courtroom Photos. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M)in an editorial writes, "When Mathew Musladin went on trial for murder, members of the victim's family sat near the jury every day wearing buttons with the dead man's photograph. A federal appeals court held that those buttons in the courtroom deprived Mr. Musladin of a fair trial. The Supreme Court is hearing arguments in his case today. It should affirm the appeals court's ruling."

WPost Calls For Increasing Federal Funding For Education. The Washington Post (10/11, A18, 748K) in the seventh editorial in an occasional series on inequality writes, "Some commentators, pointing to the fact that schools in low-income districts already spend more per pupil than schools in affluent ones do, argue that failures at poor schools reflect complacent management rather than a lack of resources. Signaling at least partial acceptance of that theory, the Bush administration has tried to improve schools by holding them accountable and subjecting them to competition. Choice and accountability are attractive in principle, but studies of voucher programs in New York City, Milwaukee and Cleveland have found negligible gains from them. Costlier interventions must also be part of the solution." The Post argues for increasing spending on Head Start citing a "range of" studies that show "that high-quality programs have lasting effects on poor children. Upgrading the 900,000 children in Head Start programs to something like the Perry program might require around $2 billion a year, according to W. Steven Barnett of Rutgers University. But quality preschools reduce spending on special education, jails and welfare, saving money for society in the long term." The Post also argues for investing "in K-12 education directly. Although it's true that low-income districts already spend more per pupil than do rich ones, this slight advantage is swamped by the challenge of teaching poor children, who on average have more discipline problems and require more remedial attention -- and will continue to do so even if preschool is improved."

DOJ_NMG_0078784

OTHER NEWS:

Mortgage Debt Said To Color Voters' Perceptions Of The Economy. The Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Trumbull, 58K) reports the "health of the economy is the subject of a major clash in which voters are hearing starkly different views." Last week, President Bush said, "Today we got more good news," citing "lower unemployment, rising wages, and the creation of 6.6 million new jobs since August 2003." The Democratic National Committee "fired back in a statement" that "the Bush economy has been marked by falling wages and anemic job numbers that don't even keep up with population growth." The Monitor adds, "The numbers, shorn of partisan interpretation, point to an economy that is neither collapsing on its own weakness nor lifting all Americans to new heights of prosperity. In this climate, marked by the subsidence of an epic housing boom, personal debt may be the dividing line between those who are better off and those who are falling behind." It "could be especially tough on people who stretched to buy a home. A cooling real estate market means that rising home values have stopped adding to families' net worth, for now. Meanwhile, their monthly payments can jump by several hundred dollars as adjustable loan rates reset." This election cycle, Democrats "hope to capitalize on that edge of anxiety, the darker side of a housing-fueled economic expansion." Republicans, "struggling to maintain a majority in Congress and their governorships, are playing up brighter aspects of the economy, including a recent drop in energy prices."

Economy Taking Precedence Over Culture Issues In Ohio Gubernatorial Race. The Washington Post (10/11, A1, Fletcher, 748K) reports in a front page story that in the Ohio gubernatorial race, "The culture wars are being eclipsed as a voting issue by economic worries and Republican scandals that have altered the political dynamic here in striking ways. Several polls find" Republican Ken Blackwell "trailing his Democratic opponent, five-term Rep. Ted Strickland, by double digits with less than four weeks to go until the Nov. 7 midterm elections." The "difficulty Blackwell is experiencing winning support for his socially conservative message reflects the anxiety evident this year among voters in Ohio and elsewhere, some pollsters say." Strickland, "an ordained but non-practicing minister, has built his lead by speaking about the economic distress of this manufacturing state and by painting his opponent as a loyal soldier of a scandal-plagued Ohio Republican Party. At the same time, he is directly challenging Blackwell for values voters in ways that many analysts believe Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry did not two years ago."

Fed Governor Reconsiders Housing Slowdown. The Financial Times (10/11, Guha, Mackenzie) reports, "Influential voices inside and outside the Federal Reserve are challenging the notion that the US economy is heading for a deepening housing-led slowdown, cheering equity investors and sending bears in the bond market into retreat. The thesis, put forward by Fed vice-chairman Don Kohn last week, and endorsed by Alan Greenspan, the former Fed chairman on Friday, argues that the trough in housing market activity could be near, and that the economy should come through it in reasonable shape." Financial Times notes that while Kohn "argued that a sharp correction in construction activity and new home price inflation could soon bring down inventories and stabilise residential investment," "some experts" are "skeptical." For example, Fannie Mae chief economist David Berson "said inventories remained high, and there could be a significant decline in investor demand."

Falling Housing Prices Could Put Damper On Consumer Spending. In his column in the Washington Post (10/11, 748K), Robert J. Samuelson writes, "With fewer buyers, home construction, sales and prices have weakened. In August housing starts were 20 percent lower than a year earlier. Last year, sales of new and existing homes totaled almost 8.4 million; next year the NAR expects 7.4 million. Construction workers, real estate agents and mortgage bankers will lose jobs. Consumer spending will also suffer as the borrowing and buying against rising real estate values subsides." Seeing an "endgame" in the real estate market, Samuelson opines, "Even a leveling of home prices suggests that Americans will save more from current income and spend less. Up to a point, that's okay, especially if the lost spending is offset by higher exports and business investment. … Moody's Economy.com forecasts falling prices in 100 metro areas and an average decline of 3.5 percent next year -- the first annual drop since the Great Depression, says chief economist Mark Zandi. There's the endgame's true danger: If prices drop too much or too persistently, the damage to confidence and spending won't be easily neutralized."

S&P500 Firms Expected To Post 18th Consecutive Quarter Of Double-Digit Earnings Growth. USA Today (10/11, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Nothing, it seems, can slow the unprecedented boom in corporate earnings." Companies in "the Standard & Poor's 500 index on average are expected to post 14% higher profits in the third-quarter season, which unofficially kicked off Tuesday when Alcoa reported 86% higher profit of $537 million and biotech Genentech posted 58% higher profit of $568 million." If "earnings come in as expected, it'll be the 18th-consecutive quarter of double-digit earnings growth, S&P says. The unprecedented streak began just before the bear market ended four years ago this week and is a big reason the stock market has powered back, with the Dow Jones industrials on Tuesday closing at a new record of 11,867 and the S&P 500 setting another 5½-year high."

DOJ_NMG_0078785

Stock Markets Finish Higher As Oil Futures Continue To Fall. NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 6, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Turning to Wall Street today. Stocks turned slightly higher. They claimed another record. The Dow was up a little over 9 points [to close at 11,867.17]. NASDAQ was up almost 4 points [to close at 2,315.43]."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, C1, McKay, 2.03M) reports stocks "nudged higher, helped by cheaper crude oil but hobbled by falling bond prices." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "gained 9.36 points, or 0.1%, to finish at a new closing high of 11867.17, up 10.7% on the year. It was the fifth gain in six days." As has "often been the case in recent days, crude prices fluctuated amid shifting expectations about a possible production cut by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries." Traders "increasingly suspected that Saudi Arabia, OPEC's largest producer, opposes a cut. Crude futures for November delivery plummeted $1.44, or 2.4%, to $58.52 a barrel, off 4.1% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange." The "broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.2%, or 2.76 points, to 1353.42, up 8.4% on the year."

Exposure Of Foley's Internet Contact With Pages Included Effort By Democrats. The Washington Post (10/11, A4, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Two of the news media's sources of Mark Foley's sexually explicit instant messages to former House pages said this week that they came forward to expose the Florida congressman's actions, not to help the Democrats in the midterm elections." But there "are indications that Democrats spent months circulating five less insidious Foley e-mails to news organizations before they were finally published by ABC News late last month, which prompted the leaking of the more salacious instant messages. Harper's Magazine said yesterday that it obtained the five e-mails from a Democratic Party operative, albeit in May, long before the election season." The "most sexually explicit material -- the instant messages that forced Foley's abrupt resignation on Sept. 29 and turned his actions into a full-fledged scandal -- appears to be disconnected from politics. The two former pages who revealed the correspondence to ABC News and The Washington Post, however, may never have come forward had Democratic operatives not divulged the five more benign e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana boy."

Foley Scandal Said To Have Left GOP In "Disarray." The Financial Times (10/11, Yeager) reports Republican leaders "scrambled on Tuesday to contain the fallout from a Capitol Hill ethics scandal amid growing evidence that the episode, and deepening dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq, will lead voters to support Democrats in the next month's midterm elections." A Washington Post-ABC News poll "showed registered voters favoured Democratic candidates over Republican candidates in House races by 54 per cent to 41 per cent, an advantage matched in several other new studies of public opinion." GOP officials "had hoped to use the final month of campaigning to highlight Republicans' stance on national security. But the public appears to be increasingly displeased with President George W. Bush's handling of Iraq, with strong majorities saying the war was not worth fighting. At the same time, Republicans have been in disarray for 10 days, plagued by questions about the handling of explicit electronic messages sent by" former Rep. Mark Foley.

AFP (10/11, Raab) reports polls "out four weeks before US Election Day showed Democrats wielding a solid lead in the race to control the US Congress, sending Republicans who now control the legislature scrambling." Conservative commentator Bill Bennett "told the National Review," "Now is the time for all good men -- and women -- to come to the aid of the party." The AFP adds the GOP is "worried socially conservative voters may stay home."

Minnesota Voters Said To Be Interested In Substance, Not Washington Politics. The New York Times (10/11, Clemetson, 1.21M) reports that for residents of Anoka, Minnesota "interviewed here over two days at coffee shops and bars, schools and small businesses, on sidewalks and at kitchen tables, the topics that have had Washington hopping in the final weeks before the midterm elections — Congressional scandals, new books saying there was administration in-fighting over the war in Iraq — were little more than distant political chatter, best tuned out." The "conclusions drawn by Republicans and Democrats alike sounded a similar theme: People craved substance and not rhetoric, wanting to hear about the nuts and bolts of national issues like health care, local ones like a proposed light rail system and international concerns like a better strategy for the war in Iraq."

More Commentary. In a USA Today op-ed (10/11) titled "People Like Foley Are Gays' Worst Nightmare," novelist and playwright Steve Kluger says, "Thirty years ago, singer, former beauty queen and human being Anita Bryant sat before Florida's Dade County Metro Commission and demanded the repeal of the recently passed ordinance that prohibited discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation." From "the day he was sworn in as the representative from Florida's 16th District," all Foley "was missing was Bryant's hair. There was the matter of his very public Christianity, his endorsement of the so-called Defense of Marriage Act (which, incidentally, puts adult same-sex couples who wish to pledge lifelong fidelity into a category with national security threats), his authorship of numerous Internet restrictions to protect children from homosexuals and others online, and his repeated use of the word 'revolting' to describe rumors that he's gay. Then he became Bryant's worst nightmare. And ours, too."

DOJ_NMG_0078786

Rove's Fundraising For GOP Candidates Seen As Unprecedented. The Hill (10/11, Bolton) reports, "White House politico Karl Rove, whose legacy as a strategist hinges on Republicans' fate at the polls on Nov. 7, has raised more than $12 million for GOP candidates this election cycle." The "total is remarkable for a White House staffer, more than any aide has been known to raise before, and confirms Rove's place among the most celebrated strategists in American political history." Rove's "personal stake in the upcoming election is undeniable. If Republicans hang on to power, Rove's reputation as a political genius will be secure, say political observers. But if they lose, Republicans may look back at Rove's ambitious and unsuccessful efforts to reform Social Security and immigration policy with bitterness."

Democrats Hope To Take Advantage Of Dissatisfaction With Iraq War. CBS Evening News (10/10, story 9, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With the Congressional elections just four weeks away, our latest CBS News/'New York Times' poll shows a growing number of Americans say the Iraq war is the number one issue facing the country, far ahead of terror and the economy. Two out of three Americans polled say the war is going badly, and it's not just Democrats. 39% of Republicans agree. Against this backdrop, a number of Democratic candidates with real combat experience are fighting a new battle." Democratic candidate Patrick Murphy: "I'm an Iraq war veteran, Democrat running for Congress." Couric: "The Democratic party has high hopes for this group of Iraq war vets who are battling for congressional seats hoping the message voters are getting is this: We're against the war, but tough on national defense. And we have the medals to prove it."

Scholar Says Congress Failing It Its Oversight Role. The Washington Post (10/11, A17, Babington, 748K) in a Q& A with congressional scholars Thomas Mann and Norman Ornstein examines the problems with Congress, calling it "The Broken Branch." Asked about Congress' oversight role, Mann said, "It is striking, the extent to which the Republican majority in Congress deferred to the president in the face of one of the most aggressive and ambitious assertions of executive authority in American history. … They are now paying a political price for the policy consequences of their inattention. In Iraq, for example, it has meant flawed planning, poor implementation and no midcourse corrections."

Democrats Said To Need Support Of Rural Red State Voters To Flip Senate. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Brownstein, 918K) reports Democrat Claire McCaskill's "ability to win votes in rural Missouri may determine whether she topples" Republican Sen. Jim Talent. More broadly, "it probably will signal whether Democrats can overcome the principal obstacle in their drive for a Senate majority: The Republican dominance of Senate seats in states that President Bush carried in 2000 and 2004." To gain "the majority, Democrats must win at least four, and maybe more, GOP-held seats in red states such as Missouri. Recent polls have buoyed their hopes. Democrats are running about even with or slightly ahead of Republicans in each of the hotly contested red-state Senate races except Arizona's." From "disenchantment over the Iraq war to the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), a national tide may be gathering behind Democrats. But for Republicans, the red states loom as the sea wall against that force. Election day will decide whether discontent over the nation's direction overrides entrenched GOP advantages, especially among rural voters, in these culturally conservative states." In "all but one of the key red-state Senate races, rural voters constitute a larger share of the population than they do nationally (Arizona is the exception). And that means that to gain Senate seats, Democrats need to minimize the GOP edge among culturally conservative exurban and rural voters."

Many Democratic Candidates Taking Conservative Positions. The Washington Times (10/11, Hallow, 88K) reports that "across the South and Midwest," Democratic congressional candidates "from Illinois to Georgia are casting aside liberal loyalties to compete in conservative districts where they hope to gain the 15 seats needed for Democrats to take control of the House." National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) spokesman Jonathan Collegio said, "There are especially strong cases of 'blank slate' candidates with no voting records, trying to hedge on every issue -- in Pennsylvania, Illinois and Virginia, for example -- and other Democrats running like they're Republicans, in Georgia, Indiana and North Carolina." The Times adds the "reasons for the plethora of rightward-running Democratic candidates? Polls show Democrats will have a hard time winning in strong Republican and swing districts if they spout traditional Democratic positions." To "make a successful play for House control, Democrats have to win in Republican districts. But voter surveys consistently show that the national Democratic Party's liberal positions on taxes, abortion and other issues do not go down well in districts that supported Mr. Bush by 10 percentage points or more."

527 Groups Expected To Spend Over $300 Million On Midterm Election Ads. The New York Times (10/11, Broder, 1.21M) reports a "previously unknown group led by a Republican political consultant in Houston is financing television advertisements against nine Democratic House candidates from North Carolina to Arizona." The group, "Americans for Honesty on Issues, is spending more than $1 million on the advertisements, which accuse Democratic candidates of carpetbagging, coddling illegal immigrants, being soft on crime and advocating cutting off money for troops in Iraq." The group's ads "appear to be the first wave of a boatload of negative political advertising that will appear in the weeks before the Nov. 7 election. Many of the advertisements will be produced by independent organizations known as 527 groups, after the provision in the tax code that allows such groups to spend virtually unlimited sums on political activity as long as it is not formally coordinated with parties or candidates." The 527 groups "had raised nearly $200 million as of June 30, much of which appears to be available to be spent on pre-election activities. And if past trends hold, the total raised and spent by the groups on this election will surpass $300 million, eclipsing the $258 million spent by such groups in the last midterm election, in 2002." The leader "of Americans for Honesty on Issues is Sue Walden, a close ally of Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader who left Congress amid questions on ethics and fund-raising."

DOJ_NMG_0078787

Belated Agreements Over Turnout Plan Funding Could Make Difference For Democrats. The Hill (10/11, Kaplan) reports the "clash" between DNC chair Howard Dean and DCCC chief Rep. Rahm Emanuel "over how much money the national party would spend to help congressional Democrats ended last month. But the heart of the disagreement, whether the national party has identified new and drop-off voters, could determine whether the Democrats retake the House and Senate in November." Emanuel, "chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and Dean agreed last month that the Democratic National Committee would spend $2.6 million on GOTV efforts; Dean reportedly reached a deal Monday with Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, to direct $5 million to state parties to help Democratic Senate candidates." In the months "preceding these agreements, the DSCC and DCCC set up their own field programs, which is something the DNC would have done in the past, said several Democratic strategists." Referring to "voters who cast ballots in presidential years but not in off-year elections," Emanuel said, "Did they [the DNC] waste a year and a half not targeting drop-off voters? Yes." However, he added, "House Democratic candidates would be fine, because, 'It's not like we have slouches over there … they [the DCCC] know what they're doing.'" The Hill adds Emanuel "hired Michael Whouley and Jack Corrigan, longtime Democratic field operatives, to implement the DCCC's strategy. The committee has worked with 70 campaigns devising a field strategy; it is helping pay for field programs in several campaigns, said a senior Democratic aide."

DSCC Launches $1 Million Ad Campaign For Webb. The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (10/11, Germanotta) in an article titled "Democratic Senate Group Backs Webb In A Big Way" reports, "Forget about the polls, what really sends a message is money, and on Tuesday the Democratic Senate Caucus' political arm bought in big-time with an anti-George Allen ad." The Virginian Pilot notes, "The 30-second ad lumps together a number of anti-Allen charges" including "references to Allen's calling a Webb campaign worker of Indian descent 'macaca,'…as well as citations of stories that have emerged during the campaign about Allen not reporting stock options and of having used racial slurs while in college."

The AP (10/11, Lewis) reports the $950,000 DSCC ad "is among the largest yet in a race the latest polls indicate is tied or very close." In response "Allen's campaign quickly labeled the DSCC's ad as 'deceitful' and immediately sought to tie it to national Democrats, particularly New York Sen. Hillary Clinton." The DSCC ad "opens mocking Allen's appeal last week for restoring the campaign to issues" and "accuses him of voting against body armor for U.S. troops, favoring tax breaks for energy companies that gave his campaign $322,000, and voting to boost his own salary while opposing increases in the minimum wage." But "Allen's campaign released a list of rebuttals to each point, particularly the claim he opposed body armor for American troops."

Allen, Webb Trade Charges On Taxes. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports, "Taxes have moved to the forefront of Virginia's Senate race, with Republican Sen. George Allen accusing Democrat James Webb of plotting to raise taxes on millions of Virginians." The Post notes, "Allen made the allegations at the candidates' final debate Monday and is repeating them in a statewide television commercial. But the accusations are based almost entirely on Webb's support from national Democratic leaders and on two vague statements by Webb questioning whether Congress should make federal tax cuts permanent." And Webb "has angrily denied the charge and on Tuesday began airing a commercial defending his views. The Democrat's ad also examines Allen's voting history to accuse him of raising taxes on retirement savings, increasing the cost of tuition and giving tax breaks to oil companies. Webb also told reporters which tax cuts he would keep and what tax loopholes he would consider closing."

The Washington Times (10/11, Bellantoni, 88K) notes, "Virginia conservatives say an unrelenting focus on taxes will give" Allen "a win over" Webb. On "Monday night, Mr. Allen, a Republican, hammered Mr. Webb on taxes and yesterday kept up the attack. The Allen campaign Web site yesterday declared: 'Hillary Clinton gave James Webb Jr. 1,000,000 reasons to raise taxes on 3 million hard-working Virginians.'" And "Conservatives irritated with national Republicans on fiscal issues say Mr. Allen finally has landed on a winning strategy in the final weeks of the race, one of the hottest in the nation with the major candidates nearly tied in the polls."

DOJ_NMG_0078788

Allen Campaign Runs Ad In Support Of Gay Marriage Ban In Rural Areas. The AP (10/11, Lewis) notes the Allen campaign has also begun "airing a radio ad" costing $60,000 in rural areas "making his strongest link yet to groups supporting a referendum on the Nov. 7 statewide ballot that would write a ban on same-sex marriages or anything resembling it into the Virginia Constitution's Bill of Rights." The ad states, "There are those who would like to change the definition of marriage. Jim Webb is one of those people. … This Election Day you'll have an opportunity to stand up to the Jim Webbs of the world, to the people who want to weaken marriage."

Character Seen As Key Issue In Virginia Senate Race. The Washington Post (10/11, B1, Barnes, 748K) reports, "If Virginia voters want to pick their next U.S. senator based on issues, Democratic challenger James Webb and Republican incumbent George Allen give them plenty to work with. They disagree on taxes, the war in Iraq, support for the Bush administration, the deficit, how the government should fight terrorism, and a constitutional amendment aimed at same-sex marriage." Yet "if the character of the candidate is the deciding factor, Virginians are entering murkier territory." Democrats are worried Webb "is still an attractive resume in search of a campaign persona. His appearances on stage with Allen have been described by party professionals as feisty but chilly. And, strapped for cash, he was not able to introduce himself to voters on television before Allen put him on the defensive, especially with women, key voters for any Democratic candidate." Meanwhile Allen "has not looked comfortable defending his lead, which polls show may be down to almost nothing." During Monday's debate "neglected to mention his record of loyal support to President Bush. But he intoned the endorsement of Virginia's senior Republican, Sen. John W. Warner, who more regularly bucks his party's leadership, at least three times."

Ford, Corker Seek To Seek To Establish Independent Credentials. The AP (10/11, Rucker) reports, "Tennessee's U.S. Senate candidates traded caricatures during a debate Tuesday night that painted a grim choice for voters: rubber stamp or political insider." Democratic Rep. Harold Ford said, "If you want a rubber stamp, don't vote for me," while "Republican Bob Corker accused the Memphis congressman of being a Washington insider who benefited from the 'machine-style' politics of his politically connected family."

Poll Shows Lieberman Leading Lamont 48%-40%. The Hartford Courant (10/11, Pazniokas, 195K) reports Connecticut Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman leads Ned Lamont (D) "by eight percentage points" 48%-40% "in the Senate race, although a majority of voters agree with Lamont on the war in Iraq and the need for change in Washington, a Courant/University of Connecticut poll says." The survey conducted Oct. 4-9 "found that 60 percent of voters believe going to war was wrong, and a slim majority favors a deadline for withdrawal, issues Lamont used to defeat Lieberman in the Democratic primary." Yet Lieberman "enjoys a 57 percent approval rating and has managed to capture 67 percent of Republican vote, while keeping 35 percent of Democrats in his camp. Unaffiliated voters prefer him over Lamont 45-37 percent."

Lamont Contributes Additional $2 Million To His Campaign. The AP (10/11, Miga) reports, "Wealthy Democratic businessman Ned Lamont is pumping another $2 million of his personal fortune into his bid to unseat three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman, whom he trails in a recent statewide poll." He "has personally contributed $8,751,500 to his campaign." Both candidates "are spending heavily for TV ad campaigns as the fall race intensifies. Lamont has criticized Lieberman for missing Senate votes in a new commercial. One Lieberman ad receiving heavy air play accuses the Greenwich millionaire of lacking the experience to be an effective senator."

Trial Lawyer Pledges $5 Million To Jump Start Bell Bid For Texas Governor. The Washington Times (10/11, Aynesworth, 88K) reports Houston trial lawyer John O'Quinn's "huge political contribution" of $5 million "may tighten the Texas gubernatorial race in the final weeks." He "said yesterday he had donated $1 million and would give or raise an additional $4 million toward the campaign of Chris Bell, a Democrat challenging Gov. Rick Perry in the Nov. 7 election. The $5 million would be the largest single donation ever in a state race." While Texas Gov. Rick Perry and "independent challenger Carole Keeton Strayhorn have been spending heavily on television ads" Bell "and independent candidate Kinky Friedman have not had the campaign money to keep up the pace." But the "O'Quinn injection immediately energized the Bell campaign. Spokeswoman Heather Guntert said the Democrat already had placed more television ads in Houston and planned to buy heavily in other major markets this week."

Friedman Resists Calls By Democrats To Drop Campaign. The Dallas Morning News (10/11, Garrett, Jeffers, 500K) reports, "Democratic nominee Chris Bell is trying to persuade independent Kinky Friedman to quit the race for governor, but Mr. Friedman insisted Tuesday that he's in to stay." While "Bell campaign aides said that Mr. Friedman performed poorly in Friday night's candidate debate and that Friedman supporters have told the Democrat that they'd support him if he could persuade Mr. Friedman to step aside," Friedman "said of Mr. Bell and his advisers: 'They're desperate and scrambling.'" Yet "Bell's debate performance has won generally strong reviews, giving the Democrat hope he can emerge as the main challenger to Mr. Perry."

DOJ_NMG_0078789

Poll Show Crist With Ten Point Lead In Florida Governor's Race. Greg Pierce in his "Inside Politics" column in the Washington Times (10/11, 88K) notes, "Florida Attorney General Charlie Crist has a commanding lead over Democratic nominee Rep. Jim Davis in their race to replace Gov. Jeb Bush, a new poll shows." He "was backed by 53 percent of likely voters, compared with 43 percent who said they favored the Democratic congressman from Tampa, with 3 percent undecided." A "random telephone survey of 783 likely voters was taken between Oct. 3 and 8 by Quinnipiac (Conn.) University Polling Institute. Mr. Crist was favored by 50 percent to Mr. Davis' 39 percent in a larger sampling of 968 registered voters."

The Wall Street Journal (10/9, Schatz, 2.03M) in its "Washington Wire" column notes Crist's "lead wasn't exactly the worst news in the poll for Davis. A full 57% of the 968 registered Florida voters polled didn't know enough about him to form an opinion. What's worse, 54% of Democrats said they hadn't heard enough to know how they felt about him. Actually, that was an improvement for the five-term congressman. According to the poll, which has been taken every month since February, the percentage of respondents who hadn't heard enough about him dropped 20 points from the 74% to 77% range."

Taylor Benefited From Earmarks For District. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A1, Wilke, 2.03M) reports NC11 Rep. Charles Taylor (R), "wealthy businessman and banker, owns at least 14,000 acres of prime land in western North Carolina." So when he "steers federal dollars to his district, sometimes he helps himself, too." Last year, Taylor "added $11.4 million to a big federal transportation bill to widen U.S. Highway 19, the main road through Maggie Valley, a rural resort town in the Great Smoky Mountains. His companies own thousands of acres near the highway there and had already developed a subdivision called Maggie Valley Leisure Estates." Taylor also "got $3.8 million in federal funds for a park now being built in downtown Asheville with fountains, tree-shaded terraces and an open-air stage. It's directly in front of the Blue Ridge Savings Bank, flagship of his financial empire. He is among the richest congressmen with assets of at least $72 million, records show." Taylor is "one of at least a half-dozen House members whose public actions in directing special-interest spending known as earmarks have also benefited their private interests or those of business partners, according to congressional, corporate and real-estate records. Among them is a senior Democrat, Rep. Alan Mollohan of West Virginia."

Rural Areas Benefit From More Charitable Giving. The New York Times (10/11, Leonhardt, 1.21M) reports, "The economics of rural America have not really changed. If anything, the advantages that Chicago, Dallas, New York and other big cities have over Nebraska have only continued to grow." But the Nebraska city of "Ord has finally figured out how to fight back" with the help of charitable donations. For example the New Tithing Group "tries to persuade Americans to base their charitable giving on their assets as well as their income, given how many now have substantial assets." The Group has compiled a list ranking charitable efforts and "What is striking about the top of NewTithing's list is that it is dominated by a group of states that run from the Rockies through the Plains and down into the Southeast."

Stark Says Private Sector Not More Efficient Than Medicare On Prescription Drugs. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (10/11), Rep. Pete Stark says, "Your Oct. 4 editorial 'Markets and Medicare' implies that the private sector is more efficient than Medicare. Medicare trustees suggest the opposite, finding that administrative costs for the new prescription drug program's private drug plans average 12% -- six times Medicare's historic 2% ratio." Stark adds, "You also claim that 'competition' is responsible for a decline in the drug program's cost. But these reductions are primarily a result of a trend of lower drug spending that is unrelated to Medicare. And you allege that the Veterans Administration limits drug access. But the VA covers 16,000 prescription drugs on its formulary, and ensures access to other drugs when necessary. VA patient satisfaction is high and the VA negotiates price discounts far below those in Medicare's private plans."

As China Signals Support For Sanctions, Rice Says US Not Planning To Attack North Korea. North Korea's claimed nuclear test received heavy coverage last night and this morning, leading two network newscasts and receiving over 16 minutes of airtime amongst all three networks. Major papers also ran multiple stories, including front page stories. The New York Times (10/11, A1, Shanker, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that the United States did not intend to invade or attack North Korea, but she warned the North's leaders that they now risked sanctions 'unlike anything that they have faced before.'" She also "stressed that 'the diplomatic path is open' for the North, and that giving up its nuclear program would 'lead to all kinds of benefits for North Korea.'" China also said "that tough measures were in order, though its representatives said the punishments might not necessarily be the harsh ones that Washington was proposing." US Ambassador to the UN John R. Bolton, said, "I'm pleased by the positive nature of the discussions and look forward to more progress tomorrow." When "Asked if he would limit the American demands in the interests of speeding the process of drafting a resolution, he said: 'We want firmness and swiftness, and I think we can have both.'" Administration officials say that the US "is pursuing a two-track approach: trying at the United Nations to persuade other countries to cut off economic ties with the North, and using American banking laws to punish banks overseas that deal with North Korean companies." Still, "even as the administration sought to push tough language into a Security Council resolution, the White House expressed doubts about the capacity of North Korea's nuclear program, based on evidence that the reported test had a smaller yield than expected."

DOJ_NMG_0078790

Rice said on CNN's The Situation Room (10/10), "The United States of America doesn't have any intention to attack North Korea or to invade North Korea." Asked if the military option is not practical, Rice said, "The President never takes any of his options off the table. But the United States somehow in a provocative way trying to invade North Korea, it's just not the case."

NBC Nightly News (10/10, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "as talks continue at the United Nations, Secretary of State Rice may move up a trip to Asia, perhaps leaving within a week. Another sign of how seriously the US considers the North Korean threat."

On ABC World News (10/10, story 3, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M), Rice was shown saying, "We are going to get sanctions passed because we can't tolerate a nuclear North Korea. The important things here is that you're getting universal condemnation. … But I do believe we have the right configuration now, both to make an agreement stick, if we get one. But also to pressure the North Koreans to take a different course." She later added, "The Chinese have said they will take serious steps to deal with the North Korean problem. We're going to have a sanctions resolution in the Security Council. We'll see how the North Koreans react to that. It is important that our security alliances make very clear to the North Koreans that we will not permit a deterioration of the security environment in this region. We have many arrows in our quiver. And we'll start to use them."

CBS Evening News (10/10, story 2, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Rice. Asked about the possibility of one-on-one talks with North Korea, Rice said, "You have to ask yourself…why are the North Koreans so insistent that there be bilateral talks? It's because they don't want the pressure of having China and south Korea and Russia and Japan at the table, too. They would like nothing better than to have all of the pressure be on the United States to deliver a deal." Rice added, "Well, certainly, one of the great worries if North Korea were to continue down this path is that it would try to transfer a weapon to either another state or perhaps even more alarmingly, to a non-state actor, a terrorist. But the President's made very clear that North Korea would be held fully accountable for any effort to try to use weapons technologies to threaten the security interests of the United States and its allies, and certainly the transfer of these technologies would do precisely that."

The AP (10/11, Gearan) reports, "The White House contends that North Korea wants to set up a confrontation with the United States and direct talks would play to that hand. By insisting on talks only in the awkward company of four other nations, the argument goes, the United States deprives the North of the chance to play David to the US Goliath." Instead, "the North also has South Korea, Japan, China and Russia to answer to." Another AP dispatch (10/11, Riechmann) quotes US Ambassador Bolton saying, "This is the way North Korea typically negotiates by threat and intimidation. It's worked for them before. It won't work for them now.'" McClatchy (10/11, Strobel), in a story discussing the US stance on direct talks, says the Administration is "under fire for policies that have failed to stop North Korea from advancing its nuclear weapons arsenal."

Rice was asked on Fox News (10/10) what North Korea is trying to accomplish. Rice said, "Far be it from me to try to read the mind of Kim Jong Il and the North Koreans. I can tell you what they could have. They could have a situation, if they give up their nuclear weapons ambitions, in which there's an opening to the international system, in which they begin to have more normal relations with countries." The Secretary was also asked how susceptible North Korea is to further sanctions, "if the sanctions that have imposed already haven't done the trick." She said, "Part of the goal is to make sure that it is really the countries that have leverage that are a part of the effort to pressure North Korea into coming back to the talks. The United States has some leverage, but not nearly the leverage that China has, not nearly the leverage that South Korea has."

The Los Angeles Times (10/11, Spiegel, Miller, 918K) reports, "The sanctions demanded by US officials to punish North Korea for this week's weapons test are primarily aimed at what the Bush administration increasingly views as the greatest threat posed by North Korea: the spread of nuclear technology. On the high seas, the Pentagon has managed to track and even interdict weapons shipments coming out of North Korea. US spy planes, manned and unmanned, as well as naval ships have been able to keep close watch on cargo vessels leaving North Korean ports." But "as a result, North Korea has begun to avoid sending arms shipments by sea, government officials believe, sending cargo overland and by aircraft to the north, where they enter Chinese territory and become more difficult to follow, current and former US officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0078791

The Financial Times (10/11, Fidler) reports that a resolution that includes searching cargo ships "raises many practical and legal questions about how such inspections would be carried out. To work, it would almost certainly need the backing of China, not only in the Security Council but also as a practical matter because many of the sea lanes out of North Korea pass close to China." Also, "the likelihood is that any attempt to board a North Korean cargo ship would be refused and the interdiction force would have to contemplate shooting across the ship's bows and mounting an opposed boarding," which "would probably be interpreted by North Korea as a hostile act, potentially leading to a significant further escalation of tensions in the region."

China's apparent shift toward supporting sanctions is receiving ample media attention. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Blitzer) reported China "is signaling today that it may be willing to support some punishment of its ally, North Korea." In a front page article, the Washington Post (10/11, A1, Lynch, Fan, 748K) also reports that China "expressed a rare willingness to support U.N. sanctions against its ally North Korea, but it said any punitive action would have to be narrowly targeted at the country's ballistic missile and nuclear weapons programs." It "opposes any deadlines or trade restrictions that would undercut North Korea's struggling economy," and "insists that any resolution must exclude the possibility, however remote, that force could be used against North Korea." Still, "officials in Beijing faced criticism at home over their diplomatic strategy" of relying "on the now-stalled six-nation talks." Meanwhile, the US and Japan "continued to press the U.N. Security Council to support far stronger economic and trade measures that would permit international inspections of all North Korean cargo to search for weapons and to strangle Pyongyang's ability to finance its nuclear program," even as "the Bush administration sought to assuage fresh worries by its foreign counterparts that the tough strategy may cause hardship for the country's impoverished population or topple the government."

The Financial Times (10/11, Daniel, Fidler, Fifield, McGregor, Pilling, Turner) says China's position is an "apparent retreat from its long-standing opposition to international sanctions against Pyongyang." China's ambassador to the United Nations, Wang Guangya, "said a 13-point US proposal - which included inspections of cargo ships entering and leaving North Korea - provided a 'good basis for working'." North Korea's nuclear and missile tests are "seen in China as a demonstration of the failure of Beijing's strategy of playing a moderating role between North Korea, regional neighbours and the US." USA Today (10/11, MacLeod, 2.27M), the AP (10/11, Wadhams), AFP (10/11, Aziakou), Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Montlake, 58K) and Washington Times (10/11, Pisik, 88K) run similar assessments of China's stance on the crisis.

A number of reports also note South Korea's shift away from its "sunshine policy" toward the North. In an front page article, the Washington Post (10/11, A1, Faiola, Cho, 748K) reports, "Monday's reported test cast a sudden chill on North-South relations, stalling Seoul's financial incentives to the North," as "the biggest potential casualty of the announced test appears to be" South Korea's sunshine policy. While "South Korean officials say it is too early to declare that detente is dead," there are "changing sentiments across South Korea in the wake of Monday's purported test, which was something of a national wake-up call in a country where the perception of a North Korean threat had all but evaporated after years of detente." With "the most significant step to date, President Roh Moo Hyun -- who had become South Korea's leading voice for engagement -- effectively acknowledged on Monday that the sunshine policy had failed," and "the leading voices for detente here…express a profound sense of shock and betrayal. A number of them are calling for a complete review of the policy they had long held up as the cornerstone of Korea's eventual reunification." This "marks a radical shift in thinking in South Korea."

The Financial Times (10/11, Fifield) says that "with Monday's provocative nuclear test it has become patently clear that South Korea has gained next to nothing for its efforts." While some analysts "doubt South Korea will jeopardise its primary goal of maintaining stability," others say "that Seoul has little to lose from wielding a bigger stick."

In contrast, the New York Times (10/11, A8, Onishi, Fackler, 1.21M) reports, "South Korea and Japan, America's two major allies in this region, have grown increasingly apart in their attitudes and policies toward North Korea, even though President Roh Moo-hyun said Monday that the North's announcement of a nuclear test had put him on the same page as Japan's prime minister, Shinzo Abe," and "the calculations and interests that have led each country on its respective path have changed little." In interviews, South Koreans, "while expressing anger and disappointment, said they did not support the economic sanctions and other punitive measures sought by the United States and Japan, but called for continuing to engage the North, though with more sticks." By contrast, the Japanese "interviewed agreed that the country should take a firmer stance, both in punishing North Korea and in strengthening its own military."

US Experts Analyze North Korean Blast. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A4, Block, 2.03M) reports, "The US has marshaled a network of military aircraft, ships, seismic-listening posts, spy satellites and intelligence agents to glean as much as possible about North Korea's claim that it tested a nuclear device, and officials say they may have a good idea about what took place as soon as today." The objective "is to detect radioactive isotopes and gases released in the atmosphere, usually within 72 hours, after such a test. The presence or absence of these indicators will tell analysts if the device detonated underground Sunday was a nuclear weapon."

DOJ_NMG_0078792

The New York Times (10/11, Sanger, Broad, 1.21M) reports, "The White House seized on further evidence on Tuesday that North Korea's proclaimed nuclear test had resulted in a surprisingly small blast, questioning at one point whether the test was, in the end, 'a big deal event.'" The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, "appeared to backtrack from that assessment later in the day, as he turned from mounting a defense of the administration's troubled history with North Korea to arguing that the only logical response to the test was to impose harsh sanctions." The Times adds that officials "said that their current assessment was that North Korea had in fact detonated a nuclear device, and that they were discounting some reports that North Korea had staged a hoax, trying to disguise a large conventional explosion as a nuclear blast. 'The working assumption is that this was a nuclear explosion of some kind,' one intelligence official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. 'The conventional explosion theory doesn't make a hell of a lot of sense, even for the North Koreans.'" But "that left the mystery of why the explosion appeared to be so small, less than a kiloton, or a fraction of the explosions at Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945."

The Washington Post (10/11, A14, Linzer, Ricks, 748K) reports a "Defense Department official" said "there are multiple ways" the US government "will seek to verify North Korea's claim that it detonated a nuclear device, the official said. But there is no hard information yet, the official said. Intelligence analysts are also reviewing intercepted communications and other data." The official "declined to be quoted by name, saying that the Pentagon is not playing a lead role in the US response and that he wanted to defer to the White House." Tony Snow "said there is a 'remote possibility' that US intelligence will be unable to fully determine whether the test succeeded." The Washington Times (10/11, Curl, 88K) quotes Snow saying, "You could have something that is very old and off-the-shelf here as well, in which case they've dusted off something that is old and dormant."

USA Today (10/11, Vergano, 2.27M), under the headline "Even A Small Nuke Poses Big Threat," reports, "Some analysts, such as physicist David Albright of the Institute for Science and International Security, suggest that the North Koreans may have miniaturized a bomb to arm missile warheads."

Earthquake Led Japan To Suspect A Second Test. The AP (10/11, Freire) reports, "A strong earthquake in northern Japan on Wednesday may have led the Tokyo government to suspect that North Korea had conducted a second nuclear test." In Washington, White House spokesman Blair Jones "said US officials had not detected any evidence of additional North Korea testing. 'Japanese officials are now saying that this occurrence may be related to an earthquake in northern Japan,' Jones said." The AP adds, "A senior State Department official said the US would not be surprised if there were multiple tests, but so far there is no sign of one. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation." Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's spokesman "confirmed the government was checking whether the North had tested another nuclear device. Shortly after that, the Japanese meteorological agency said a strong earthquake with a preliminary magnitude of 6.0 shook northern Japan."

Abe Says Japan Will Keep Constitutional Nuclear Weapons Ban. The Washington Times (10/11, Sands, 88K) reports, "Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said yesterday that North Korea's claim it conducted a nuclear test will not affect his country's constitutional ban on developing nuclear weapons, but all of the North's neighbors face fundamental military and foreign policy questions in the wake of the test." Abe, "a hard-liner who has long pushed for a more assertive Japanese defense, told a parliamentary committee that fears in the region that Japan will seek a nuclear deterrent in response to North Korea's test are unfounded."

Crisis' Effect On Asian Stability Examined. The Christian Science Monitor (10/11, Grier, 58K) reports, "North Korea's apparent test of a nuclear device could have a devastating effect on the world's long struggle to contain the spread of the most powerful military weapon known to man. Experts have long worried that if the Pyongyang regime flaunted its atomic hardware, Asia might be drawn into an arms race reminiscent of the early days of the cold war. The spiral could develop like this: Threatened, Japan and South Korea start their own weapons programs. China piles up bombs to protect its regional superpower status. India strives to catch China, and then Pakistan tries to counter India, and then...." But "this nightmare scenario is far from inevitable, point out experts. Everything depends on what the US and other interested governments do to try to repair a nonproliferation system that, despite its faults, has served the globe well for decades."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A4, Fairclough, Ramstad, Soloman, 2.03M) reports that while "the prospect of regime change in Pyongyang may cheer many in Washington," such "turmoil in North Korea could damage the economies of China and South Korea, set off a refugee crisis and lead to military conflict." Therefore, "How the U.S. and Asia assess these risks could influence the outcome of Security Council meetings to decide how to respond." Today, "many North Korean officials view U.S. policies as wholly focused on removing Kim Jong Il," and some US officials who have worked on North Korea policy in recent years "say the Bush administration's approach has largely been driven by what they describe as President Bush's hatred of Mr. Kim, and not a comprehensive strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0078793

The New York Times (10/11, Greenlees, 1.21M) reports "military officials and analysts interviewed today said that the North closely watched conflicts elsewhere in the world, particularly the invasions of Iraq in 1991 and 2003, and saw that masses of tanks and artillery could be neutralized with ease by superior American military technology. So, methodically but with growing nervousness, the Communist regime sought a new trump card to maintain the security standoff on the peninsula."

Iran Seeks Distance From North Korea, Says It Opposes Nuclear Weapons. The Financial Times (10/11, Smyth) reports, "Iran on Tuesday distanced its own nuclear dispute from the North Korean crisis, reiterating its claim that it opposes nuclear weapons. While analysts abroad speculated that Tehran could be emboldened by North Korea's defiance, comments from officials and the media put the emphasis on the different paths taken by the two countries." Tehran, they stressed, "remained committed to the Nuclear non-Proliferation Treaty." Tehran "insists its nuclear experiments are designed for the production of energy but western governments suspect the Islamic Republic is intent on developing nuclear weapons."

The AP (10/11, Dareini) reports Iran also clamed "Washington for North Korea's reported test blast and vowing to keep developing its own suspect atomic program." Iran "appeared emboldened by North Korea's defiance as its hardline Islamic leaders pledged not to bow to international demands that Tehran suspend uranium enrichment."

Crisis Seen As Reducing Chances Senate Will Pass US-India Nuclear Deal. The Financial Times (10/11, Johnson) reports, "North Korea's nuclear test will reduce the chances of the Indo-US civilian nuclear energy agreement being passed by a lame duck session of the Senate in November and strengthen the non-proliferation lobby in the US, Indian security analysts warned on Tuesday." Bush "is expected to face renewed criticism that he is rewarding bad behaviour by allowing a resumption of civil nuclear trade and co-operation with India, despite its 1998 nuclear test and refusal to join the nuclear non-proliferation treaty."

More Commentary. Henry Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center, writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14, 2.03M), "For more than two decades, the US and its allies blinked at the regime's nuclear-weapons activities, even when they clearly violated international treaties Pyongyang had signed; bent the nuclear rules to accommodate North Korea's misbehavior; and groveled more than once before Pyongyang and Beijing to keep this duplicitous diplomacy afloat."

Thomas Friedman writes in his column in the New York Times (10/11, 1.21M) that "compared with the vast repression and nuclear standoff that characterized the cold war, the post-cold-war era has been much better for a lot of humanity. Too bad it's probably over." The new "era will be defined by three new features — if things continue as they are. First is a nuclear Asia, triggered by North Korea's flaunting of its nuclear weapons. … Second is a nuclear Middle East. … Third is a disintegrating Iraq in the heart of the Arab world, with its destabilizing impact on oil prices and terrorism." The current era "can be preserved only if Russia and China get over their ambivalence about U.S. power and if the Bush team gets over its ambivalence about Iran and North Korea." After all, "When an administration can't make up its mind between regime change and change of behavior, it gets neither. And that is what the Bush team has gotten." Still, while "we have to make up our minds, but so, too, must Moscow and Beijing." Their pressure can stop Iran and North Korea, but to do so, "They've got to start paying a price to preserve this world."

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K), "The United States and its allies must begin constructing a system that can succeed where the Non-Proliferation Treaty has failed. A terrorist nuclear bomb in Manhattan or Washington isn't a thriller writer's fantasy; it's a probability, unless America and its allies establish new rules for nuclear accountability that are clear and credible."

McCain Says Clinton Policies Set Stage For Current North Korean Situation. CNN's The Situation Room (10/10, Blitzer) reported, "Republican Senator John McCain today accused directly the Clinton administration of setting the stage for the current situation by rewarding North Korea's bad behavior." McCain was shown saying, "We had a carrot and no sticks policy that only encouraged bad behavior. When one carrot didn't work, we offered another. Now we are facing the consequences of the failed Clinton administration policies and we must stop at long last reinforcing failure with failure."

The Washington Post (10/11, A10, Babington, 748K) reports, "In what sounded to many Washington ears yesterday like an early shot in the 2008 presidential campaign," McCain "singled out Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) as he denounced the Clinton administration's policies toward North Korea." Said McCain, "I would remind Senator Clinton and other Democrats critical of Bush administration policies that the framework agreement her husband's administration negotiated was a failure." McCain spoke "in a speech near Detroit, where he was campaigning for a Republican Senate candidate." He added, "Every single time the Clinton administration warned the Koreans not to do something -- not to kick out the IAEA inspectors, not to remove the fuel rods from their reactor -- they did it. And they were rewarded every single time by the Clinton administration with further talks." The Post adds, "Aides said McCain was responding to Hillary Clinton's comments Monday, when she criticized North Korea for its announcement of having tested a nuclear weapon and added: 'Some of the reasons we are facing this dangerous situation is because of the failed policies of the Bush administration. I regret deeply their failure to deal with the threat posed by North Korea. And I hope that the administration will now adopt a much more effective response than what they have up until now.'"

DOJ_NMG_0078794

The AP (10/11, Karush) reports Sen. Clinton's spokesman "dismissed McCain's criticism and argued that it was time for a new policy from the president. 'Now is not the time to play politics of the most dangerous kind -- with our policy on North Korea,' Philippe Reines, spokesman for Clinton, said in a statement. 'History is clear that nothing the Bush administration has done has stopped the North Koreans from openly testing a nuclear weapon and presenting a new danger to the region of the world.'"

Parties Scramble For Political Edge In Wake Of North Korean Claim. Under the headline "Test Byproduct: Quick Scramble To Point Fingers," the New York Times (10/11, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports "McCain's attack was part of an increasingly bitter partisan row over who was responsible for allowing North Korea to achieve nuclear ability." Republicans "sought to focus attention on what they said was a misguided and naïve policy of negotiating with North Korea during the 1990's. Democrats pressed the argument that North Korea's claimed advance was a byproduct of President Bush's decision to wage war against Iraq, which proved not to have any banned weapons, while doing too little to confront a real threat developing in North Korea. … With polls showing Republicans having difficulty holding on to their traditional strength when it comes to which party is better suited to keeping Americans safe, the candidates and parties have moved quickly to take political advantage of the crisis."

NBC Nightly News (10/10, story 2, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The exchange was a sample of the national security debate likely to play out down the stretch of this congressional campaign. Democratic critics charge in the march to war against Saddam the White House ignored the growing threat from the North Korea." Kurt Campbell, Asia expert: "Behind the scenes, every country in Asia recognizes and knows that the United States at best, half-heartedly contemplated diplomacy with North Korea." NBC added that "the situation has worsened since Bush took office, and later vowed he would never tolerate a nuclear North Korea. Last summer, the Institute for Science and International Security estimated that North Korea's potential arsenal of nuclear weapon was four to 13 -- up from one or two in 2000. But Tony Snow argued it was 'silly to ask whether the President made mistakes in his approach to North Korea." Gregory: 'You don't think it's fair to ask for some accountability as to what happened and whether there were mistakes made?'" Tony Snow: "David, the accountability lies in North Korea, not in Washington." Gregory: "And now the White House argues, North Korea may be nuclear, but it's not necessarily lost, particularly, the White House says, since its Asian neighbors, namely China, are turning up the heat. Brian?"

AFP (10/11, Lozano) reports the White House "rebuffed criticism that failed US diplomacy led to North Korea's nuclear test, while downplaying the significance of Pyongyang's blast, which rattled the world." White House spokesman Tony Snow "branded criticism faulting the US approach for failing to bridge differences with North Korea, Iran and Iraq and leading to the world-stunning test announced by Pyongyang Monday as 'back-seat generalship.'" Said Snow, "What you have is the fact that the United States has been engaged actively on all three problems. ... We are continuing to work aggressively on diplomacy with the Iranians and with the North Koreans." Snow "responded to comments especially from opposition Democrats that the administration of President George W. Bush had taken the wrong approach to dealing with perceived global threats, as signified by the North Korean nuclear test, which came after years of attempts to convince Pyongyang to not develop a bomb."

The AP (10/11, Hennessey) reports that speaking in Boulder City, NV, "Sen. John Kerry said Tuesday that a nuclear test in North Korea is evidence of the Bush administration's 'failed policies,' and called for the U.S. to engage in direct talks with Pyongyang." Said Kerry, "The president attacks the place that has no weapons of mass destruction and does nothing about the place that does."

William Perry, Defense Secretary under Clinton, writes in today's Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K) says the North Korean test "demonstrates the total failure of the Bush administration's policy toward that country. For almost six years this policy has been a strange combination of harsh rhetoric and inaction. … Our government's inattention has allowed North Korea to establish a new and dangerous threat to the Asia-Pacific region. It is probably too late to reverse that damage, but serious attention to this problem can still limit the extent of the damage."

The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14, 2.03M) editorializes that the crisis "may also have finally settled the question of how much time this and future Administrations will have available to deal with genuine foreign policy crises before they become merely political. The answer, it seems, can be measured in milliseconds." The Journal adds that "it would help if just once public discourse on the subject did not instantly degrade into an exercise in cynical political point-scoring. Fat chance."

Writing in The Hill (10/11), Dick Morris says, "In one deadly moment, North Korea has succeeded in doing what no amount of backtracking by Speaker Dennis Hastert or his beleaguered Republicans could do: It has changed the subject of the national debate. With nuclear weapons in the hands of the most deranged regime in the world, e-mails to pages will have to fade from the forefront of the public's attention. … There is nothing like a national security crisis to force Americans to realize the consequences of paralyzing a presidency by sending to Washington a Congress with which he cannot work. We fell into just that trap in the final years of the Clinton presidency and we would do so now at our peril. But Bush has to produce and has to do it in the next five weeks. Just like JFK did in 1962."

DOJ_NMG_0078795

Rice Sidesteps Question On Whether Clinton's 1994 Agreement Was A Mistake. Rice was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (10/10) if she agrees with Sen. John McCain's comments blaming the Clinton administration for the missteps in dealing with North Korea in '93 and '94. Rice said, "There is no doubt that the North Koreans used the cover of the framework agreement to pursue a different path to a nuclear weapon through highly enriched uranium. There is no doubt that they did divert assistance. There is now doubt, also, that they got millions of dollars in assistance. But I don't want to get into the game of whether or not that was a mistake. We did sign the agreed framework. We went forward with it. We went forward with it on a bilateral basis, the United States and North Korea. Yes, there were some multilateral elements to pursuing the fuel through a consortium of states. But it was essentially bilateral. The United States and North Korea. And when they cheated, we had no one to stand with us and say to the North Koreans, you've cheated. And that's a problem not just for the United States but for China and for Japan and for Russia and South Korea. That's the difference in what President Bush has built."

Carter Says North Korea Won't Back Down Unless Its "Basic Demand" Is Met. Former President Jimmy Carter, in the New York Times (10/11, 1.21M), says "it is unlikely that the North Koreans will back down unless the United States meets" its "basic demand" for direct one-on-one talks with the US. He adds that "Washington's pledge of no direct talks could be finessed through secret discussions with a trusted emissary like former Secretary of State Jim Baker, who earlier this week said, 'It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies.'" Carter concludes, "What must be avoided is to leave a beleaguered nuclear nation convinced that it is permanently excluded from the international community, its existence threatened, its people suffering horrible deprivation and its hard-liners in total control of military and political policy."

Officials From Six Nations To Discuss Possible Sanctions On Iran. The AP (10/11, Schweid) reports, "Senior officials of the United States and five other nations plan to confer Wednesday on possible U.N. sanctions against Iran for processing uranium as part of its disputed nuclear program." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns and his counterparts in Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China "will confer by video about what should be on a U.N. sanctions list, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Tuesday."

Olmert Dismisses Syrian Peace Overtures. The AP (10/11, Nessman) reports, "Israel has brushed off the Syrian president's recent calls to restart peace talks as a ploy by Bashar Assad to deflect international pressure from his increasingly isolated regime." But "some in Israel say Prime Minister Ehud Olmert may be making a major mistake in ignoring even a slim chance to pursue peace with one of his country's most implacable enemies." Israeli Vice Premier Shimon Peres, meanwhile, "invited the Syrian leader to come to Jerusalem." The AP adds, "Israeli-Syrian peace talks broke down in 2000, with Syria demanding assurances it would get back all of the Golan Heights, which Israel captured in the 1967 Mideast War and later annexed. Israel wanted slight modifications to the pre-1967 line, conforming to the international frontier, and insisted that issues of security and normalization be spelled out first." Assad "has sporadically called for new talks, but his appeals grew more intense following this summer's war between Israel and Lebanon's Hezbollah guerrillas, which Syria backed."

Israel Fences Off Village That Extends Into Lebanon. The New York Times (10/11, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "Little more than a week after Israeli troops withdrew from Lebanon, the shiny new fence around the northern portion of" Ghajar "is a reminder of the possible flash points that remain." For the Lebanese, the fence, erected over the past several weeks to separate the northern side of the village from the rest of Lebanon, amounts to a new occupation of their territory," but "to Israel, which says the fence is only temporary, it is a means of ensuring that Hezbollah fighters do not enter the village, which straddles the border, and attack Israelis." The village began in Israel and expanded over the boarder during Israel's occupation. Once they withdrew, the village was divided into Lebanese and Israeli sides. "The Israelis have now posted troops within the northern section of the village. Lebanese officials say the continued presence of Israeli soldiers on Lebanese soil is a violation of United Nations Resolution 1701, which settled this summer's conflict." While "Hezbollah official…have remained mute on the issue of Ghajar, opting to allow the government to negotiate a diplomatic solution," a Hezbollah representative noted that "patience is growing thin."

Hamas Rejects Conditions For Unity Government. USA Today (10/11, 2.27M) reports, "Qatar's attempt to mediate a growing crisis in the Palestinian territories took a blow Tuesday when Hamas rejected demands that it recognize Israel and renounce violence as a prerequisite for forming a unity government with the Fatah Party." It was "the latest setback in efforts to moderate the Islamic militant group Hamas and restore much-needed international aid to the Palestinians."

DOJ_NMG_0078796

The Washington Post (10/11, A18, 748K) editorializes, "It's easy enough for global leaders to issue flowery appeals for action on the Middle East or to imply that progress would be possible if only the United States used its leverage with Israel. The stubborn reality is that there can be no movement toward peace until a Palestinian leadership appears that is ready to accept a two-state solution."

Bush Tells Peru's Garcia He Will Press For Trade Pact Approval. The AP (10/11) reports President George W. Bush Tuesday "assured Peruvian President Alan Garcia that he would work with US lawmakers to try to quickly push through a free trade agreement between the two countries." After meeting with Garcia, Bush told reporters, "The central issue facing us right now is the passage of a free trade agreement. I assured the president that I will work with Congress as soon as possible to get this agreement passed." Garcia "expressed satisfaction" with Bush's assurance, saying the pact would "help achieve stronger democratic institutions in Peru." The AP called the White House invitation "a demonstration of Administration support for the moderate policies Garcia espouses in contrast to leftist sentiment evident elsewhere on the continent."

LATimes Calls For Pact's Approval. The Los Angeles Times (10/11, 918K) editorializes that President Kennedy's program to develop Latin America called the Alliance for Progress "was invoked Tuesday by Peruvian President Alan Garcia during a news conference at the White House with President Bush," when he said "that the things the aid program failed to do in the 1960s, free trade could do today. Garcia is anxious over a free-trade pact that both the U.S. and Peru have signed but that has yet to be ratified by Congress" that replaces a previous trade pact. If, by the end of the year "the new pact isn't in place…thousands of Peruvian products will lose duty-free access to the U.S. market, which accounts for about 30% of Peru's exports." This "would be a disaster on many fronts," as the access helps "build diversified economies" that "lessen…reliance on coca." Also, "it will be playing into the hands of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and others trying to encourage the spread of anti-Americanism in the region." This "shouldn't be a tough decision by Congress, yet leaders have held up a vote until after the Nov. 7 election," but "Election-year politics should not be allowed to hijack this important trade deal."

Federal Taskforce To Pursue Cuba Sanctions Violators. The AP (10/11, Anderson) reports that in "the latest move by the Bush administration to tighten restrictions that were first imposed in the early 1960s and expanded frequently since," a new law enforcement task force "will aggressively pursue violators of the U.S. trade and travel sanctions that have been in effect against Cuba for more than four decades." It "includes the Treasury Department, FBI, and departments of Homeland Security and Commerce," and is intended to "bring greater emphasis to existing Cuba sanction enforcement efforts that are scattered among several federal agencies." It will "be coordinated by two senior prosecutors in Miami-based U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta's office." The move "comes about a month before U.S. elections in which Cuban-American voters in South Florida — most of them fervently anti-Castro — form an important Republican Party constituency."

Top Treasury Aide On China Quits. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A7, Phillips, 2.03M) reports, "Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's top China hand," Deborah Lehr, "quit just a month after coming aboard to run the Bush administration's new economic dialogue with Beijing." When Paulson "met with top Chinese officials, he had Ms. Lehr close by his side as a signal of her stature at Treasury and in the new two-way financial diplomacy." She "resigned for 'personal reasons,' not because of any disagreement over how the U.S. should approach China." Now the "task of organizing the strategic dialogue falls to Undersecretary for International Affairs Timothy Adams…and to former State Department aide Taiya Smith, the secretary's deputy chief of staff."

Libya Makes Deal With Nonprofit To Supply Its Schoolchildren With Laptops. The New York Times (10/11, Markoff, 1.21M) reports, "The government of Libya reached an agreement on Tuesday with One Laptop Per Child, a nonprofit United States group developing an inexpensive, educational laptop computer, with the goal of supplying machines to all 1.2 million Libyan schoolchildren by June of 2008." Conceived in 2005 by MIT computer researcher Nicholas Negroponte, the brother of the United States intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, "The project, which is intended to supply computers broadly to children in developing nations," already "reached tentative purchase agreements with Brazil, Argentina, Nigeria and Thailand, and has struck a manufacturing deal with Quanta Computer Inc., a Taiwanese computer maker."

Washington Gathering Pushes For Action On Uganda. The Washington Post (10/11, A13, Boustany, 748K) reports, "Donning yellow and orange T-shirts, 700 activists from across the country pressed legislators and Capitol Hill staffers yesterday on the need for high-level American involvement to bring peace to northern Uganda," as "A number of nonprofit civic groups participated in the two-day gathering." John Prendergast, a senior adviser to the International Crisis Group who has served in past U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0078797

administrations," said, "I think a deal" between the warring factions "is possible, but it won't happen unless the U.S. engages." He added, "The absence of the Bush administration from the talks is condemning millions of northern Ugandans to a fate little better than death." New Jersey Rep. Christopher H. Smith "said he was going to call Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to ask her to send an envoy to the Uganda peace talks."

Europe's "Centrists" Growing Concerned Over Islam. The New York Times (10/11, Bilefsky, Fisher, 1.21M) reports, "Europe appears to be crossing an invisible line regarding its Muslim minorities: more people in the political mainstream are arguing that Islam cannot be reconciled with European values." The Times adds "centrists" across Europe are "angry at terror attacks in the name of religion on a continent that has largely abandoned it, and disturbed that any criticism of Islam or Muslim immigration provokes threats of violence." Now "Europeans are discussing the limits of tolerance, the right with increasing stridency and the left with trepidation" as "those normally seen as moderates — ordinary people as well as politicians — are asking whether once unquestioned values of tolerance and multiculturalism should have limits." However, some "Muslims say this new mood is suddenly imposing expectations that never existed before that Muslims be exactly like their European hosts." Also, "the line between open criticism of another group or religion and bigotry can be a thin one, and many Muslims worry that it is being crossed more and more."

TV Producer Calls For Understanding Arab Side Of Issues. Souheila Al-Jadda, associate producer of a Peabody award-winning show, "Mosaic: World News from the Middle East," on Link TV, writes in an op-ed in USA Today (10/11, 2.27M) that "people in the Middle East don't hate us; in fact, most like our Western culture and its values. What they hate is our foreign policy," and "To win the confidence of people in the Arab world and have them accept Western values, U.S. foreign policy must reflect these values." There is "a new trend…emerging, with Western and Middle East news outlets planning to reach out to the other side and build bridges of understanding between their nations and people," and "To spare future generations further conflicts and wars, the world must support these modest attempts to bring differing opinions to new audiences. Ultimately, though, the will to engage in a global dialogue must be backed by a will to understand and a desire to change."

Arab, Muslim Activists Call On US To Support Arab Democracy. Radwan A. Masmoudi and Amr Hamzawy adapt an open letter to President Bush signed by 103 other Arab and Muslim activists and thinkers in Arab countries, Europe, the United States and elsewhere who have worked in support of democracy in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/11, A19, 748K), "As Arab and Muslim intellectuals and activists concerned about the promotion of democracy in our region, we call on America and its president to reaffirm -- in words and actions -- its commitment to sustained democratic reform in the Arab world" and "entreat America to do all it can to ensure that a small number of authoritarian rulers will not control the future of more than 300 million Arabs." Some in the United States are "worried by recent Islamist gains among voters in Palestine and Egypt." However, "there is no way to advance liberty without inclusion of all elements that are willing to abide by democratic rules and reject violence," and "Democratic participation is the only way to combat extremism and pressure all groups, including Islamists, to moderate their stance in order to maximize their share of the vote." While "democracy is not easily attained and must ultimately come from within," it also "can receive encouragement and support, both of which it badly needs today in Arab countries." When "Arab citizens are able to have their choice, they will choose democracy, freedom, peace and progress."

NYTimes Urges US To Support Ban's Proposed UN Reforms. The New York Times (10/11, 1.21M) editorializes, "This week the Security Council picked Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon of South Korea" to be Secretary General. "The United Nations is an essential organization for promoting American foreign policy goals and for achieving a fairer and more peaceful world. Yet the past few years have done serious damage," and "the single most ominous problem has been the sometimes hostile, sometimes aloof, but never constructively supportive attitude of the Bush administration." Secretary General Ban "cannot succeed without Washington's active cooperation, or without pushing through the reforms that fell short in the current term." He also needs "to cut back on obsolete study missions, layers of duplicative committees and sinecure staff positions that have piled up over decades without serious review. The United States strongly backed Mr. Ban's candidacy. If it supports Mr. Ban in doing his job, it would increase his chances for success."

WSJournal Urges Costa Rica To Implement Flat Tax. The Wall Street Journal (10/11, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "The first country in Latin America that institutes a flat-tax regime is going to make history for that region." Former Estonian Prime Minister Mart Laar was in "Costa Rica last month to explain the groundbreaking structural change in his own country that sparked a free-market revolution all over Eastern Europe," but "the Costa Rican government is already trying to close the door on Mr. Laar's ideas." Instead, it "is promising an alternate plan that, if" President Oscar Arias's "rhetoric is any guide, will almost certainly raise taxes." However, the flat tax is supported by the press, and Arias's proposal may not pass his Congress. "Costa Rica has a chance to transform the region. It should take it."

DOJ_NMG_0078798

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Democrats Aim At The Red."
"U.S. Fears Export Of Technology."
"O.C.'s 'Ring' Cycle Is Heaven For World's Opera Buffs."
"Two More Finalists Disclosed In Search For L.A. Schools Chief Job."
"Biologist Bushwhacks His Way To Court."
"U.S. Fears Export Of Technology."
"L.A. Liquor Store Owner Dares To Stand Up To Gangs."

USA Today:
"Against All Odds, Barbaro Perseveres."
"Report Skeptical Of Fraud At Polls."
"A Flunked Nuclear Test?"

New York Times:
"Rice Asserts U.S. Plans No Attack On North Korea."
"Instant Fallout For Politicians: Finger-Pointing."
"Religion-Based Tax Breaks: Housing To Paychecks To Books."
"3rd Iraq Death Has One Town Shaken To Core."
"Across Europe, Worries On Islam Spread To Center."
"Far From Big City, Hidden Toll Of Homelessness."

Washington Post:
"China Says It Will Back Sanctions On N. Korea."
"In Ohio, 'Values' Decline As Voting Issue."
"In Marine's Death, Clues To A Son's Life."
"North-South Relations Suffer A Sudden Chill."
"FBI Agents Still Lacking Arabic Skills."
"The Handwriting Is On The Wall."

Washington Times:
"China Hints Agreement On N. Korea."
"Winter Heating Likely To Cost Less."
"Islamic Center Files Suit On Checks."
"Fence Funding In Budget Just The Start."
"Hastert Vows To Fire Staff In Foley Cover-Up."
"Democrats Veer To The Right In Fight For House."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Fulton Jail Not Fixed, Judge Told."
"Consumers Warm Up To Lower Energy Costs."
"N. Korea Strains Chinese Support."
"Google Deal Makes YouTube Founders Giddy Millionaires."

Houston Chronicle:
"Council Divided On Wider Smoking Ban."
"Rains Bring Deadly Decision."
"Sanctions Target Sale Of Nuclear Technology."
"My, How Children's Museum Has Grown."
"'King Of The Apartment Business.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Amish School Shooting-Transcripts; School Violence Summit; North Korea Nuclear Test; Possible Asian Nuclear Arms Race; Explosions In Baghdad; Military Recruiting Goals Met; Russian Journalist Killed; Foley Investigation; Warmer Winter; Working Mothers.
CBS: North Korea Nuclear Test; Condoleezza Rice Interview; Black Market-Nuclear Weapon Sales; Amish School Shooting- 911 Transcripts; School Safety; Explosions In Baghdad; Russian Journalist Killed; Foley Investigation; Veteran Candidates; Wade Zinkle Opinion-Iraq; Child Wakes From Coma.
NBC: Nuclear Test Reaction; Political Reaction-North Korea; Explosions In Baghdad; Russian Journalist Killed; Foley Investigation; Stock Market; School Violence Summit; Heating Prices Drop; Not Able To Retire; Bump Flights; Kids Making Money.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: North Korea Nuke Test; Iraq-US Ammo Dump Explosion; Bush-School Safety Summit; Midwest-Cold Snap.
CBS: China-North Korea Nuke Test; Hastert-Foley Scandal; Amish School Shootings-911 Calls; Bush-School Safety Summit; MLB Playoffs.
NPR: Japan-Earthquake; UN-North Korea Nuke Test; Durbin-Iraq Comments; Amish School Shootings-911 Calls; Bush-School Safety Summit; Foley Scandal Investigation; Philippines-Bombings; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with the Commander in Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Oval Office; meets with the President of the Southern Baptist Convention, Oval Office; speaks on the budget and the economy, Room 450, Eisenhower EOB.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Steve Chabot for Congress luncheon, Cincinnati Museum Center at Union Terminal, Cincinnati; participates in a Helping America's Youth event, Knoxville, Tenn.; speaks at a Bob Corker for

DOJ_NMG_0078799

Senate and Tennessee Republican Party reception, Knoxville.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRIME MINISTER GEIR HAARDE OF ICELAND _ Highlights: 4:30 p.m. Speaks at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies on U.S.-Iceland relations and future defense arrangements. room 500, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. Nw.

ARMY ASSOCIATION _ The Association of the United States Army holds its 2006 Annual Meeting & Exposition. Highlights: 11:30 a.m. Sustaining member reception/luncheon. Speaker: Kenneth J. Krieg, under secretary of defense for acquisition, technology and logistics, 12 p.m. Army Civilian Luncheon. Speaker: Under Secretary of the Army Pete Geren. 6 p.m. George C. Marshall Memorial Reception and Dinner. Marshall Medal receipient is former Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H. Location: Washington Convention Center.

BIOSCIENCE _ 8:30 a.m. 2006 Mid-Atlantic Bio: The Conference for Industry and Investors, the 2nd annual regional biotechnology forum. Highlights: 10:15 a.m. Plenary Session - Keynote Address. Keynote Address by Anthony S. Fauci, M.D., Director, NIAID, National Institutes of Health. Contacts: Alicia Moran, 703-739-2424 ext 110.

SCIENCE DEBATES _ 8:15 a.m. The American Association for the Advancement of Science holds a seminar to discuss how scientists, political strategists, reporters and others define science in debates over global warming, stem cells and other issues. Location: AAAS Auditorium, 1200 New York Ave. NW.

RUSSIA-GEORGIA _ 8:30 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a discussion with Russian experts discussing the situation in Georgia. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PUBLIC OPINION _ 8:45 a.m. The Chicago Council on Global Affairs, others, releases its 2006 Public Opinion Survey revealing important similarities and differences between public attitudes in the United States, China and India with regard to foreign policy priorities. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

CHINA _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a conference on expanding and improving interaction between U.S. and Chinese policy communities. Location: 4th floor conference room, 1800 K St. NW.

TRADE PREFERENCES _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. WITA hosts an off-the-record Insider panel discussion of the prospects for renewal of the Generalized System of Preferecnes (GSP) Program. Speakers include: Laura Baughman, Coalition for GSP and President, The Trade Partnership; Angela Ellard, Staff Director and Trade Counsel (Republican), House Ways and Means; Tim Reif, Chief Trade Counsel (Democrat), House Ways and Means. Location: Horizon Ballroom, ground level, Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

GLOBAL THREATS _ 10 a.m. The Brookings Institution holds a briefing to release the findings of a report on the use of force to confront the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, terrorism and grave humanitarian crises. Participants include James Steinbert of the University of Texas, former Botswana Amb. Alfred Dube, others. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN _ 10 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich holds a briefing on the threat of war against Iran, with former nuclear weapons inspector David Kay, Joseph Cirincione at the Center for American Progress, President Trita Parsi of the National Iranian American Council, others. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

BASHAM-HOMELAND SECURITY _ 11 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce hosts a trade security business forum with Commissioner W. Ralph Basham, Customs and Border Protection, U.S. Department of Homeland Security. Basham will address the broader business community for the first time in his new role, and will discuss top issues affecting homeland security today. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, 1615 H St. NW.

NORTH KOREA _ 11 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a briefing regarding North Koreas nuclear test and associated issues. Location: B-1-B conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

ENVIRONMENTAL SCORECARD _ 12 p.m. The League of Conservation Voters holds a news conference to release its 2006 National Environmental Scorecard. Location: LCV offices, Suite 800, 1920 L St. NW.

HURRICANES-CLIMATE CHANGE _ 12 p.m. The Washington Roundtable on Science and Public Policy hosts a presentation on ``Hurricanes and Climate Change: Assessing the Linkages Following the 2006 Season," with Dr. William Gray, Colorado State University. Location: Capitol Hill Club, 300 First St. SE.

HEALTHCARE _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Former Senator John Breaux joins David Kendall, Senior Fellow for Health Policy and Director of the Health Priorities Project, Progressive Policy Institute; Peter Pitts, Director of the Center for Medicine in the Public Interest; and Professor James A. Thurber, Director, Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies, American University for a lunch forum as part of Breaux's ``Ceasefire on Health Care" campaign. Location: American University, Butler Ballroom, Butler Pavilion, 6th floor.

HEALTHCARE _ 12:15 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform co-sponsor a luncheon briefing, ``Measuring up: A Comprehensive Scorecard for America's Health System." A new assessment by Commonwealth finds that deficiencies in the nations health care system cost 100,000 to 150,000 lives and $50 to $100 billion annually. Panelists: Cathy Schoen, The Commonwealth Fund and Tom Miller, American Enterprise Institute. Senior congressional staff members will be on hand to react to panelist presentations. Ed Howard of the Alliance and Steve Schoenbaum of Commonwealth will moderate. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0078800

VOTER SURVEY _ 1:30 p.m. The Civil Society Institute holds a telephone briefing to release a survey of likely voters who are ``red, white and green." Notes: Callin number: 800-860-2442; passcode: ``red, white and green voter survey."

IRAQ-REID _ 2:15 p.m. Sen. Jack Reid holds a news conference on his trip to Iraq. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

IRAQ _ 6 p.m. George Washington University's Public Diplomacy Institute will host ``Anatomy of a Failure: What Went Wrong in Iraq?" featuring Washington Post reporters Tom Ricks and Rajiv Chandresakaran, who have both recently written books on the subject. The forum will be followed by a book signing for both authors. Location: George Washington University Law School, LL102, Lerner Hall Lower Level, 2000 H St. NW.

MILITARY COMMISSIONS _ 7 p.m. Georgetown University holds a panel discussion on the Military Commissions Act of 2006, with university faculty. Location: Bunn Center Auditorium, on campus.

US-PALESTINE _ 7 p.m. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will deliver the keynote speech at the American Task Force on Palestine Inaugural Gala. Other participants include Prince Turki al-Faisal, Ambassador of Saudi Arabia; Ambassador Afif Safiyeh, Head of the PLO Mission to the U.S.; Sens. Carl Levin and John Sununu. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, October 11, 2006 8:09 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, October 11, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061011.pdf; dojclips061011.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

N.Y. Mosque Leaders Found Guilty (AP) 6
Terror Trial Verdict Reached (ALBANYTU) 6
Verdict Reached In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9) 7
Jury Convicts 2 Albany Men In Missile Plot (NYT) 7
FBI Agents Still Lacking Arabic Skills (WP) 9
The Cost Of Doing Your Duty (NYT) 10

Homeland Response:

Why Tariq Ramadan Lost (WT) 11
Congress Gives DHS Six Months To Revise Terrorist Watch Lists (GovExec/CD) 12
Katrina-Related Brawl With State Farm Heats Up (LAW) 13

War News:

Baghdad Blasts Kill 17; Dozens Of Bodies Found (NYT) 14
Bomb Kills 11 At Baghdad Bakery (USAT) 15
Bombing At Iraq Bakery Kills At Least 11 (AP) 15
Fire Erupts At U.S. Ammo Dump In Iraq (AP) 17
U.S. Ammo Dump Explodes In Baghdad (MCT) 17
Explosions Rock Baghdad As US Arms Dump Catches Fire (AFP) 18
Under U.S. Patrol, Once-Tough District Revives (LAT) 18
Study Estimates 600,000 Iraqis Dead By Violence (USAT) 20
Iraqi Death Toll Exceeds 600,000, Study Estimates (WSJ) 21
Iraqi Dead May Total 600,000, Study Says (NYT) 22
Study Claims Iraq's 'Excess' Death Toll Has Reached 655,000 (WP) 23
3 U.S. Marines, 2 Soldiers Die In Iraq (AP) 25
U.S. Troops Often Need Iraqi Approval To Act (USAT) 25
DNA Shows Dead Man Was Al-Qaida Militant (AP) 26
GOP Senator Wants Iraq War Policy Change (AP-Y) 26
Iraqi Airport Hopes To Land Tourists, NASA (WP) 27
Enlistment Success Story (WSJ) 27
Data Suggests Vast Costs Loom In Disability Claims (NYT) 28
3rd Iraq Death Has One Town Shaken To Core (NYT) 29
In Marine's Death, Clues To A Son's Life (WP) 30
Chief Of The Army Says U.S. Needs Consensus To Combat Terrorism (MCT) 33

Corporate Scandals:

Bed Bath & Beyond Admits Extensive Options Backdating (WSJ) 34
Bed Bath & Beyond Ends Internal Probe (AP) 35
2 Ex-Comverse Execs In Plea Discussions (HC) 35
Subway Series Alive After All: The Legal One (WSJ) 36
Skilling Asks Judge To Overturn Conviction (BLOOM) 38
Third Trial Begins For Former Cendant Exec (USAT) 38
Buffett Waves Ethical Vigilance Flag (WP/AP) 39
The H-P Investigation (WSJ) 40
H.P. Could Be A Finger-Pointing Case (NYT) 41
Three Investigators In HP Scandal Arraigned In California (AP) 43
How Carly Lost Her Gender Groove (NYT) 45
Black Ordered Not To Sell Wife's $2.9M Diamond Ring (TORSTAR) 46

Criminal Law:

Bush Calls For Help In School Shootings (AP-Y) 46
Conference Addresses School Shootings (WP) 47
Summit On School Safety Focuses On Collaboration (USAT) 48
Bush Emphasizes Local, Private Role In Ending School Violence (NYT) 49
No Single Answer To School Violence, Bush Says (MJS) 49
Turn Anguish To Action, Bush Says (BSUN) 51
President Tackles School Safety (LAT) 52
Bush Summit On School Violence Begins (GANNETT) 53
Bush, Others Hear Ideas On School Safety (RTD) 54
Conference On School Safety Ends With Call For Focus On Character (MCT) 54
Compassion, Not Laws (DENP) 55

Prevent School Violence, Bush Tells Conference (HC) 56
Helping Kids Fight School Violence (NSDY) 57
Bush Advocates Volunteers For Schools (PPG) 58
Guns Are In Schools But Not In The President's Vocabulary (WP) 59
Apparent Prank Puts Castro Valley High On Lockdown (CCT) 60
Student Safety (SLT) 61
911 Transcripts Are Released In Amish School Shooting; Killer Was Calm (NYT) 62
Pa. Schoolhouse Gunman Made Demand, Began Firing (WP/AP) 64
PA. Gunman Intent On Massacre, 911 Tapes Show (USAT) 64
First Lady Lauds Sisters (LANNP) 65
GOP Employee Seen As Key To Foley Timetable Investigation (CHIT) 65
Doubt Is Raised About Foley As Secret Drinker (HILL) 67
Staff Heads Would Roll For Foley Cover Ups (LAT) 68
Hastert Says Fire Anyone Who 'covered' For Foley (USAT) ... 70
Hastert Vows To Fire Aides If A Cover-Up Is Discovered (NYT) 71
Hastert Expresses Faith In Staff As FBI Questions Former Page (WP) 71
Hastert Vows To Fire Staff In Foley Cover-up (WT) 72
Prominent Democrats Refrain From Calling For Hastert's Ouster (HILL) 73
Hastert Meets With Critic Over Scandal (AP-Y) 75
Hastert's Great Listening Skills (HILL) 75
Kolbe Says He Warned Of Foley Years Ago (AP-Y) 77
Earlier Warning About Foley Emails Is Confirmed (WSJ) 78
Retiring Kolbe In Spotlight (AP-Y) 79
AP Exclusive: Records Suggest Abramoff, Pombo Lobbying Contacts (AP) 80
Judge Orders Government To Respond To Siegelman Evidence Preservation Order (WSFA-TV) 81
Death Penalty Sought In Puerto Rico Case (AP) 82
Supreme Court Considers Indictment Flaws (AP) 82
Pilot Didn't Kill Wales, Lawyer Says (SEAPI) 83
FBI Investigating Actions Of Specter Staff Member (USAT) ... 84
FBI Eyed Specter $$ Reports In Probe Of Aide (PHI) 85
Specter: FBI Reviewed His Report On Lobbying Ties (PHI) .. 86
Ney, Still Collecting Federal Salary, To Appear In Court This Week (HILL) 86
Malvo Pleads Guilty To Montgomery Slayings (WP) 87
Malvo Pleads Guilty To 6 Sniper Killings (WT) 89
Malvo's Lawyers Seek Plea Deal (BSUN) 90
Attorney: Sniper Seeking Deal For Life In Federal Prison (FINDLAW/AP) 91
Wecht Corruption Trial Postponed (PTR) 92
Wecht Trial Delayed While Attorneys Wait For Appeals Court Ruling (AP) 93
Colma Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Corruption (BCNW) 93
Figure In Pay-to-play Scandal Sentenced To Probation (PHI) 94
Passwords Jump-started Fumo Probe (PHI) 94
Federal Prosecutors Start Special Child Porn Fight (SLPD) .. 95
Former LA Sergeant Charged With Abusive Sexual Contact (MHCA) 96
Ex-Reporter Appears In Court To Face Sex Count (LAT) 96
Aviation Debate Centers On Use Of Criminal Probes (USAT) 97
Assault Charge Against Miller Dropped For Lack Of Evidence (WP) 98
Don't Scrimp On Care, Prosecutor Warns Nursing Homes (SLPD) 99
Woman's Property Eyed In Probe Of Prostitution Case (WT) 100
Islamic Center Files Suit On Checks (WT) 101
Suspect Held In Triple Slaying (CHIT) 102
Gang Member Accused Of Shooting 3 Year Old Caught (LAT) 102
L.A. Liquor Store Owner Dares To Stand Up To Gangs (LAT) 103
Three Men Charged In Robbery, Slaying (WP) 105

Civil Law:

Oracle Agrees To Pay $98.5 Million To Settle Suit Over GSA Contracts (WSJ) 106
Oracle Settles Price-Gouging Claim (WP) 106
Oracle To Pay $99 Million Settlement (AP) 107
Oracle Agrees To Pay U.S. $98 Million (CNET) 107
Oracle Agrees To Pay $98M For 'defective Pricing' (CNN) .. 108
Oracle Settles Government Claim Of Overcharging By PeopleSoft (MRKTWTCH) 108
Justices Back Small Tobacco Firms (WSJ) 109
Supreme Court Rejects Appeal On Tobacco Escrow Ruling (DOW) 109
Supreme Court Won't Hear Tobacco Case (AP) 110
Inside The Beltway (WT) 111
Officials Challenge AIDS Funding Ruling (AP) 111

Civil Rights:

U.S. Says Blacks In Mississippi Suppress White Vote (NYT) 111
SC GOP, Democrats Agree To No Crossover Voting In '08 Primaries (AP) 113

DOJ_NMG_0078804

Report Skeptical Of Fraud At Polls (USAT) 114
New Voter Registration Laws Keep Thousands Off The Rolls (USAT) 114
Supreme Court Rejects Gay Marriage, Abortion Cases (LAW/AP) 115
Giving Up Too Much On Choice (WP) 116
Report Alleges Bias By A Real Estate Giant (NYT) 117
300 Million (NYT) 118

Antitrust:

AT&T-BellSouth Merger Expected To Get OK (AP) 118
AT&T's BellSouth Purchase To Get Antitrust Approval, People Say (BLOOM) 119
Justice Near OK Of AT&T-BellSouth Deal With No Restrictions (USAT) 119
AT&T, BellSouth Expected To Clear Merger Review (WSJ) 120
Microsoft Helped Utah Company Finance Legal Battle Over Linux, Investor Says In Court Filing (AP) 120
Buyout Firms Get Antitrust Inquiries, Person Says (Update2) (BLOOM) 121
Buy-out Groups To Face Inquiry (FT) 122
Equity Deals Attract Eye Of Justice (NYT) 123
Probe Brings 'Club Deals' To Fore (WSJ) 124
Judge Delivers Split Ruling In Cell Phone Technology Case (AP) 126
Qualcomm Averts Sanction In Broadcom Chip Spat (WSJ) . 126
High Court Hears Case Pitting Telecoms Against Pay-Phone Providers (AP) 127
Poor Reception After Sprint And Nextel Merge, Customers And Executives Leave (WSJ) 128
Texas Pacific, AXA To Buy 60% Of France's TDF (WSJ) 130
Dot-Com Boom Echoed In Deal To Buy YouTube (NYT) 131
YouTubers Ponder Google (WP) 133
Yahoo Feels Breath On Neck (NYT) 134
MySpace Seeks A Wider Relationship With YouTube Victor, Google (WSJ) 136

Environment:

No E. Coli In Calif. Lettuce, Company Says (WP/AP) 137
Set Guidelines For E. Coli (LAT) 138
Courts Mow Down Development Strategy (USAT) 138
Copper Plant Illegally Burned Hazardous Waste, E.P.A. Says (NYT) 139
Cleaner Diesel Fuel Is Set To Pump (WSJ) 141
Low-Sulfur Diesel Fuel Is Reaching Market (NYT) 142
Biologist Bushwhacks His Way To Court (LAT) 143
Firm Must Pay Asbestos Costs (LAT) 145
W.R. Grace Must Pay EPA Cleanup Bill (BSUN) 146
High Court Rejects Cleanup Costs Case (AP) 146
Congress Acts To Clean Up The Ocean (CSM) 148

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Police Officer Among 6 Charged In Drug Sting (SLPD) 149
Hillsdale Police Sergeant, Five Others Indicted On Drug Charges (SLBIZ) 150
ACROSS MISSOURI (KCS) 151
Online Pill Sales Lead To Arrests (BSUN) 151
Armas Bond Hearing Today (RNT) 153
Border Crossing Goes Awry When Man Gets Stuck In Tunnel Exit (SDUT) 153
Ariz. Pair Resigns Pot Church Leadership (AP) 154
Trial Of Senior Colombian Rebel To Start Thursday In US (AP) 155
Colombian Guerrilla Fighter Goes To Trial In US (PRENSAL) 156
ATF, Police Team Up To Get Guns Off New Orleans Streets (AP) 157
Lawyer Receives Six Months In Prison (CHASGAZ) 157
More Than Three Dozen Gang Leaders Arrested (SEATIMES) 159

Immigration:

Ex-Nazi May Be Deported From Michigan (MCT) 159
Supreme Court Turns Down Case Of Former Guard At Nazi Slave Camp (AP) 160
Ex-Nazi May Be Deported (DEN) 160
Judge Asked To Free Immigrant Detainees (AP) 160
Bush Mum On Immigration As GOP Candidates Vow To Be Tough (WT) 161
Fence Funding In Budget Just The Start (WT) 162
U.S. Banks Woo Migrants, Legal Or Otherwise (WSJ) 163
Illegal Immigrants Become Stuck In Pipeline (LAT) 165

Tax:

U.S. Expatriates Puzzle Over New Tax Rule (WSJ) 165
Religion-Based Tax Breaks: Housing To Paychecks To Books (NYT) 167
In The Congressional Hopper: A Long Wish List Of Special Benefits And Exemptions (NYT) 171

Congress-Administration:

Bush Says Democrats Would Raise Taxes (AP-Y) 173
Dangerous Thinking In Compromise On Treatment Of Captive Terrorists (WSJ) 174
Painting A Rosy Budget Picture (WP) 178

DOJ_NMG_0078805

Medicaid Spending Rises Only Slightly (WP) 179
Pump Is Not Only Place For Lower Gas Prices (WP) 180
Agency Expects Lower Costs For Gas Heat (NYT/AP) 180
Heating Costs For Some Expected To Drop This Winter (USAT) 181
Winter Heating Likely To Cost Less (WT) 182
Forecasts Call For Lower Home Heating Costs (CHIT) 183
Natural Gas Bills Far From A Bargain (HC) 184
Lower Heating Bills Expected This Winter (LAT) 185
Gas Consumers To Pay Less For Heat This Winter, Government Says (BLOOM) 185
Far From Big City, Hidden Toll Of Homelessness (NYT) 186
Defense Contractors Weigh Majority Leader Murtha (HILL) 188
Sen. DeMint To Head-up Key Group (HILL) 189
The FAA Corrals Its Brand (WP) 190
Communication Breakdown Cited In Failed Postal Legislation (WP) 191
Photos And A Fair Trial (NYT) 192
Globalization And Schools (WP) 193

Other News:

For Voters, Time To Check Wallets (CSM) 194
'Values' Decline As Issue In Ohio (WP) 195
Fed Rethinks View Of Housing-led Slowdown (FT) 197
Home Is Where The Worry Is (WP) 198
Dow Inches Higher To Another Record; Dollar Hits High For Year Against Yen (WSJ) 199
History Of Foley Messages' Release Clarified By Players (WP) 199
Democrats Gain From Republican Chaos (FT) 201
Republicans In Trouble A Month Before Elections: Polls (AFP-Y) 202
In Minnesota, Voters Tune Out Scandals And Infighting To Focus On Issues (NYT) 203
People Like Foley Are Gays' Worst Nightmare (USAT) 205
Rove Raises $12M In The 2006 Cycle (HILL) 205
Congress As 'The Broken Branch' (WP) 207
Democrats Aim At The Red (LAT) 208
Democrats Veer To The Right In Fight For House (WT) 210
As Election Nears, Groups Plan Negative Ads (NYT) 211
Dems Hunt For Drop-off Voters (HILL) 212
Democratic Senate Group Backs Webb In A Big Way (VAPILOT) 214
National Dem Group Airs Independent Ads Attacking Allen (DPHR/AP) 215
Taxes Take Center Stage (WP) 216
Allen Allies Urge A Focus On Taxes (WT) 217
A Contest Of Character (WP) 218
Tenn. Senate Candidates Trade Barbs (CCT) 220
Poll: Lieberman Leads Lamont (HARTC) 220
Lamont Writes $2 Million Check To Own Campaign (NSDY/AP) 222
$5 Million Pledged To Texas Democrat (WT) 222
Bell Calls On Kinky To Drop Out (DMN) 223
Inside Politics (WT) 224
Washington Wire (WSJ) 226
Bringing It Home Seat In Congress Helps Mr. Taylor Help His Business (WSJ) 226
Philanthropy From The Heart Of America (NYT) 229
Rice Asserts U.S. Plans No Attack On North Korea (NYT) 230
Analysis: Should U.S. Talk To N. Korea? (AP) 232
White House Rejects North Korea Talks (AP-Y) 233
Bush Administration Rejects Talks With North Korea (MCT) 235
U.S. Fears Export Of Technology (LAT) 236
UN Resolution Focuses On Naval Searches (FT) 237
China Says It Will Back Sanctions On N. Korea (WP) 238
China Calls For Punitive Actions On N Korea (FT) 240
China Supports Sanctions Against N. Korea (USAT) 240
China: N.Korea Must Be Punished For Test (AP) 241
China Ready To Slap Sanctions On N. Korea Over Nuclear Test (AFP) 243
After North Korea's Bomb Test, China Ponders A Problematic Friendship (CSM) 244
China Hints Agreement On N. Korea (WT) 245
North-South Relations Suffer A Sudden Chill (WP) 247
Clouds Over Seoul's 'sunshine Policy' (FT) 248
Word Of Test Confirms Stances In 2 Nations (NYT) 249
U.S. Seeks Data On North Korea's Nuclear Test Claim (WSJ) 250
Small Blast, Or 'Big Deal'? U.S. Experts Look For Clues (NYT) 251
U.S. Waits For Firm Information On Nature And Success Of Device (WP) 252
White House Suggests Weapon Was Old (WT) 253
Even A Small Nuke Poses Big Threat (USAT) 254
Quake Raises Fears Of 2nd N. Korea Test (AP) 255
Japan To Keep Prohibition On Nukes (WT) 256
The Scramble For A Way To Stop Nukes (CSM) 257
Asia Weighs Risk Of Sanctions (WSJ) 258
Deep Insecurity Led Kim To Build Nuclear Program, Experts Say (NYT) 260
Iran Distances Itself From N Korean Crisis (FT) 261
Iran Blames U.S. For N. Korea Nuke Test (AP) 262

DOJ_NMG_0078806

Bomb Test May Scupper Indo-US Nuclear Deal (FT) 263
A Blink, A Nod, A Bomb (WSJ).....263
The Bus Is Waiting (NYT).....265
We Need A New Deterrent (WP).....266
McCain Targets Both Clintons (WP).....267
McCain Criticizes Clinton On N. Korea (AP).....268
Test Byproduct: Quick Scramble To Point Fingers (NYT) ...269
White House Rejects Criticism Over North Korean Test (AFP).....271
Kerry Blasts Bush NKorea Policy At Nevada Campaign Stop (AP).....272
In Search Of A North Korea Policy (WP).....272
Poisoning The Water's Edge (WSJ) 274
Republicans Couldn't Change The Subject — But Korea Did It For Them (HILL) 275
Solving The Korean Stalemate, One Step At A Time (NYT) 275
6-nation Meeting Set On Iran Sanctions (AP).....276
Olmert: Syria Peace Overtures Are A Ploy (AP) 277
A New Fence Is Added To A Border Town Already Split (NYT) 278
Hamas Rejects Plan For Unity Government (USAT) 279
Intransigent Hamas (WP).....280
Bush Assures Peru's President He Will Work On Passing Free Trade Accord (AP).....281
Peru's Path To Prosperity (LAT).....281
Fed Task Force To Enforce Cuba Sanctions (AP) 282
U.S. Treasury Aide On China Resigns (WSJ).....282
U.S. Group Reaches Deal To Provide Laptops To All Libyan Schoolchildren (NYT) 283
Uganda's Plight Pressed On Capitol Hill (WP).....284
Across Europe, Worries On Islam Spread To Center (NYT) 285
News To Bridge The Divide (USAT).....287
Support Freedom In The Arab World (WP).....288
An Impossible Job (NYT).....289
To Grow Or Not To Grow (WSJ).....290

DOJ_NMG_0078807

TERRORISM NEWS:

N.Y. Mosque Leaders Found Guilty (AP)

By Michael Virtanen

AP, October 11, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. - Two mosque leaders arrested in a terrorism-related sting were convicted Tuesday of federal money laundering charges.

Yassin Aref, imam at the Masjid as-Salam mosque in Albany, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and a founder of the mosque, were never accused of being terrorists, but prosecutors said they laundered money in 2003-04 for an FBI informant.

They were accused of attempting to provide support to Jaish-e-Mohammed, a Pakistan-based group listed by the federal government as a terrorist organization.

Hossain was convicted on all 27 charges against him, including three counts of conspiracy. The jury, which deliberated over four days, found Aref guilty of 10 of the 30 charges against him.

Prosecutors said the informant, a Pakistani businessman posing as an arms dealer, asked Hossain to launder $50,000 from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile that they were told would be used to kill a Pakistani diplomat in New York City. Aref acted as a witness to the series of transactions.

"Obviously we had a couple of individuals that were prone to supporting terrorism," U.S. Attorney Glenn Suddaby said after the verdict. "The FBI did what they had to do."

Aref, a 36-year-old Kurdish refugee from northern Iraq, was also found guilty of lying to FBI agents about having known a terrorist leader, Mullah Krekar.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek said through the sting, the men were simply offered an opportunity to choose whether to participate with the informant in a terrorist plot.

Defense lawyers said the two men had an incomplete understanding of what the informant was proposing. Hossain's lawyer, Kevin Luibrand, said his client was entrapped. Aref merely thought he was acting as a witness to financial transactions according to Muslim custom, said his lawyer, Terence Kindlon.

Hossain, a 51-year-old naturalized U.S. citizen from Bangladesh with severe diabetes, faces about 20 years in prison. Luibrand said that is tantamount to a life sentence and that the verdict likely will be appealed.

Kindlon did not comment on what kind of sentence Aref could face, saying he didn't want to speculate. Pericek said Aref likely would be deported after serving his prison sentence.

Luibrand added that his client had not committed any crimes, nor did he intend to, before he was targeted by the government. The FBI acknowledged Aref was its ultimate target, using Hossain to get close to him.

The men are scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 12.

Terror Trial Verdict Reached (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, October 11, 2006

Yassin Aref found guilty of 10 of 30 terrorism-related counts; Mohammed Hossain guilty on all 27 counts

ALBANY -- A federal court jury this afternoon found the leader of a Central Avenue mosque guilty of 10 of 30 terrorism-related counts against him and his co-defendant guilty on all 27 counts he faced.

Yassin M. Aref, the religious leader, and Mohammed M. Hossain are accused of taking part in a fictitious plot to help launder money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile to terrorists plotting an attack in New York City.

Aref faced separate charges for allegedly lying on a green card application and while being interviewed by FBI agents about his ties to a Kurdish political party.

DOJ_NMG_0078808

The verdicts came in the fourth day of deliberations in U.S. District Court. Jurors were sent home for the weekend late Friday afternoon and resumed deliberations this morning after the three-day holiday weekend.

Jurors on Friday asked to watch an FBI surveillance videotape of a key meeting between an undercover informant and Aref. At the meeting, which took place in January 2004, about six months after the sting began, the two men discussed the informant's plan to ``legalize" money that he was loaning to Hossain.

At the end of the day Friday, the jury also asked U.S. District Judge Thomas J. McAvoy to clarify two charges in the 30-count indictment. Jurors wanted to know whether the charges, as written, require that the defendants knew the informant was making money from the illicit smuggling of any firearms, or, specifically making money off the sale of the shoulder-fired missile that was used in the sting and shown to jurors during the trial.

The informant showed Hossain the missile launcher during a meeting in November 2003. Aref never saw the missile launcher. At another meeting with both men, in January 2004, the informant pulled out a missile-triggering device. Aref said he never saw it because he was counting money as the informant flashed the foot-long device.

Verdict Reached In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9)

By Steve Ference

Capital News 9, October 11, 2006

Jurors have found two Albany Mosque leaders guilty of terrorism charges. Pizzeria owner Mohammed Hossain was found guilty on all charges against him, while Imam Yassen Aref was only convicted of 10 of the charges. Our Steve Ference has the latest information on the verdict.

The jury foreman speaks out after he and his fellow jurors spent a full four days deliberating over charges these two men supported terrorism through money laundering, lied on immigration documents and aided a designated terrorist group.

U.S. Attorney, Bill Pericak, said "This is a world where when we have suspicions about people, we have a choice. Do we do something or do we wait until something happens?"

Jurors have found two Albany Mosque leaders guilty of terrorism charges. Pizzeria owner Mohammed Hossain was found guilty on all charges against him, while Imam Yassen Aref was only convicted of 10 of the charges. Our Steve Ference has the latest information on the verdict.

Prosecutor Bill Pericak said the government sting operation nabbed two men who could have walked away from the FBI informant who pretended to be a missile dealer to a terrorist organization.

But they didn't.

The jury found Mohammad Hossain, a pizza shop owner guilty on all charges, conspiring to conceal money believed to be the proceeds of supporting a terror organization, importing and dealing firearms without a license and conspiring to prepare and threatening to use a weapon of mass destruction.

"The jury worked very hard," Pericak said. "And you could tell from their verdict that they really examined the evidence very carefully and I think they arrived at a just result."

While not found guilty on all counts, the jury decided Albany Muslim leader Yassin Aref also conspired to conceal money believed to be the proceeds of the sale of a surface to air missile, threatening to use a weapon of mass destruction and providing support to the terrorist group Jaish-il Muhammad.

Defense attorney, Terrence Kindlon, said he looks to the future.

"You know clearly, the willingness of the jury in this case to acquit on 20 of the 30 counts gives us a glimmer of hope for the future."

Now the attorneys try to figure out the complicated sentencing guidelines that could lead to Aref's deportation and Hossain's incarceration for around 20 years.

Jury Convicts 2 Albany Men In Missile Plot (NYT)

By Michael Wilson

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

ALBANY, Oct. 10 — A federal jury on Tuesday convicted two Muslim immigrants of participating in a plot with a man who said he was helping plan a missile attack on a Pakistani diplomat in New York City in 2004.

The man to whom the immigrants were linked was actually an informant working with the F.B.I. in a sting operation against the two defendants, Yassin M. Aref, 36, an Iraqi refugee and the imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed M. Hossain, 51, a Bangladeshi immigrant and the owner of a pizzeria here. The gestation of the case, with the government's informant ingratiating himself with the men and initiating all the conversations about a shoulder-fired rocket launcher, led to claims of entrapment from Mr. Hossain's lawyers during the three-week trial in Federal District Court.

"Obviously we had a couple of individuals that were prone to supporting terrorism," United States Attorney Glenn T. Suddaby said after the verdict.

Mr. Aref, the imam, smiled at his lawyers Tuesday as he left the courtroom in custody. He has been in jail for the past year awaiting trial in the case. Mr. Hossain, who had been free on bail, turned to address the handful of supporters from the Masjid as-Salam Mosque where he and Mr. Aref met several years ago. "Peace is my victory," he shouted. "God is great. He is watching who is right and who is wrong. Thank you so much to everyone." He, too, was led away in shackles.

Prosecutors argued that he was driven by greed to enter a money-laundering scheme, and the imam by ideology. The defense argued that both men were duped into taking part in a deal they never understood. The garbled words supporting both versions played out before the jury in several hours of surveillance tapes.

A lawyer for Mr. Hossain, Kevin A. Luibrand, said that the defendants would appeal, and that the entrapment theory would again be raised. "Before the government arrived on the scene, they were not committing any crimes and were not thinking about committing any crimes," he said.

The men are to be sentenced on Feb. 12. The lengths of their sentences were unknown Tuesday, with Mr. Luibrand estimating 20 years in prison for Mr. Hossain, who was convicted of more crimes than Mr. Aref.

The case began when the undercover informant, Shahed Hussain, who used the name "Malik," introduced himself to Mr. Hossain at the Little Italy Pizzeria on Central Avenue in July 2003, bringing gifts for the restaurateur's children, according to testimony. The two became friends, and the informant offered to lend Mr. Hossain $50,000 for improvements to the pizzeria. At later meetings, Mr. Hussain testified that he told Mr. Hossain that the money he was going to lend to him came from the sale of a missile launcher that would be used to kill a Pakistani diplomat in New York.

In reality, there never was a plot. In one meeting, captured on a video that was played at the trial, the informant showed Mr. Hossain a launcher. The restaurateur said he had only seen such a weapon on television, and he asked if it was legal, and the informant replied, "What is legal in this world?"

The defense argued that such cryptic statements made it unclear what was being discussed. Mr. Hossain, at the informant's request, began repaying the loan in small checks of $2,000 to $6,000 over several months.

According to testimony, Mr. Hossain asked Mr. Aref to attend another meeting with the informant to act, by Muslim custom, as a witness to the loan. Mr. Aref, whose name and telephone number in Albany the government said were found in Iraq that same year on papers discovered among suspected terrorists, testified that he never knew of any plot.

A friend of Mr. Aref testified that at a dinner in 2004 at the imam's home, the informant suddenly blurted out that New York would soon be attacked by a missile, and that Mr. Aref quickly patted him down and asked, "Are you carrying a recorder?" That time, there was none.

Mr. Aref testified that he thought Mr. Hussain was joking.

He also testified that anyone looking to attack the United States "came to the wrong person." Mr. Hossain had been interviewed several times at his pizzeria over the years, saying once, after the Sept. 11 attacks, "I'm proud to be an American."

The men were convicted of conspiring to aid a terrorist group and provide support for a weapon of mass destruction, as well as money-laundering and supporting a foreign terrorist organization, Jaish-e-Mohammed, or JEM, a group in Pakistan that the informant told the men he supported. Mr. Aref was acquitted of most of the 30 counts that involved writing checks.

Mr. Hossain is a citizen, but Mr. Aref, who arrived as a refugee from the Kurdish region of Iraq, will eventually be deported, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0078810

Before the verdict, Mr. Hossain's wife, Mossammat Fatima Hossain, sat quietly in a booth at the pizzeria, which was empty but for a friend and her eldest son, who is 13. Business had fallen since the indictment, she said. After she learned of the verdict, she sat in the restaurant, unable to speak.

FBI Agents Still Lacking Arabic Skills (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

Five years after Arab terrorists attacked the United States, only 33 FBI agents have even a limited proficiency in Arabic, and none of them work in the sections of the bureau that coordinate investigations of international terrorism, according to new FBI statistics.

Counting agents who know only a handful of Arabic words -- including those who scored zero on a standard proficiency test -- just 1 percent of the FBI's 12,000 agents have any familiarity with the language, the statistics show.

The numbers reflect the FBI's continued struggle to attract employees who speak Arabic, Urdu, Farsi and other languages of the Middle East and South Asia, even as the bureau leads a fight against terrorist groups primarily centered in those parts of the world. The same challenge is facing the CIA and other agencies as the government competes with the private sector for a limited number of applicants with foreign-language proficiency, according to U.S. officials and experts.

The shortage of agents with foreign-language skills also shows the extent to which the FBI has focused on translators since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, in part because officials believe it is more valuable to have specially trained linguists.

In a recent deposition filed in an employee lawsuit, a senior FBI official testified that the bureau's two International Terrorism Operations Sections (ITOS) do not require any agents to know Arabic, even though the sections coordinate all foreign terrorism investigations. Only four agents in ITOS have any familiarity with Arabic, and none of them are ranked above elementary proficiency, documents show.

"There are no agent positions, at any level, in either ITOS I or II that utilize the Arabic language as part of their ITOS duties or responsibilities," Michael J. Heimbach, head of ITOS I, testified in his deposition. ". . . As such, knowledge of the Arabic language is not a skill set utilized by either ITOS I or II."

FBI officials said it is not crucial for agents working in the ITOS sections to know Arabic or other foreign languages, because they rely primarily on documents or interviews already translated by FBI linguists. As for agents in the field in the United States or overseas, FBI officials say translators are readily available when needed by investigators, usually within 24 hours.

But Daniel Byman, a Georgetown University associate professor who heads the school's Security Studies Program, said the FBI's continuing failure to attract Arabic-speaking agents is "a serious problem" that hurts the bureau's relations with immigrant communities and makes it more difficult to gather intelligence on extremist groups.

"With any new immigrant communities, they need these language skills, whether it's Vietnamese or Pakistani or Arabic," Byman said. "It also often gives you extra cultural knowledge and sensitivity. It makes you more sensitive to nuance, which is what investigations are often all about."

Margaret Gulotta, chief of the FBI's language services section, said in an interview that the bureau has made significant progress since 9/11 in increasing the number of translators who speak Arabic and other foreign languages. The number of translators proficient in Arabic has grown from 70 in September 2001 to 269 as of July -- an increase of nearly 300 percent -- while the overall number of linguists has nearly doubled.

The FBI also has a "very aggressive training program" of foreign-language instruction for agents and other programs that make it easier to hire candidates with foreign-language ability, Gulotta said. In fiscal 2005, she said, more than 1,600 agents took classes.

"Do we need more Arabic-speaking agents? By all means we want more Arabic-speaking agents," Gulotta said. "But admittedly it's a very difficult group of people to recruit and hire. . . . We've been a lot more successful in recruiting and hiring contract linguists and language specialists."

More than 1,400 agents have at least a limited working proficiency in a foreign language, including nearly 900 who speak Spanish. Other languages include Russian, Farsi, Vietnamese, Japanese, Korean, Mandarin and Cantonese, the FBI said.

DOJ_NMG_0078811

Gulotta and other officials said several factors limit the number of foreign speakers who can become agents at the FBI. Special agents, for example, must be U.S. citizens. They also must undergo background checks that are much more difficult to pass if the candidate has relatives or friends overseas.

"It is easier to get a security clearance if you don't have any interaction with foreigners, which is not what you want if you want better interaction with foreigners," Byman said.

Some of the new information about language abilities at the FBI has emerged in connection with a lawsuit by one of the FBI's highest-ranking Arabic speakers, Special Agent Bassem Youssef, who sued the Justice Department and the bureau alleging retaliation after he complained that he was cut out of terrorism cases after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Youssef, a naturalized U.S. citizen who was born in Egypt, is one of only six FBI agents who scored a 4 for "advanced professional proficiency" in Arabic on standardized speaking tests administered by the Interagency Language Roundtable for federal agencies.

Youssef's attorney, Stephen M. Kohn, said the statistics indicate that most FBI agents have no way to gauge the accuracy of translated materials and must rely on linguists or other third parties for their information.

"How do you fight a war with that kind of disadvantage?" Kohn asked.

Gulotta and other experts note that the FBI is not alone in its struggle to attract qualified job candidates who speak Arabic or other foreign languages.

A study released last week, for example, found that three terrorists housed at a federal prison in Colorado were able to send more than 90 letters to fellow extremists overseas, in part because the prison did not have enough qualified language translators to understand what was happening.

The Bush administration early this year unveiled a "National Security Language Initiative" aimed at encouraging more instruction in "critical" languages in elementary schools, secondary schools and universities.

The lack of such programs hurts "national security, diplomacy, law enforcement [and] intelligence communities," said a fact sheet accompanying the initiative's launch.

Steve Ackley, director of communications for the American Council on the Teaching of Foreign Languages in Alexandria, said the FBI and other agencies are faced with a serious challenge, because language instruction is so undervalued in U.S. schools.

"American society in general does not put a huge premium or value on multilingualism," Ackley said. "Until the general public . . . recognizes that this is an area that the government in general and agencies like the FBI and CIA have to invest in, this is not a problem that's going to get better."

The Cost Of Doing Your Duty (NYT)

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

During the recent debate over how to handle the prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, the Bush administration made a lot of noise about its commitment to fair treatment for the detainees and its respect for the uniformed lawyers of the armed forces. Anyone who believed those claims should consider the fate of the Navy lawyer whose integrity helped spark that debate in the first place.

In 2003, Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift was assigned to represent Salim Hamdan, a Yemeni citizen accused of being a high-ranking member of Al Qaeda — for the sole purpose of getting him to plead guilty before one of the military commissions that President Bush created for Guantánamo Bay. Instead of carrying out this morally repugnant task, Commander Swift concluded that the commissions were unconstitutional. He did his duty and defended his client. The case went to the Supreme Court, which ruled in June that the tribunals violated American law as well as the Geneva Conventions.

The Navy responded by killing his military career. About two weeks after the historic high court victory in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Commander Swift was told he was being denied a promotion. Under the Navy's up-or-out system, that spelled the end of his 20-year career, and Commander Swift said last week that he will be retiring in March or April.

DOJ_NMG_0078812

With his defense of Mr. Hamdan and his testimony before Congress starting in July 2003, Commander Swift did as much as any single individual to expose the awful wrongs of Guantánamo Bay and Mr. Bush's lawless military commissions. It was a valuable public service and a brave act of conscience, and his treatment is deeply troubling.

The law creating military tribunals for terror suspects, passed by Congress in a pre-election panic, leaves enormous room for the continued abuse of prisoners and for the continued detention of scores of men who committed no crime. If their military lawyers are afraid to represent them vigorously, their hopes for justice dim even further.

The Navy gave no reason for refusing Commander Swift's promotion. But there is no denying the chilling message it sends to remaining military lawyers about the potential consequences of taking their job, and justice, seriously.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Why Tariq Ramadan Lost (WT)

By Rachel Ehrenfeld And Alyssa A. Lappen

The Washington Times, October 11, 2006

Tariq Ramadan's latest attempt to legally obtain a visa to the United States was denied on Sept. 24. This was not the first time that Mr. Ramadan -- an Egyptian-born, Swiss citizen and the grandson of Muslim Brotherhood founder Hasan al-Banna -- was barred from the United States On July 28, 2004, the Department of Homeland Security revoked Mr. Ramadan's visa under the Immigration and Nationality Act. In that instance, while no specifics were given, Mr. Ramadan's activities -- lectures and writings in support of the Islamist agenda -- were presumed the obvious cause.

According to State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus, Mr. Ramadan's latest application for a visa was denied "based solely on his actions, which constituted providing material support to a terrorist organization." However, Mr. Ramadan, an Oxford University fellow, claims that his contributions of $940 between 1998-2002 to the French-based Hamas front "Committee for Palestinian Charity and Aid" were legal, because the United States listed it as "Specially Designated Global Terrorists" only in 2003. Nevertheless, the Palestinian charity (and its 17 aliases) at the same Lille, Lyon and Paris addresses, had already been publicly identified and designated by Israel as a Hamas front organization in May 1997. Indeed, Mr. Ramadan reiterated his commitment to Hamas saying: "If the price to pay for this commitment is to never to tread upon American soil, I am ready to pay that without the slightest hesitation."

Mr. Ramadan, however, claims his funding of Hamas was just an excuse. The "Bush administration has barred me for a much simpler reason: It doesn't care for my political views."

In public statements from London, where he was appointed last year to the government's "working group on tackling extremism," and in an Oct. 1 op-ed in The Washington Post, Mr. Ramadan declared that unlike the enlightened Europeans who allow criticism, especially regarding the war on terrorism, "the U.S. government's paranoia has evolved far beyond a fear of particular individuals and taken on a much more insidious form: the fear of ideas."

Although the U.S. government barred him for his terror financing, his "ideas" and influence among Muslims are nothing to sneeze at.

Consider the following: On Dec. 8, 2005, the French prosecution of Chechen terror network chief Menad Benchellali revealed evidence of Mr. Ramadan's links to terrorists in Europe. Benchellali had traveled to Switzerland "one or two times in 2000, to attend conferences on Islam provided by Tariq Ramadan." Benchellali, who later planned chemical attacks in France "under the supervision of Abu Musab Al Zarqawi," was sentenced in June to 10 years in prison.

Earlier, in March 2005, Algerian al Qaeda member Djamel Beghal received 10 years in prison in Paris for participating in a foiled terror attack on the U.S. embassy there. Beghal testified in September 2001 that "his religious engagement started in 1994," when "he was in charge of writing the statements of Tariq Ramadan." That October, Beghal added that he had also taken "courses given by Tariq Ramadan."

Moreover, a 2001 Swiss intelligence memo said: "brothers Hani and Tariq Ramadan coordinated a meeting held in 1991 in Geneva attended by [al Qaeda leader] Ayman Al Zawahiri and Omar Abdel Rahman," the imprisoned planner of the 1993 World Trade Center attack.

DOJ_NMG_0078813

Spanish Judge Balatasar Garzon, whose investigations into the terror activities of the Algerian Ahmed Brahim, rendered a 10-year prison sentence in April 2006, reported Ramadan's "routine contacts" with Brahim, the alleged financial chief of Al Qaeda in Europe and financier of the 1998 U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

Mr. Ramadan denies these charges. But according to French terrorism expert Jean-Charles Brisard, Mr. Ramadan also "denied being a director of the Geneva Islamic Center, a position he still holds, according to the official Swiss register of companies."

Mr. Ramadan's activities do not stop in Europe. In 1995, when the Algerian Armed Islamist Movement (AIM) perpetrated several terrorist attacks in Paris, French Interior Minister Jean Louis Debre barred Mr. Ramadan at that time from France -- based on his links to AIM. Tunisia, Saudi Arabia and his native Egypt also bar Mr. Ramadan from crossing their boarders. He is denied entrance to those countries, not for supporting Hamas or because he carries peaceful messages. They keep him out because of his links to and influence on radical Muslim groups.

Regardless, Mr. Ramadan's popularity among the Europeans is growing fast. He was just nominated by the EuropeanVoice, a Brussels-based newspaper covering the European Union, for a Europeans of the Year Award in two categories: the Non-EU Citizen who "has had the biggest impact on the Union in 2006," together with Bill Gates, Kofi Annan, Alan Greenspan and Mahmoud Abbas, and as European of the Year with the likes of Italy's prime minister, Romano Prodi, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

So do not count Mr. Ramadan out, yet. The American Civil Liberties Union, which filled several lawsuits on his behalf, condemned the State Department's decision, and said, "it was considering an appeal." Stay tuned.

Rachel Ehrenfeld is director of the American Center for Democracy. Alyssa A. Lappen is a senior fellow at the American Center for Democracy.

Congress Gives DHS Six Months To Revise Terrorist Watch Lists (GovExec/CD)

By Chris Strohm

Government Executive/CongressDaily, October 10, 2006

With frustration levels apparently reaching an all-time high, lawmakers have given the Homeland Security Department a hard deadline to revamp its process for clearing individuals who have been wrongly put on terrorist watch lists.

The fiscal 2007 Homeland Security appropriations bill -- signed into law last week -- requires the department within six months to "establish revised procedures for expeditiously clearing individuals whose names have been mistakenly placed on a terrorist database list or who have names identical or similar to individuals on a terrorist database list."

Frustration and anger has grown in Congress during the last year that government watch lists are riddled with inaccuracies, especially in the aviation arena where innocent U.S. citizens and even lawmakers themselves have been detained because their names appeared on one of the lists.

"If we're going to have a watch list that works, we should fine-tune it," Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., said during a June hearing.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, said in February that his wife, Catherine, was questioned at airport checkpoints because her name matched that of a singer formerly known as Cat Stevens. And well-known Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass, and civil rights pioneer Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., also have said they were wrongly placed on a watch list and stopped many times.

A spokesman for the Homeland Security Department was unable to provide comment as of Tuesday afternoon. But Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Secretary of State Rice last January announced that the government would "accelerate efforts to establish a government-wide traveler screening redress process to resolve questions if travelers are incorrectly selected for additional screening."

Last Friday, the American Civil Liberties Union called for the government to shut down its aviation watch lists. The demand came in response to a CBS "60 Minutes" report disclosing that the lists include many common names along with people who are dead, in prison, or are international dignitaries, such as the president of Bolivia. The report also said the lists do not include the names of some suspected terrorists because agencies do not want to share them outside the government.

DOJ_NMG_0078814

"Until Homeland Security can figure out a way to create a genuine, narrow, targeted list of real terrorists rather than harming innocent people, Congress needs to shut this monstrosity down," said Tim Sparapani, ACLU legislative counsel.

The Homeland Security Department's Transportation Security Administration operates three aviation watch lists: one with names of individuals who are not allowed to fly; one with names who need secondary screening; and one with names who have been cleared through a redress process. The FBI's Terrorist Screening Center is responsible for managing and consolidating all government watch lists.

The FBI and TSA both issued statements in the last two days defending watch lists as valuable counterterrorism tools and clarifying current redress procedures. A TSA spokeswoman said about 35,000 people have sought redress for mistakenly being on an aviation watch list. Both TSA and the FBI declined to reveal names or how many people are on any of the lists, saying that information is secret.

Katrina-Related Brawl With State Farm Heats Up (LAW)

By Peter Geier, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 11, 2006

Allegations by whistleblowers and plaintiffs lawyers that State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. used a "one-size-fits-all" engineering report to deny policyholders' Katrina-related claims are stirring up Mississippi's southern federal district.

State and federal prosecutors and grand jurors are looking into allegations that insurance claims were denied on the basis of a biased engineering report. The allegations were brought to light by two claims adjusters who had worked for an Alabama risk management firm under contract with Bloomington, Ill.-based State Farm.

Richard T. "Flip" Phillips of Smith, Phillips, Mitchell, Scott & Nowak of Batesville, Miss., an attorney representing Judy M. Guice in a mass tort on behalf of Mississippi homeowners who lost their homes, alleges that State Farm's tactics reveal "a calculated strategy of wrongful claims denial." Guice v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., No. 06-cv-1 (S.D. Miss.).

"If they're allowed to do this, the lesson the insurance industry will have learned is that in mass catastrophe situations, a calculated course of across-the-board, wrongful claims denial and trying one case at a time pays," Phillips said.

State Farm spokesman Phil Supple said that the company has been resolving claims fairly and is cooperating with state and federal probes into its activities.

Loretta L. Worters, vice president of the New York-based Insurance Information Institute, an insurance industry-funded group, said that the accusations were merely the plaintiffs lawyers latest attempt "to see what, if anything, will stick -- both through the media and in a court of law."

"First, it was the so-called hurricane deductible (which does not exist), then it was the supposedly vague policy language (which, in fact, a judge has ruled is clear); now it is unfounded charges of conspiracy. As each one of [their] arguments gets shot down, [they try] a new tactic," Worters wrote in an e-mail.

Underlying the litigation is the issue of whether the damage to policyholders' homes was caused by Katrina's high winds, which most policies cover, or by the storm surge and high waters, against which many policyholders were not insured. The southern district of Mississippi so far has denied class certification on the ground that each case involves its own set of circumstances as to the percentage of wind to water damage.

But the plaintiffs allege that State Farm used a "generic engineering report ... which concluded that all of the hurricane damage to property on the Mississippi Gulf Coast was caused by storm surge and not by hurricane wind," in essence to deny all of their claims, according to an amended complaint filed in McFarland v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., No. 06-466 (S.D. Miss.).

Plaintiffs further allege that State Farm is following a pattern of fraudulent claims handling that was established in Oklahoma, Texas and other jurisdictions around the country.

A federal grand jury in Jackson, Miss., that is investigating these allegations reportedly asked to see the record and transcripts of an Oklahoma insurance claim case in which a state jury awarded $9.9 million in punitive damages in May to a homeowner who sued State Farm after a tornado destroyed his home in 1999. Watkins v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., No. CJ-2000-303 (Grady Co., Okla., Dist. Ct.).

DOJ_NMG_0078815

In a related development, a recent State Farm motion for a protective order identifies by name two of five State Farm employees who are possible targets of state and federal criminal investigations and grand jury proceedings over claims-handling issues. State Farm has sought to prevent its employees from being deposed in civil matters while the criminal probes are pending.

Plaintiffs lawyers support their allegations regarding State Farm's claims handling with at least 15,000 documents copied and disclosed to them and to state and federal law enforcement authorities by Cori Rigsby Moran and Kerri Rigsby, sisters who were formerly adjusting Katrina claims for State Farm through their former employer, E.A. Renfroe & Co. of Birmingham, Ala. The sisters reportedly now work for Richard F. "Dickie" Scruggs of Oxford, Miss., who represents the McFarland plaintiffs. He did not return a call for comment.

Renfroe is now suing Moran and Rigsby in federal court in Alabama, seeking injunctive relief and unspecified damages for the sisters' alleged breach of contract and violation of the Alabama Trade Secrets Act. E.A. Renfroe & Co. Inc. v. Moran, No. 06-1752 (N.D. Ala.).

WAR NEWS:

Baghdad Blasts Kill 17; Dozens Of Bodies Found (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 10 — Dozens of bodies turned up in Baghdad and a series of bombs killed at least 17 people on Tuesday, indicating that the sectarian violence in the capital showed little sign of easing, despite efforts by the American military and its Iraqi counterparts to quell it.

At least 50 bodies, riddled with bullets and many bearing signs of torture, were discovered across Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. About 60 bodies were discovered the day before.

Meanwhile, a troubled neighborhood at the center of the American military's push to secure the capital was hit by three deadly bomb blasts, including one at a busy bakery, the authorities said.

The bombings came in addition to a series of huge explosions that shook the capital over several hours late Tuesday evening, apparently caused by a fire inside an ammunition holding area at a United States military base in southern Baghdad.

The origins of the blaze are still being investigated, but it set off ammunition and ordnance, including tank rounds and artillery, said Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, a spokesman for the Fourth Infantry Division.

Television images showed an extensive fire burning in the night, punctuated by periodic explosions.

The deadly blasts earlier in the day took place in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora. The area was one of the earliest to experience the sectarian bloodletting in Baghdad.

American and Iraqi soldiers moved into the neighborhood in force in August, as part of a new security plan for the capital that involved neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweeps in which troops would secure and hold areas.

Dora had been mostly quiet over the past two months, aside from periodic explosions that killed small numbers of people. Residents were able to sleep on their rooftops again. Garbage crews moved through and cleaned its streets for the first time in months.

On Tuesday, any semblance of normalcy was shattered, however. About 12:30 p.m. a bomb exploded outside a bakery and killed 10 civilians and wounded four others. The blast reduced the bakery to rubble.

About the same time, six policemen were killed when, as they responded to a report about a body in a car, the car exploded, said an officer of the Rafdian Brigade, an Iraqi commando unit assigned to Dora. Four others were wounded.

A half hour earlier, a roadside bomb killed one policeman and wounded four others, an Interior Ministry official said.

The deadly day in Dora underscored the difficulty for the American military as it tries to secure neighborhoods.

Iraqi lawmakers pushed ahead on Tuesday in their efforts to flesh out a plan introduced by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to stem the sectarian attacks in the city.

DOJ_NMG_0078816

At the heart of the plan is the creation of joint Shiite and Sunni committees that will be in charge of safeguarding each district in Baghdad.

Overseeing their efforts will be a Central Committee for Peace and Security, whose members met Tuesday to discuss a plan to require that each checkpoint in the capital be operated by an equal number of Sunni and Shiite troops, or perhaps by joint teams of police and army officers, said Basim al-Sharif, a Shiite and a committee member.

The Iraqi immigration minister, Abdul-Samad Sultan, said more than 300,000 Iraqis hade fled their homes since the American-led invasion in 2003, The Associated Press reported. Half of them left after the February bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra set off cascades of sectarian violence.

He estimated that about 890,000 Iraqis have moved to Jordan, Iran and Syria since 2003, after the American-led invasion toppled the government of Saddam Hussein.

On Tuesday, the chief judge at the genocide trial of Mr. Hussein once again ejected him from the courtroom. The former dictator is being tried on charges of killing more than 50,000 Kurds in a 1988 military campaign in northeastern Iraq.

When it was his turn to question a prosecution witness, Mr. Hussein made a speech, beginning with a quotation from the Koran. The judge, Muhammad al-Uraibi, who has been stricter in his courtroom than his predecessor, Abdullah al-Amiri, immediately cut him off and then eventually ejected him. Mr. Amiri, the previous chief judge, was removed from his position last month by Mr. Maliki for allegedly showing bias toward the defense.

One of Mr. Hussein's co-defendants, Hussein Rashid, a former military commander, was also dispatched from the courtroom. Mr. Rashid punched a guard and called prosecutors pimps and traitors as he was escorted out by guards.

Meanwhile, the American military reported that a joint United States and Iraqi patrol killed 11 militants on Monday evening in a clash in the southern Shiite city of Diwaniya, a stronghold of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr and his militia, the Mahdi Army.

Abdul Razzaq al-Nedawi, the head of Mr. Sadr's office in Diwaniya, insisted that no Mahdi Army members were killed in Monday's clash. He said it was provoked by American and Iraqi troops.

"They started to shoot randomly," he said, explaining the soldiers had come to search the al-Qaim mosque in the area but found it empty. "The brothers responded to that and shot back."

The Defense Ministry issued a statement denying that the patrol had raided the mosque and said militants had opened fire on the soldiers.

The military announced the death of an American soldier in Tikrit on Sunday from a roadside bomb.

Bomb Kills 11 At Baghdad Bakery (USAT)

USA Today, October 11, 2006

BAGHDAD — A bomb blew up Tuesday outside a bakery in a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad, killing 11 people who had been waiting in line.

In addition, police told the Associated Press they had discovered the mutilated bodies of 60 men in different parts of Baghdad over the 24-hour period ending Tuesday morning — the latest victims of killings blamed on six months of intensifying Sunni-Shiite fighting.

U.S. forces also continued to pay a toll amid operations aimed at stemming bloodshed in the capital. The U.S. command said five more soldiers had been killed. This month, 37 U.S. servicemembers have died in Iraq.

Late Tuesday, a fire at an ammunition depot at a U.S. base in southeast Baghdad set off explosions that rocked the city. The cause of the fire was not immediately known, and there were no injuries, the U.S. military said.

Bombing At Iraq Bakery Kills At Least 11 (AP)

By Qais Al-bashir

AP, October 11, 2006

A bombing at a Baghdad bakery killed at least 11 people Tuesday as the Iraqi government put forward a new idea to help stop sectarian violence: ensuring security checkpoints in the capital have an equal number of Shiite and Sunni troops.

DOJ_NMG_0078817

The bomb, planted under a car in the mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood of Dora, ripped through a line of people waiting outside a bakery — the worst in a day of attacks which left at least 23 dead across the country. Dora has long been one of Baghdad's most dangerous areas, with near daily killings Hours after the bombing, a massive fire broke out Tuesday evening in an ammunition dump on a U.S. military base on Baghdad's southern edge, adjacent to Dora. It set off ordnance in a series of explosions that lasted for hours into the night and shook buildings miles away.

The cause of the fire was not immediately known and there were no injuries, the U.S. military said. A large fire and smoke were seen from the Forward Operating Base Falcon. Blasts from detonating artillery and tank shells sent up sparks, and the force of the explosions could be felt miles away in central Baghdad.

The blaze broke out in an area where ammunition is kept temporarily before distribution to the units at Falcon, where more than three battalions are located, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman at the base.

U.S. forces continued to pay a heavy toll amid stepped-up operations aimed at stemming the bloodshed, with the U.S. command announcing the death of five more service members. On Monday, three Marines were killed in fighting in western Anbar province, and a soldier died from an attack on his patrol in Baghdad, it said. Another soldier died Sunday from a roadside bomb in Tikrit, north of the capital.

The deaths bring the number of U.S. troops killed in October to 37 — many the result of stepped-up efforts to end violence in the capital.

Authorities discovered the mutilated bodies of 60 men in different parts of Baghdad over the 24-hour period ending Tuesday morning, police said. The bullet-riddled bodies all had their hands and feet bound and showed signs of torture — hallmarks of death-squad killings.

Under intense pressure to halt the sectarian violence, which has killed thousands this year, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki a week ago announced a four-point security plan aimed at stopping Shiite-Sunni killings.

In a first step, officials said Tuesday that all security checkpoints in Baghdad would soon be manned by an equal number of Shiite and Sunni Arab troops.

The new effort reflects the deep mistrust between Shiites and Sunnis even within the security forces — effectively putting them together to keep watch on each other. Each side accuses the other of backing militias, and Sunnis in particular say the Shiite-dominated police force often allows Shiite militias to carry out kidnappings and murders.

Al-Maliki's overall plan calls for the creation of local Shiite-Sunni committees that will oversee policing in each district of Baghdad, reporting back to a Central Committee for Peace and Security to coordinate with the security forces and the prime minister.

The parties agreed Saturday on the makeup of the central committee, said a member, Bassem Sherif, who represents the Shiite Fadila party on the body. It includes four representatives each from the Shiite coalition that dominates parliament and the main Sunni coalition, along with one representative each from the Kurds and the Iraqi List, a mixed, secular party, Sherif said.

The committee will meet in coming days to work with the Interior and Defense ministries on arranging the balanced checkpoints, Sherif said. A Sunni participant in Saturday's talks, Khalaf al-Alayan, head of the National Dialogue Council party, confirmed details of the plan.

The six-month wave of Sunni-Shiite killings has fueled the flight of Iraqis from their homes.

Iraq's Immigration Minister Abdul-Samad Sultan said more than 300,000 Iraqis have been displaced since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Half of them, he said, fled their homes after the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra that sparked waves of violence.

Those displaced mostly moved in with their own sectarian communities — Shiites fleeing mainly Sunni or mixed areas to Shiite-dominated ones, and vice versa — exacerbating the segregation of the country of some 30 million.

Some 890,000 Iraqis have moved to Jordan, Iran and Syria since 2003, Sultan said.

In other violence Tuesday, a car bombing in the primarily Sunni neighborhood of Azamiyah in north Baghdad killed four people and wounded nine, police 1st Sgt. Mahmud Hussein said.

DOJ_NMG_0078818

The brother of a Baghdad police brigadier was found shot dead, tied to a lamppost in Buhriz, 35 miles north of the capital, police in the nearby city of Baqouba said. Later authorities found the body of another of the brigadier's brothers, also shot, lying in the street.

The bodies of two other shooting victims were found in Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, and another was found in Baqouba, police said.

The U.S. military said Iraqi and U.S. troops killed at least nine fighters in clashes with the Mahdi Army — Iraq's most powerful Shiite militia — in the southern city of Diwaniya on Monday. Two U.S. soldiers were wounded.

On Sunday, U.S.-Iraqi forces in Diwaniya battled for hours with members of the Mahdi Army, who are loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The military said 30 militiamen were killed; the militia denied it.

The U.S. command also announced that DNA tests have confirmed that a man shot and killed by British forces in Iraq was the leading al-Qaida terrorist who embarrassed the U.S. military by escaping from the Bagram maximum security military prison in Afghanistan.

Omar al-Farouq was killed Sept. 25 after he fired on British forces during a raid in Basra, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad.

___

Associated Press Writer Qassim Abdul-Zahra contributed to this report.

Fire Erupts At U.S. Ammo Dump In Iraq (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, October 11, 2006

A fire broke out at an ammunition dump at a U.S. base in southern Baghdad on Tuesday night, setting off a series of explosions from detonating tank and artillery shells that shook buildings miles away. The U.S. military said there were no immediate reports of casualties.

It was not clear whether the ammunition holding area at Forward Operating Base Falcon was hit by an attack. The cause of the fire was not immediately known, said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a military spokesman.

Explosions from detonating tank and artillery ordnance and small-arms ammunition stored at the site went off for hours after the fire erupted.

Large flames and smoke rose from the region, and flashes from the blasts and showers of sparks were visible on the horizon from several miles away in central Baghdad, where the force of the blasts could be felt. The blasts came at times sporadically, at times in rapid succession, lasting into the night. Helicopters were seen in the night sky flying over the area.

The blaze broke out in an ammunition holding area, where material is kept temporarily before distribution to the units at Falcon, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman at the base. He said more than three battalions were stationed there at the time of the fire but he would not give a specific number of troops.

"There is a lot of ammunition there, but it's not a full storage depot," he said. "This does not degrade our operational ability at all."

He said the cause of the fire was under investigation.

Falcon is located in a former commercial trucking depot in a sprawling industrial area at the southern entrance of Baghdad. It is near the violence-torn district of Dora, where U.S. troops have been focusing in a 2-month-old sweep of the capital neighborhood-by-neighborhood aimed at rooting out militants and weapons.

It lies on the main highway heading south of Baghdad. Much of the area around it is sparsely populated, but on the opposite side of the highway, about 600 yards away, are residential neighborhoods.

Iraqi military officials said no evacuations of residents were ordered from the Dora area.

Iraqi Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani went on television to reassure residents of the capital.

"The situation is under control," he said. "There is an alert to security forces to provide any help to the residents of the area. We are waiting for information from the Americans" on the cause, he said.

U.S. Ammo Dump Explodes In Baghdad (MCT)

By Jay Price

DOJ_NMG_0078819

McClatchy Newspapers, October 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - A U.S. ammunition dump on the southeastern edge of Baghdad caught fire late Tuesday, setting off at least a half-dozen thunderous explosions and several smaller ones that rattled windows across the city.

Despite the size of the blasts, no casualties were reported, Spc. Jennifer Fulk, a U.S. military spokeswoman, said early Wednesday. There was no information yet on the cause of the fire, Fulk said.

An insurgent group called Al Fataheen Army took credit for the damage in a posting on an Islamic forum used by various insurgent groups in Iraq.

The group said it had attacked the base with several missiles at 11:55 p.m., but that timing cast suspicion on the claim. The explosions, which could be felt throughout the city, had begun about an hour earlier.

The same group claimed responsibility for attacking U.S. camps in northern Iraq on Sunday.

The blasts were the culmination of a particularly violent day in Baghdad.

Police reported that at least five bombs exploded throughout the city, killing at least 10 civilians and at least one police officer. Police also said they'd discovered at least 60 bodies in the 24 hours that ended at 6 a.m. Tuesday. The bodies were bound hand and foot and showed signs of torture, the police said.

An unknown number of troops from the 4th Infantry Division based at Fort Hood, Texas, were at Forward Operating Base Falcon when the base's ammo dump began to explode.

A military statement said the fire began at about 10:40 p.m. and ignited tank and artillery shells and small arms ammunition.

The fire, clouds of smoke and flashes from the ammunition detonating could be seen for miles.

The fire was contained on the base by emergency first responders, and the damage wasn't expected to hinder military operations, the statement said.

Price reports for the Raleigh News & Observer. Contributing to this report were McClatchy Newspapers special correspondents Mohammed al Awsy and Mohammed al Dulaimy.

Explosions Rock Baghdad As US Arms Dump Catches Fire (AFP)

AFP, October 11, 2006

A fire erupted in an ammunition store at an United States military base in Baghdad, a spokesman said, triggering massive explosions that could be heard across the war-torn Iraqi capital.

Lieutenant Colonel Jonathan Withington of the 4th Infantry Division told AFP that military and civilian personnel had been evacuated from Forward Operating Base Falcon without injury but that the fire was continuing to burn.

"We have a fire," he said. "An ammunition holding area caught on fire. It's in our operating base in the Rasheed area of the city. The ammunition holding area contains tank and artillery rounds as well as small arms ammunition."

The blaze broke out at around 10:40 pm (1940 GMT) and Baghdad was rocked by a series of loud explosions. Iraqi officials appeared on state television to urge calm and prevent rumours of an attack from spreading.

US forces do not yet know the cause of the fire, Withington said.

The damage appeared to have been contained within the base, the US spokesman said, although Iraqi officials said that shells "cooking off" in the fire had crashed down in five districts in the south of the city.

State television showed live pictures of a blazing inferno and ordnance exploding skywards, but there was no immediate news of civilian casualties outside the base.

Two hours after the fire broke out a regular drumbeat of explosions could still be heard five kilometres (2.4 miles) away in the city centre, a barrage more intense that Baghdad's daily diet of car bombs and mortar strikes.

"All coalition forces and workers at the base were safely evacuated. At this time, no injuries have been reported," a coalition news release said.

"Baghdad Joint Coordination Center alerted Iraqi authorities who notified Iraqi citizens in the area of the fire and subsequent detonations. The damage to the area will not degrade the operational capability of MND-B."

Under U.S. Patrol, Once-Tough District Revives (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

DOJ_NMG_0078820

The Los Angeles Times, October 11, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Amariya neighborhood has won a reputation as the most fearsome quarter of the capital, with car bombs, snipers and frequent clashes between U.S. forces and hardened Sunni Arab fighters.

But over the last few weeks, U.S. officials and Iraqi residents say, life has improved markedly in the notorious district, thanks to an American-led effort to improve security and services.

On a tour of the largely Sunni Arab district with U.S. soldiers Tuesday, a day on which at least 60 mutilated bodies were found elsewhere in Baghdad and violence left an additional 23 dead across Iraq, schoolchildren walked home gingerly along streets recently cleared of rotting garbage mounds. Young men emerged from newly reopened shops on main thoroughfares. Women shopped for vegetables at outdoor produce stands.

"Electricity is a problem, jobs are a problem, there's no gas, but thank God," said one woman as she gestured toward a group of U.S. soldiers, "security has gotten better."

The improvement in Amariya has come at a price, however.

Lt. Col. Gian Gentile, the 4th Infantry Division squadron commander in charge, acknowledged in an interview that he had to move troops from nearby neighborhoods under his command to bolster security in Amariya, risking rising peril in those districts.

He has also had to close off the western Baghdad neighborhood at all but two gateways in an effort to stanch the flow in and out of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militia members. And he has watched helplessly as the district's Shiite Muslim population has plummeted. Once 15%, it is now less than 2%, he said, part of a displacement crisis that has disrupted lives but made neighborhoods such as Amariya less prone to sectarian violence.

He has also had to readjust his views, coming to grips with the hardened opinions of the people he must protect as well as occasionally fight.

"They see the [Sunni Arab] insurgents as their final source of protection," says Gentile, a Danville, Calif., native. "When we leave and they're left with this [Shiite-dominated] sectarian government, who else are they going to be left with?"

Amariya is to Sunni insurgents what Camp Victory — the nearby U.S. military headquarters — is to the Americans, Gentile says. An affluent and leafy suburban enclave teeming with out-of-work officers of toppled President Saddam Hussein's military and security apparatus, Amariya has been a stronghold of anti-American, anti-government and religiously radical groups since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003. American and Iraqi forces are frequently the targets of car bombs and snipers, including one who wounded an Iraqi soldier in Amariya on Tuesday.

"Down, down U.S.A.!" say the fading graffiti on an Amariya side street.

But though Sunni Arab militants continue to use Amariya as a haven, the general mood toward Americans has shifted since Iraq's Shiite-led elected government began to exert its muscle. In the wake of anti-Sunni reprisals that followed the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, many Sunni Muslims in Amariya came to see the Americans they detest as occupiers as the only force capable of protecting them from a Shiite hunger for revenge.

Until March and April, there was little U.S. presence in Amariya, Gentile said. Once Gentile took over the district, he said, he made strenuous efforts to build goodwill. Drawing lessons from previous commanders, he softened his tactical approach, ordering his troops to drive slowly and not brandish weapons at passing motor vehicles.

"We started off with our gunners showing their weapons and being very aggressive," Gentile said. "But we've moved away from that. As much time as we've spent out there, we've learned that the traffic is just traffic."

Sometimes his men complain about their peacekeeping posture.

"I'm a soldier," said Spc. Justin Cook, 26, an affable former bartender from Titusville, Fla. "They didn't train me to do this."

But during a drive through the district, Cook frequently yielded to oncoming Iraqi drivers. Gentile took other practical steps to improve the area's quality of life. After more than a dozen suicide bombs hit a pair of checkpoints along a main street in June and July, Gentile simply removed the checkpoints. As many as 60% of the businesses that were shut down along the street have reopened.

Gentile's armored reconnaissance squadron, formally part of the 4th Brigade of the 4th Infantry Division but currently attached to the 1st Armored Division, launched an effort to clean up the garbage-strewn district as part of an operation aimed at securing several volatile Baghdad neighborhoods. U.S. patrols increased about 50%, Gentile said.

DOJ_NMG_0078821

"All they saw before was American patrols … up and down the main streets," Gentile said. "Now we've got American patrols out there with the Iraqi army. And we've got garbage trucks out here and workers from Amariya picking up garbage. It gave them a sense of security that things are a little better."

The improvements to the quality of life have been tangible. Artist Fuad Hamdi, a 44-year-old Amariya resident reached by phone Tuesday night, said he had fled his neighborhood. "We were living in terror, fear and chaos, and no one dared to leave his house unless it was an emergency," he said.

When he heard from neighbors that the security situation had improved, he returned, he said.

But Gentile readily acknowledges that despite the improvements, "bad things still happen in Amariya every day," including, he said, roadside bombings targeting U.S. patrols and killings of Iraqi officials and ordinary residents.

To consolidate the district's modest improvements, Gentile hopes to build a new police station staffed by locals.

The police are under the control of the Shiite-dominated Ministry of the Interior, whose alleged excesses against Sunnis are believed to fuel the popularity of the insurgents. The force remains an object of mistrust in Amariya.

Reducing the violence in Baghdad has proved bedeviling for U.S. forces. Despite a similar security crackdown in the southern neighborhood of Dora, a car bomb killed 10 civilians and injured four others at a bakery in the district Tuesday, and a roadside bomb killed a police officer.

Bombs in or near the capital killed at least six Iraqi police officers and soldiers and injured 10.

The U.S. military reported Tuesday that a soldier attached to the 25th Combat Aviation Brigade died of wounds sustained when his vehicle was struck by a bomb Sunday north of Tikrit. Three Marines assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, were killed Monday as a result of "enemy action" in the western province of Al Anbar, the U.S.-led multinational force said today.

Among the corpses found was that of Azad Mohammed, a 29-year-old Kurdish radio reporter abducted a week ago. Ali Kareem, a journalist working for a weekly magazine, was abducted Tuesday on his way home from work.

Study Estimates 600,000 Iraqis Dead By Violence (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya, Usa Today

USA Today, October 11, 2006

More than 600,000 Iraqis have died by violence since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to a study released today by researchers at Johns Hopkins University.

The figure is based on surveys of households throughout most of the country. It vastly exceeds estimates cited by the Iraqi government, the United Nations, aid and anti-war groups, and President Bush.

The new estimate was immediately challenged by the Pentagon. Lt. Col. Mark Bellesteros, a Pentagon spokesman, said the Iraqi government "would be in a better position … to provide more accurate information on deaths in Iraq."

Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council said "many experts" found that a 2004 study by the same group "wildly inflated the findings." That study said the war had caused 100,000 Iraqi deaths.

"This study appears to be equally flawed," he said. The new study said the deaths have resulted from coalition military activity, crime and religious violence.

Iraq's Health Ministry estimated 50,000 violent deaths since the war began, through June. Last December, President Bush put the figure at 30,000. The Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, estimated the death toll at 60,000.

Overall, the analysis estimates that 2.5% of the Iraqi population has died as a result of the conflict.

The research relied on random sampling of 1,800 Iraqi households by researchers from the Bloomberg School of Public Health at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore and the School of Medicine at Al Mustansiriya University in Baghdad. Based on deaths suffered by those households, analysts calculated an average of about 600 deaths a day since the invasion.

"I think it's perfectly plausible," said the study's lead author, Gilbert Burnham, professor of international health at Johns Hopkins.

Then-British foreign secretary Jack Straw was among those who criticized the earlier study.

This time the researchers doubled the size of their random survey. In 92% of the homes in which residents reported deaths, families had death certificates, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0078822

Beyond violent deaths, the study said about 53,000 deaths from other causes, such as accident and illness, were attributable to the war because of its effect on health care.

Gunfire was the leading cause of violent deaths; car bomb fatalities are rising, the study said.

James Fearon, a Stanford University political scientist and Iraq expert, said, “One thing (the study may) certainly do is confirm the view that there is a very, very serious civil war going in Iraq.”

Iraqi Death Toll Exceeds 600,000, Study Estimates (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A new study asserts that roughly 600,000 Iraqis have died from violence since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, a figure many times higher than any previous estimate.

The study, to be published Saturday in the British medical journal the Lancet, was conducted by the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health by sending teams of Iraqi doctors across Iraq from May through July. The findings are sure to draw fire from skeptics and could color the debate over the war ahead of congressional elections next month.

The Defense Department until 2004 eschewed any effort to compute the number of Iraqi dead but this summer released a study putting the civilian casualty rate between May and August at 117 people a day. Other tabulations using different methodologies put the range of total civilian fatalities so far from about 50,000 to more than 150,000. President Bush in December said "30,000, more or less" had died in Iraq during the invasion and in the violence since.

The Johns Hopkins team conducted its study using a methodology known as "cluster sampling." That involved randomly picking 47 clusters of households for a total 1,849 households, scattered across Iraq. Team members interviewed each household about any deaths in the family during the 40 months since the invasion, as well as in the year before the invasion. The team says it reviewed death certificates for 92% of all deaths reported. Based on those figures, it tabulated national mortality rates for various periods before and after the start of the war. The mortality rate last year was nearly four times the preinvasion rate, the study found.

"Since March 2003, an additional 2.5% of Iraq's population has died above what would have occurred without conflict," the report said. The country's population is roughly 24 million people.

Human Rights Watch has estimated Saddam Hussein's regime killed 250,000 to 290,000 people over 20 years.

The Lancet study, funded largely by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Center for International Studies, said while the percentage of deaths attributed to the U.S.-led coalition has decreased over the past year, coalition forces were involved in 31% of all violent deaths since March 2003. Most of the deaths in Iraq, particularly in the past two years, have been caused by insurgent, terrorist and sectarian violence.

Overall, the study found 55% of deaths since March 2003 were due to violence. Of that subset, 56% resulted from gunshots; car bombs and other explosives accounted for 27%, and airstrikes caused 13%. The rest were due to other factors.

Paul Bolton, a public-health researcher at Boston University who has reviewed the study, called the methodology "excellent" and said it was standard procedure in a wide range of studies he has worked on. "You can't be sure of the exact number, but you can be quite sure that you are in the right ballpark," he said.

A similar, smaller study by the same team in 2004 put the number of deaths at the time at 9,000 to 194,000. That report drew fire for the breadth of its estimate. In part to offset such criticism, the researchers said they picked the largest sample possible for this survey, after considering the high level of danger involved in sending teams door-to-door in Iraq.

The study's lead researchers, Gilbert Burnham and Les Roberts of Johns Hopkins, have done studies in the Congo, Rwanda and other war zones. "This is a standard methodology that the U.S. government and others have encouraged groups to use in developing countries," said Mr. Burnham, who defended the study as "a scientifically extremely strong paper."

This study, "The Human Cost of the War in Iraq," puts civilian fatalities at 426,369 to 793,663 but gives a 95% certainty to the figure of 601,027.

DOJ_NMG_0078823

Hamit Dardagan, co-founder of Iraq Body Count, a London-based human-rights group, called the Lancet study's figures "pretty shockingly high." His group tabulates the civilian death toll based on media reports augmented by local hospital and morgue records. His group says it has accumulated reports of as many as 48,693 civilian deaths caused by the U.S. intervention.

Mr. Burnham said the disparity between his survey and tabulations like Iraq Body Count are largely because of the heavy media and government focus on Baghdad and a few other cities. "What our data show is that the level of violence is going on throughout the country," he said.

Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Defense Department spokesman, said the Pentagon doesn't comment on reports that haven't been publicly released. Nonetheless, he said, "the coalition takes enormous precautions to prevent civilian deaths and injuries," adding that "the Iraqi ministry of health would be in a better position, with all of its records, to provide more accurate information on deaths in Iraq."

Since 2004, the Pentagon has collected data on civilian deaths in incidents where coalition forces were involved. According to its August civilian-casualty report, those figures show that the daily civilian death rate has increased nearly sixfold, to almost 120 this summer from about 20 in early 2004. The Lancet study cites the Pentagon's numbers to back its own findings, saying the mortality-rate increases in both tabulations closely parallel one another.

Write to Neil King Jr. at neil.king@wsj.com1

Iraqi Dead May Total 600,000, Study Says (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 10 — A team of American and Iraqi public health researchers has estimated that 600,000 civilians have died in violence across Iraq since the 2003 American invasion, the highest estimate ever for the toll of the war here.

The figure breaks down to about 15,000 violent deaths a month, a number that is quadruple the one for July given by Iraqi government hospitals and the morgue in Baghdad and published last month in a United Nations report in Iraq. That month was the highest for Iraqi civilian deaths since the American invasion.

But it is an estimate and not a precise count, and researchers acknowledged a margin of error that ranged from 426,369 to 793,663 deaths.

It is the second study by researchers from the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health. It uses samples of casualties from Iraqi households to extrapolate an overall figure of 601,027 Iraqis dead from violence between March 2003 and July 2006.

The findings of the previous study, published in The Lancet, a British medical journal, in 2004, had been criticized as high, in part because of its relatively narrow sampling of about 1,000 families, and because it carried a large margin of error.

The new study is more representative, its researchers said, and the sampling is broader: it surveyed 1,849 Iraqi families in 47 different neighborhoods across Iraq. The selection of geographical areas in 18 regions across Iraq was based on population size, not on the level of violence, they said.

The study comes at a sensitive time for the Iraqi government, which is under pressure from American officials to take action against militias driving the sectarian killings.

In the last week of September, the government barred the central morgue in Baghdad and the Health Ministry — the two main sources of information for civilian deaths — from releasing figures to the news media. Now, only the government is allowed to release figures. It has not provided statistics for September, though a spokesman said Tuesday that it would.

The American military has disputed the Iraqi figures, saying that they are far higher than the actual number of deaths from the insurgency and sectarian violence, in part because they include natural deaths and deaths from ordinary crime, like domestic violence.

But the military has not released figures of its own, giving only percentage comparisons. For example, it cited a 46 percent drop in the murder rate in Baghdad in August from July as evidence of the success of its recent sweeps. At a briefing on Monday, the military's spokesman declined to characterize the change for September.

DOJ_NMG_0078824

The military has released rough counts of average numbers of Iraqis killed and wounded in a quarterly accounting report mandated by Congress. In the report, "Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq," daily averages of dead and wounded Iraqi civilians, soldiers and police officers rose from 26 a day in 2004 to almost 120 a day in August 2006.

The study uses a method similar to that employed in estimates of casualty figures in other conflict areas like Darfur and Congo. It sought to measure the number of deaths that occurred as a result of the war.

It argues that absolute numbers of dead, like morgue figures, could not give a full picture of the "burden of conflict on an entire population," because they were often incomplete.

The mortality rate before the American invasion was about 5.5 people per 1,000 per year, the study found. That rate rose to 19.8 deaths per 1,000 people in the year ending in June.

Gunshots were the largest cause of death, the study said, at 56 percent of all violent deaths, while car bombs accounted for about 13 percent. Deaths caused by the American military declined as an overall percentage from March 2003 to June 2006.

Violent deaths have soared since the American invasion, but the rise is in part a matter of spotty statistical history. Under Saddam Hussein, the state had a monopoly on killing, and the deaths of thousands of Iraqi Shiites and Kurds that it caused were never counted.

While the near collapse of the Iraqi state makes precise record-keeping difficult, authorities have made considerable progress toward tracking death figures. In 2004, when the Johns Hopkins study was first released, authorities were still compiling deaths on an ad hoc basis. But by this year, they were being provided regularly.

Iraqi authorities say morgue counts are more accurate than is generally thought. Iraqis prefer to bury their dead immediately, and hurry bodies of loved ones to plots near mosques or, in the case of Shiites, in sacred burial sites. Even so, they have strong incentives to register the death with a central morgue or hospital in order to obtain a death certificate, required at highway checkpoints, by cemetery workers, and for government pensions. Death certificates are counted in the statistics kept by morgues around the country.

The most recent United Nations figure, 3,009 Iraqis killed in violence across the country in August, was compiled by statistics from Baghdad's central morgue, and from hospitals and morgues countrywide. It assumes a daily rate of about 97.

The figure is not exhaustive. A police official at Yarmouk Hospital in Baghdad who spoke on the condition of anonymity said he had seen nationwide counts provided to the hospital that indicated as many as 200 people a day were dying.

Gilbert Burnham, the principle author of the study, said the figures showed an increase of deaths over time that was similar to that of another civilian casualty project, Iraq Body Count, which collates deaths reported in the news media, and even to that of the military. But even Iraq Body Count puts the maximum number of deaths at just short of 49,000.

As far as skepticism about the death count, he said that counts made by journalists and others focused disproportionately on Baghdad, and that death rates were higher elsewhere.

"We found deaths all over the country," he said. Baghdad was an area of medium violence in the country, he said. The provinces of Diyala and Salahuddin, north of Baghdad, and Anbar to the west, all had higher death rates than the capital.

Statistics experts in the United States who were able to review the study said the methods used by the interviewers looked legitimate.

Robert Blendon, director of the Harvard Program on Public Opinion and Health and Social Policy, said interviewing urban dwellers chosen at random was "the best of what you can expect in a war zone."

But he said the number of deaths in the families interviewed — 547 in the post-invasion period versus 82 in a similar period before the invasion — was too few to extrapolate up to more than 600,000 deaths across the country.

Donald Berry, chairman of biostatistics at M. D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston, was even more troubled by the study, which he said had "a tone of accuracy that's just inappropriate."

Study Claims Iraq's 'Excess' Death Toll Has Reached 655,000 (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078825

A team of American and Iraqi epidemiologists estimates that 655,000 more people have died in Iraq since coalition forces arrived in March 2003 than would have died if the invasion had not occurred.

The estimate, produced by interviewing residents during a random sampling of households throughout the country, is far higher than ones produced by other groups, including Iraq's government.

It is more than 20 times the estimate of 30,000 civilian deaths that President Bush gave in a speech in December. It is more than 10 times the estimate of roughly 50,000 civilian deaths made by the British-based Iraq Body Count research group.

The surveyors said they found a steady increase in mortality since the invasion, with a steeper rise in the last year that appears to reflect a worsening of violence as reported by the U.S. military, the news media and civilian groups. In the year ending in June, the team calculated Iraq's mortality rate to be roughly four times what it was the year before the war.

Of the total 655,000 estimated "excess deaths," 601,000 resulted from violence and the rest from disease and other causes, according to the study. This is about 500 unexpected violent deaths per day throughout the country.

The survey was done by Iraqi physicians and overseen by epidemiologists at Johns Hopkins University's Bloomberg School of Public Health. The findings are being published online today by the British medical journal the Lancet.

The same group in 2004 published an estimate of roughly 100,000 deaths in the first 18 months after the invasion. That figure was much higher than expected, and was controversial. The new study estimates that about 500,000 more Iraqis, both civilian and military, have died since then -- a finding likely to be equally controversial.

Both this and the earlier study are the only ones to estimate mortality in Iraq using scientific methods. The technique, called "cluster sampling," is used to estimate mortality in famines and after natural disasters.

While acknowledging that the estimate is large, the researchers believe it is sound for numerous reasons. The recent survey got the same estimate for immediate post-invasion deaths as the early survey, which gives the researchers confidence in the methods. The great majority of deaths were also substantiated by death certificates.

"We're very confident with the results," said Gilbert Burnham, a Johns Hopkins physician and epidemiologist.

A Defense Department spokesman did not comment directly on the estimate.

"The Department of Defense always regrets the loss of any innocent life in Iraq or anywhere else," said Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros. "The coalition takes enormous precautions to prevent civilian deaths and injuries."

He added that "it would be difficult for the U.S. to precisely determine the number of civilian deaths in Iraq as a result of insurgent activity. The Iraqi Ministry of Health would be in a better position, with all of its records, to provide more accurate information on deaths in Iraq."

Ronald Waldman, an epidemiologist at Columbia University who worked at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention for many years, called the survey method "tried and true," and added that "this is the best estimate of mortality we have."

This viewed was echoed by Sarah Leah Whitson, an official of Human Rights Watch in New York, who said, "We have no reason to question the findings or the accuracy" of the survey.

"I expect that people will be surprised by these figures," she said. "I think it is very important that, rather than questioning them, people realize there is very, very little reliable data coming out of Iraq."

The survey was conducted between May 20 and July 10 by eight Iraqi physicians organized through Mustansiriya University in Baghdad. They visited 1,849 randomly selected households that had an average of seven members each. One person in each household was asked about deaths in the 14 months before the invasion and in the period after.

The interviewers asked for death certificates 87 percent of the time; when they did, more than 90 percent of households produced certificates.

According to the survey results, Iraq's mortality rate in the year before the invasion was 5.5 deaths per 1,000 people; in the post-invasion period it was 13.3 deaths per 1,000 people per year. The difference between these rates was used to calculate "excess deaths."

Of the 629 deaths reported, 87 percent occurred after the invasion. A little more than 75 percent of the dead were men, with a greater male preponderance after the invasion. For violent post-invasion deaths, the male-to-female ratio was 10-to-1, with most victims between 15 and 44 years old.

DOJ_NMG_0078826

Gunshot wounds caused 56 percent of violent deaths, with car bombs and other explosions causing 14 percent, according to the survey results. Of the violent deaths that occurred after the invasion, 31 percent were caused by coalition forces or airstrikes, the respondents said.

Burnham said that the estimate of Iraq's pre-invasion death rate -- 5.5 deaths per 1,000 people -- found in both of the Hopkins surveys was roughly the same estimate used by the CIA and the U.S. Census Bureau. He said he believes that attests to the accuracy of his team's results.

He thinks further evidence of the survey's robustness is that the steepness of the upward trend it found in excess deaths in the last two years is roughly the same tendency found by other groups -- even though the actual numbers differ greatly.

An independent group of researchers and biostatisticians based in England produces the Iraq Body Count. It estimates that there have been 44,000 to 49,000 civilian deaths since the invasion. An Iraqi nongovernmental organization estimated 128,000 deaths between the invasion and July 2005.

The survey cost about $50,000 and was paid for by Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Center for International Studies.

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

3 U.S. Marines, 2 Soldiers Die In Iraq (AP)

AP, October 11, 2006

Three U.S. Marines and two soldiers were killed in fighting in Iraq, the U.S. command said Wednesday. The Marines, assigned to 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, died Monday from enemy action in Iraq's western Anbar province, the military said in a statement. It did not provide further details.

Also Monday, a U.S. soldier was killed when his patrol was attacked by insurgents in an eastern part of Baghdad, the military said.

The second soldier, attached to the 25th Combat Aviation Brigade, died of wounds from an explosion during a vehicle patrol Sunday north of the city of Tikrit.

No further details were available, and the soldiers' names were being withheld pending notification of family.

U.S. Troops Often Need Iraqi Approval To Act (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 11, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi military forces battling militias in Baghdad often must seek permission from Iraq's government before launching even routine missions, complicating efforts to loosen the grip of religious violence in the capital.

Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, commander of the 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, which patrols northwest Baghdad, said the requirements have made some operations difficult but so far haven't limited his unit's ability to fight the enemy.

“I have been able to exercise and execute everything we've wanted to do,” Smiley said. “Now, how easy that's been to get through the approval process, we could debate that endlessly. Sometimes those things are difficult.”

The U.S. military has said its main focus now is securing Baghdad, where religious killings and militia violence is the main threat. Tackling militias is a sensitive matter for Iraq's Shiite-dominated government.

One of the largest Shiite militias, the Mahdi Army, is loyal to Muqtada al-Sadr, a radical cleric whose forces have battled the American military. Today, al-Sadr's political organization is a key part of the coalition government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Al-Sadr's organization controls 30 seats in Parliament and four Cabinet posts.

“The government, in a sense, is talking about taking on some of the very elements that support it,” said Andrew Krepinevich of the Washington-based Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

Riyad al-Nouri, a senior member of al-Sadr's political organization, said al-Sadr has denounced the killings. “These accusations are false and aimed at ruining this great movement,” he said.

The U.S. military says it needs approval before entering government offices and mosques and before targeting high-ranking Shiite leaders suspected of militia ties. U.S. troops won't conduct major operations into Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum in Baghdad, without al-Maliki's approval, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. spokesman in Iraq, said last week. “The Iraqi security forces, with coalition forces in support, will conduct operations there whenever the prime minister so dictates," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0078827

The political considerations have complicated matters for troops operating in Baghdad. 1st Sgt. John Blue of the 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment said the Baghdad battle is far different from his experience in the northern cities of Tal Afar and Mosul in 2004. In Baghdad, soldiers are operating "not only under the guidance of your command, but under the guidance of the government of Iraq as well."

Government spokesman Ali al-Dabagh said the al-Maliki government is not protecting allies when it disapproves target requests. "The government is behaving as a sovereign and legitimate government and is taking proper action to prosecute anyone who violates the law," he said.

He said al-Sadr has called for an end to the violence, and that rogue gunmen posing as Mahdi militants are carrying out the killings.

The al-Maliki government is attempting to reach a political settlement with militias. But some officers think a direct confrontation with the Mahdi Army may be inevitable.

"At some point, from the coalition side, we have to say (the Mahdi Army) is a terrorist organization that must be dealt with by the Iraqi government and the U.S.," said Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, head of the Iraqi Assistance Group. The Mahdi Army "hasn't seen the full weight of what we could put on them."

DNA Shows Dead Man Was Al-Qaida Militant (AP)

By David Rising

AP, October 11, 2006

DNA tests have confirmed that a man shot to death by British forces was a leading al-Qaida militant who embarrassed the U.S. military by making an unprecedented escape from a maximum-security military prison in Afghanistan, the U.S. command said Tuesday.

Omar al-Farouq was shot and killed Sept. 25 after he opened fire on British forces during a raid on his home in Basra, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad.

British forces had said at the time that they had hoped to capture the suspect, but had returned fire on him when he started shooting at them.

"After taking photographs and gathering DNA evidence from the individual, ground forces left the suspected terrorist remains at the site," the U.S. military said. "It was later determined through DNA gathered the individual killed was Omar al-Farouq."

Al-Farouq, who allegedly led al-Qaida's Southeast Asia operations, had slipped into Iraq three months earlier, according to police. It was not known why al-Farouq fled to Iraq, but officials have said he was born in Kuwait to Iraqi parents and may have had roots in the area.

He and three other al-Qaida suspects escaped from Bagram, in central Afghanistan, in July 2005, picking locks and navigating a minefield, then evading a massive manhunt.

The escaped prisoners later appeared in a video sent to the Dubai-based television station Al-Arabiya and boasted of their feat.

The Pentagon waited until November to confirm his escape and the delay upset Indonesia, which had arrested al-Farouq in 2002 and turned him over to the United States.

Al-Farouq has been linked to thwarted plots on U.S. embassies in Southeast Asia, and is alleged to have been a key link between al-Qaida and regional terrorists.

On hearing the initial reports of his death, his Indonesia wife said she almost fainted, but then wondered if the news was true. "I still have faith he is still alive," Mira Agustina told el-Shinta radio at the time.

GOP Senator Wants Iraq War Policy Change (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078828

Sen. Olympia Snowe joined a growing list of Republicans calling for a change of course in Iraq, a position that could undermine President Bush's election-year assertion that the nation shouldn't set a timetable for troops to come home.

Snowe, a moderate who often bucks the Republican Party line, said in a statement Tuesday more should be done to pressure the Iraqis to take control of their country and make clear U.S. support is not unlimited.

Her remarks echoed those of Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., who last week said Congress should reconsider its options if the security situation — which he described as dire — does not improve in the next couple of months.

Warner is not up for re-election, while Snowe is, although she is considered a shoo-in.

As the Nov. 7 elections inch closer, more and more Republicans have grown louder in expressing their opposition to the White House's handling of the war, which remains unpopular with voters and a thorn in the side of Republicans struggling to maintain control of Congress.

Among those voicing their disappointment with the war are Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, along with Reps. Christopher Shays of Connecticut and Walter Jones of North Carolina.

"As conditions in Iraq continue to worsen, there must be no question among the administration, the Congress and the Iraqi unity government that staying the course is neither an option nor a plan," Snowe said Tuesday.

Last year, the Senate overwhelmingly passed a measure championed by Warner that labeled 2006 the year of transition in Iraq. But a spike in U.S. casualties and ethnic violence kept troop numbers high with no chance troops will return home in large numbers by the time voters head to the poll.

Iraqi Airport Hopes To Land Tourists, NASA (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

There's at least one optimist in Iraq these days.

The Kurds are building a new $300 million airport in Irbil that will take the biggest aircraft in the world, including the Russian Antonov 225 cargo plane and the American C-5 Galaxy, which is so big that the Wright brothers could have made their entire flight within its cargo bay.

The Kurds are hoping their dramatic mountain region, the one tranquil part of Iraq, will become a tourist haven as well as a transit refueling stop for international carriers between Europe and Asia or Australia.

But Kurdistan Regional Government Civil Aviation Director Zaid Zwain hopes the airport, scheduled for completion next year, will intrigue another potential customer: NASA.

When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's military aircraft developed technical problems in Irbil last week, Zwain took advantage of the two-hour delay to tell U.S. officials and journalists about his goal of becoming a backup landing strip for NASA shuttles for emergency landings.

The runway will be about three miles long -- just a bit longer than the length required by the space shuttle, he told members of the U.S. delegation. "If you have any trouble," Zwain offered, "you can land here free of charge."

Enlistment Success Story (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

Critics of the Iraq war often slam the Bush Administration for sending unwitting American soldiers off to an unwinnable battle. The question is: On whose behalf are these concerned folks speaking?

Not the military, judging from the impressive recruitment and retention numbers for the armed forces just released by the Defense Department. The Pentagon announced yesterday that in fiscal 2006 the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines all met or exceeded active-duty recruitment goals. More impressive, the number of active duty servicemen who re-enlisted exceeded the DoD's goals in every area. Looks like many troops believe in the mission enough to willingly return to a difficult battlefield.

As much as these numbers speak to patriotism, they also say something about the Defense Department's efforts to modernize its recruitment and retention program. This year's achievements are in contrast to 2005, when the Army fell about 6,600 recruits short of its goal of 80,000. Since then, services have added recruiters, revamped advertising and made a greater effort to reach out to the families of potential or acting servicemen, as spouses and relatives often help with decisions to enlist or re-enlist. The retention numbers are particularly important for the Pentagon because these experienced servicemen train the next generation.

DOJ_NMG_0078829

Critics took an immediate swipe at the new numbers, arguing that the Army had raised recruits' maximum allowable age to 42 from 35. Yet it turns out a tiny fraction -- maybe 500 -- of new soldiers fall into that category.

The other standard complaint is that the military meets its goals because it offers cash bonuses. But these youngsters had a choice in FY 2006: The military's recruitment success took place in a period of strong economic growth that offered young people ever greater civilian job opportunities. Anyway, given how fierce the competition is for talent, the military would be derelict to not offer competitive incentives to get the best young Americans.

Many of those young people, despite the luxury of choice, have decided to ship off to boot camp and join the world's finest all-volunteer military force. It'd be nice if a few more politicians and pundits respected their decision.

Data Suggests Vast Costs Loom In Disability Claims (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

Nearly one in five soldiers leaving the military after serving in Iraq and Afghanistan has been at least partly disabled as a result of service, according to documents of the Department of Veterans Affairs obtained by a Washington research group.

The number of veterans granted disability compensation, more than 100,000 to date, suggests that taxpayers have only begun to pay the long-term financial cost of the two conflicts. About 567,000 of the 1.5 million American troops who have served so far have been discharged.

“The trend is ominous,” said Paul Sullivan, director of programs for Veterans for America, an advocacy group, and a former V.A. analyst.

Mr. Sullivan said that if the current proportions held up over time, 400,000 returning service members could eventually apply for disability benefits when they retired.

About 2.6 million veterans were receiving disability compensation as of 2005, according to testimony to Congress by the V.A. The largest group of recipients is from the Vietnam era. Of the 1.1 million who served in the Middle East during the Persian Gulf war in 1991, 291,740 have been granted disability compensation.

The documents on the current conflicts provide no details on the type of disabilities claimed by veterans. Most were found to be 30 percent disabled or less, and one in 10 recipients was found to be 100 percent disabled. Payments run from a few hundred dollars to more than $1,000 a month depending on the severity of the disability.

A separate V.A. health care report shows that the most common treatments sought by recently discharged troops are for musculoskeletal disorders like back pain, followed by mental disorders, notably post traumatic stress disorder. About 30,000 Iraq and Afghanistan veterans have sought treatment for post traumatic stress, which afflicts soldiers who have been under fire or in prolonged danger of attack.

A V.A. spokesman, Terry Jemison, said “service-related” disabilities could include an amputation as the result of a bomb injury or a case of diabetes or heart disease that was first diagnosed or found to get worse while in uniform. Mr. Jemison said officials had no cost projections for disability payments to Iraq and Afghanistan veterans.

The documents were obtained under the Freedom of Information Act by the National Security Archive at George Washington University.

The documents show that 37 percent of active duty veterans have filed for disability compensation, compared with 20 percent of those who served with National Guard or Reserve units. Also, 18 percent of claims filed by Guard and Reserve soldiers are denied, compared with 8 percent of those filed by active duty troops.

The report offered no explanation for the differences, but veterans’ advocates said efforts to explain V.A. procedures might be better for those leaving active duty than those offered to reservists.

“The Guard and reservists may be falling through the cracks at a higher rate,” said Joseph A. Violante, national legislative director for Disabled American Veterans. “The V.A. needs to study why there’s a difference.”

DOJ_NMG_0078830

Mr. Violante, a Vietnam veteran, said young soldiers returning from war often shrugged off their injuries and did not necessarily seek compensation right away. "But as they get older," he said, "and their injuries cause them more problems, then they're more likely to file."

In recent years, disability compensation programs have seen a number of changes that are likely to increase the filing of claims by veterans.

Congress told the V.A. last year to advertise the availability of compensation to veterans in states where payments had been disproportionately low, a program that the agency has predicted will attract nearly 100,000 new applicants.

3rd Iraq Death Has One Town Shaken To Core (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

HIGHLAND, N.Y.

When Eugene Williams was killed by a suicide bomber north of Najaf, Iraq, on March 29, 2003, the grief was shadowed by what looked like a cruel accident of history. Only 11 days later, Baghdad fell. If he had lived a few more days, people thought, the war would have been over.

When Doron Chan died on March 18, 2004, after his vehicle turned over near Balad, it seemed too much to bear. This Hudson River town of 10,000 had accounted for three of the 58,000 servicemen lost in Vietnam. Now two of its sons were among what was then 600 lost in Iraq? How could that be?

But when Pfc. Michael K. Oremus — "Mikey O" to his friends — was killed by a sniper bullet in Baghdad on Oct. 2, the numbers lost all meaning, washed away by tears: Jimmy Ventriglia crying all 45 minutes of his drive to coach soccer at West Point, Kevin Brennie unable to pull himself together when he heard the news at the town hall, tears and more tears at the wake here yesterday.

Death is more tornado than hurricane, picking its spots with capricious malice, but a third soldier gone, Mikey O, in this close-knit throwback of a town, Grover's Corners on the Hudson, seemed particularly beyond grief, beyond pain, beyond knowing.

"You have to understand, all the relationships here are so layered," said Peter Harris, who coached Mr. Oremus on the high school soccer team and taught him English. "You know people, you know their brothers and their parents, you know them for generations. So I held Michael when he was a baby, I played with him when he was 2 or 3, I coached him in high school, I played soccer with him after he graduated, as a friend. You don't experience that most places in the world. But you do here."

In this Ulster County town of deep ties and long memories, where family and soccer are two of the most enduring threads, few family names mean more than Oremus. Michael's older brothers, Eric and Richard, were soccer stalwarts. His parents, Madeline and Bruce, were universally admired. And when Bruce Oremus, who coached youth soccer teams in Highland and taught special education nearby in New Paltz, died of cancer in 1995, everyone in town shared the pain.

Many also shared the job of raising Michael, then 11 years old, a small, thin boy with a shock of blond hair. The Oremus family's kid brother became something of the town's kid brother as well. And if part of that meant developing a bit of moxie to be able to stand up to bigger brothers and bigger kids, he did it in spades. Despite his size, Michael was the kind of kid who would put on the goalie's gloves in practice and dare teammates, dare them, to kick one by him. The one in any group who would be first to vote yes on whatever plan was in the offing.

After graduating from high school in 2002, and a short stint studying at Dutchess Community College and doing odd jobs, he had a surprise announcement for his soccer buddies. He would not be playing with them next year. He had joined the Army to become a military policeman, a job that almost certainly meant hazardous duty in Iraq.

Some were scared for him, but they were impressed as well. "When he told me, I was shocked," said Mr. Brennie, who runs a pizza parlor where Mr. Oremus worked and who serves on the Town Council. "I thought, this kid has way more guts than anyone ever realized."

After he enlisted in February 2005, he came back from training beaming — buff, grown up, his post-graduation uncertainty washed away by the rigor and mission of military life. While many here worried over every casualty report on the radio, others felt oddly insulated. They figured Highland had already overpaid its bill to the god of war. “We had lost two people already,” said his best friend, Jacob Brett. “It seemed impossible to me we could lose anyone else.”

DOJ_NMG_0078831

When the impossible happened, some could not separate one town’s tragedy from a nation’s. “Highland should not send another soldier to Iraq,” one woman told the local newspaper, The Mid-Hudson Post Pioneer. Mr. Brett said neither he nor Mr. Oremus had been political, but the death had changed him. “I hope this does make people look differently at the war,” Mr. Brett said. “I don’t want any other people to go through what we’re going through.”

But for most, for now, the grief has obliterated the larger debate over the war. For the people in Highland, like generations before them, it is about young people who died much too soon, about families having to cope with too much and, this time, about a burden no town should have to bear.

On the road into town, there are war memorials from the Civil War to Vietnam. The flagpole and monument in front of the Methodist church honors those who served and those who died “in the Great War of the Nations,” the quaint coinage before World War I merited a Roman numeral. And today, people say, the funeral for Mikey O, dead at 21, could be the biggest in town history.

“All three of them died so young,” said Mr. Brennie. “They had so much to offer, so much they wanted to achieve, and it was all ripped away.”

In Marine's Death, Clues To A Son's Life (WP)

By Dan Morse

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

Gilda Carbonaro pulled her car to a stop inside Arlington National Cemetery, stepping out to visit the freshly dug grave of her only child, Alex.

With her was a broad-shouldered Marine, limping from a leg shattered in battle, who towered a foot over Gilda. The Marine hadn't known Alex well but held precious clues about the person he had become.

Gilda had many questions. She and her husband had raised Alex in a world different from the military's -- the protected streets of Bethesda. Alex graduated from a Quaker high school, then stunned them by enlisting in the Marine Corps.

Gilda trusted he would serve out his initial five-year commitment, come home and go to college. Instead, he reenlisted, earning a spot in one of the Marines' elite reconnaissance units, called Recon, which operate deep inside enemy territory. That took Alex on two tours in Iraq, a war Gilda had spent two years trying to end.

On May 1, a roadside bomb tore through Alex's Humvee, setting him and two of his men on fire. He died 10 days later in a military hospital in Germany in the arms of his mom, his dad, his wife of not quite 12 months and his mother-in-law.

Alex remains the only service member listed from Bethesda killed in Iraq or Afghanistan. He was 28.

His grave in sight, Gilda -- a 56-year-old school teacher -- wrestled with unyielding grief, and with a mother's need to understand her son. The Marine walking with Gilda was a sergeant, like Alex. They placed flowers on Alex's grave, doing the same at the nearby grave of one of Alex's men. They walked to a big tree and sat down.

"Have you read the Recon Creed?" the Marine asked. "We live by that."The Corps Over College

Alex was a tough read, even as a kid. Private and headstrong, he tended to reveal big decisions only after he had made them.

The world around him couldn't have been more focused on college. In 2000, according to U.S. Census data, Bethesda held more degrees per capita than any place in the country with more than 50,000 people.

Gilda held a master's in linguistics from Georgetown University. She taught Spanish at two of the area's top prep schools, first Holton-Arms, then St. Albans. Alex's father, Fulvio, a native of Italy with a master's in computer science, consulted at financial institutions in developing nations around the world.

The couple tried not to smother their only child. When he was 12, Gilda walked him through their neighborhood, helping line up friends who needed lawns mowed. Alex spent $300 of his earnings on a watch for his dad.

DOJ_NMG_0078832

Alex spelled poorly, shaking his confidence as he advanced in school. Seeking smaller classes, his parents enrolled him at Sandy Spring Friends School, an eclectic prep school where students call teachers by their first names and are exposed to the Quaker tenets of peace and pacifism.

Alex applied himself to only what interested him -- Russian history, Brazilian history, creative writing -- and posted erratic grades reflecting that. He came to see college as a place others headed simply to get a degree. Without studying, he posted an SAT score high enough to give him a good shot at Georgetown.

Gilda handed him an application. "You'll have the most fun you've had in your life," she said.

Alex began to fill it out but halted at a section he viewed as phony. "This is when the person applying to college writes these essays saying what wonderful people they are," Gilda recalled him saying. "I'm not doing that."

Alex stood a wafer-thin 5 feet 7 inches tall, making it that much more shocking when he told his parents that he had enlisted after high school. The three drove to the Marine recruiting office in Rockville. "You can live a year of your life wasting time," the recruiter told them. "Or you can live it, planning every minute of it, and living it well."

To Gilda, it sounded like a standard spiel for parents. But part of it reflected her beliefs. "The unexamined life is not worth living," she thought.

Alex's decision stunned friends. He was the kid playing Dungeons & Dragons, the garage-band guitarist, the high-schooler squeezed into a booth at TGI Friday's, sucking down cigarettes and endless cups of coffee. He told them that he wanted to be financially free, to travel, to become stronger. "You know what," he told buddy Jon Codell, cutting off his concerns, "I think it's honorable."

Alex shipped off for boot camp at Parris Island in summer 1998. His parents soaked up his letters.

"My first shot was in the 2-ring center and to the left," Alex wrote. He had to nail seven bull's-eyes from 500 yards in his final seven shots. He did, "and so now I can move on in boot camp."

After graduating, Alex was sent to Japan to maintain electronic components of Marine aircraft.

"Hi Bug," Gilda e-mailed, addressing him by a nickname she had coined when he was a baby. "Well, so it's Lance Corporal now. Fantastic! What is the rank that follows it? Some sort of sergeant?"

"What follows lance Corporal is Corporal," Alex responded. "A lance Corporal is just a Corporal without a horse. I learned that yesterday. From the sound of it, most LCPL's don't get their horse for about three years in this particular occupation."

The Marines sent him to an Air National Guard base in New York. Then terrorists struck the Pentagon and World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001. The world seemed to be going to hell, Alex told a high school friend, and he wanted to get in the middle of it. Apart from that, he had never become the Marine he envisioned. He reenlisted, setting his sights on Recon. Fewer than one in five make it.

Gilda suggested having the Marines send him to college so he would come out an officer: "Doesn't it make sense to seek a commission?"

"So I can be stacking papers and signing things while my men are in the field?" Alex responded. "I don't think so."'I Struggle With Myself'

Gilda and Fulvio fully supported removing Afghanistan's Taliban government. Given time, Fulvio thought, the United States would lead poorer nations toward democracy. "I am now convinced I was wrong," he e-mailed friends a month after the Iraq invasion.

A year later, Gilda and Fulvio thought the United States shouldn't pull out. Then, for Gilda, came a growing sense that staying was doing more harm. In spring 2004, she joined Military Families Speak Out.

She placed a sign in her living room window: "Bring The Troops Home Now." She kept postcards in her purse calling for withdrawal and slipped them onto windshields in downtown Bethesda. She went to rallies, visited members of Congress. She sent Alex articles on such topics as the challenges of reconstructing Iraq.

"I struggle with myself in deciding whether or not to send you these things," she wrote. "Obviously I want you to have total conviction in what you are doing. To me, this conviction translates to your safety. But another part of me is convinced the more knowledge you have, the better off, the safer you'll be."

DOJ_NMG_0078833

Alex kept training for Recon. At home one weekend, he and Bethesda friend Andy Huff jogged to Bradley Hills Elementary School. Alex reached for a chin-up bar, knocking out 20. He took a quick break and did nearly 20 more. "Whoa," Huff remembers telling him. "That's pretty crazy."

In September 2004, as part of a Recon battalion with the motto "Swift, Silent, Deadly," Alex shipped off to Iraq.'Enough of the Politics'

Two months later, Gilda heard from Alex's fiancee. A bomb had blown up under Alex's Humvee, sending shrapnel into his foot and laying him up in a field hospital outside Fallujah.

"Mom, Mom, Mom," he said over the phone. "I don't want you to make a big deal out of this. I don't want anybody out there thinking, 'Oh, poor Alex, poor Alex.' "

He asked his parents to visit a wounded buddy at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda. While there, they met other Marines, too, including one blinded by a gunshot who asked what Alex did.

"He's Recon," Gilda said.

"Recon. They're crazy, ma'am."

She asked what he meant.

"They have no fear," he said.

Gilda and Fulvio also met Frank Delgado, the tall Recon Marine who two years later would go with Gilda to Alex's grave. Three metal rings surrounded Delgado's lower left leg, and rods descended into his bones. He told the Carbonaros that he had just seen Alex. He was okay, and Delgado told them how lucky he was: Alex soon would be fighting alongside his buddies, not laid up worrying about them.

Gilda began visiting the hospital weekly. She also learned of Marines in boot camp who didn't get mail. She wrote them, trying to lift their spirits.

She sent Alex cookies, cakes, books, articles. She tried to engage him in campaign discussions.

"Enough of the politics," Alex e-mailed her from Iraq.

A month later, a red bouquet arrived for Gilda. "Happy Birthday," the card read. "Just know that I am doing OK. I love you. Alex."Joining in Protests

May 28, 2005, was his wedding day.

At 11:30 a.m. he walked downstairs in his dress-blue uniform, a row of five medals, including a purple heart, hanging on his chest.

"Wait a minute," Gilda said. "The wedding is at 3, Alex."

He wanted to join six other Marines at the church to practice a ceremony in which he and his bride would walk under an arch of swords.

The newlyweds settled outside a Recon base in North Carolina. Selected as team leader, Alex was in charge of five younger Marines. It was down there, between his deployments, that Alex searched the Internet for his mom's name.

At the rallies, Gilda hadn't mentioned Alex's name. She had rarely mentioned hers. Still, as Alex could see, she had certainly been active. At a rally in Washington, a speaker saw Gilda, calling out her name. She spoke in Philadelphia. And just before Alex had left on his first tour, she spoke by phone to a reporter with Radio Free Europe.

"I can't let my son see how upset I am," she said in an online version of the story. "How do you turn around and tell your son: 'Your president, he made a mistake. You need to abandon your men.' You don't tell your child that."

Alex didn't like it. "Keep a low profile," he told Gilda.

She did. As Gilda wrote senators and friends, she stacked copies in a box, hoping one day to give them to Alex.

"How did the pistol shooting go? . . . What's the mood like in the country at least as far as Marines are concerned about the way things are going in Iraq?" she e-mailed from Italy.

"Political-wise marines are marines," he wrote back, "and will always just talk about the last time they went over there or the next time they may have to go."Part of the Family

By April this year, Alex was back in Iraq for his second tour. "Hi guys," he wrote to his parents April 28. "I'm doing fine. I really haven't been in [camp] a lot. Maybe five days since I've been here. . . . I will get a hold of you soon. Alex."

DOJ_NMG_0078834

Four days later, Gilda heard a knock on her classroom door. The chaplain asked her to her office. "It's Alex, isn't it?" Gilda asked.

Within days, she stood outside Alex's hospital room in Germany, being asked to put on a gown, rubber gloves, a mask and a hair cap. She walked in. Alex was hooked to a respirator. Bandages covered all but small patches of his darkened face.

"Don't worry," Gilda told him. "Everyone says you've been such a fighter, how tough you are. You have the best doctors, baby. You're going to be just fine."

Alex couldn't respond. "You've had more Masses than the pope," his wife told him, forcing a smile in her voice. Alex's mom broke for the door, screaming as she reached the hall.

Two weeks later, Alex's parents, his widow and his in-laws sat in a front row at Washington National Cathedral. More than 700 mourners sat behind them -- relatives, friends, Marines, St. Albans boys in their coats and ties.

Jeff Corwon, a Marine, walked to the lectern, his lower lip quivering, his back ramrod straight. He spoke of Alex's dedication. He turned to Alex's parents.

"Mr. and Mrs. Carbonaro, in your eyes Alex may have been an only child," he said, his voice halting. "But through your eyes, you may not have seen how good of a brother he was of mine."

It was the kind of language they had heard for weeks -- over the phone from North Carolina, in Germany, in Washington setting up the funeral: You are part of our family.

That evening, friends and relatives gathered at the Carbonaros'. Carloads of Marines pulled up, parking near Gilda's Bring The Troops Home sign. Inside, they stood in clumps, telling stories about Alex and smiling. Gilda kept approaching. They offered to do anything for her -- now, 20 years from now. "We're going to get together again, right?" she asked.

Absolutely, they said.

Online, she found tributes: "Many times, I went to Alex for ideas and advice on how to accomplish a task," wrote his platoon commander, Lt. Tommy Waller, "never walking away without a better plan than the one I had started with."

Gilda also found the Recon Creed, which offers its own tenets for life: Sacrifice comfort. Complete the mission. "A Recon Marine can speak without saying a word," it closes, "and achieve what others can only imagine."

Alex's widow, who is also named Gilda, told his parents of her final phone conversation with Alex in late April. She told him that people were praying for him. He told her to thank them. "Tell them to pray for my team, too," he said, adding that if something happened to them, it would be as bad or worse than if it happened to him. Alex also asked his wife to round up information on the veteran's college scholarships they had discussed. He planned to leave the Corps next year.

Alex's mom read the book "One Bullet Away," written by a Recon officer. In battle, he wrote, Recon operated in such small units that its team leaders were "the battalion's backbone."The Bombing Closer to home, two Marine veterans of the Iraq war check on Gilda and Fulvio. Sometimes they bring Italian wine, staying for dinner. "There's a bit of Alex in all of us," Delgado, who just retired from the Corps, told them last month.

Alex's full unit is due home this month, with members planning to visit Arlington. Gilda has invited many of them over. She and Fulvio want to meet Marines such as David Drexler, the last known person to hear Alex speak.

After the blast, he wrestled Alex to the ground, damping out flames with his gloved hands. He wrapped Alex in a gel-lined blanket, laid him on his back and propped Alex's head on his leg as they waited for the helicopter. Alex cursed roadside bombs, joking that they had gotten him again. He asked for water.

"Where's Elmo?" Alex asked. "Where's Moss?"

"Doc's working on them now," Drexler said.

"How's Palmer? How's Fulks?"

"Everybody's fine," Drexler said.

Twenty minutes passed. Alex kept asking about his team. Finally, he said his arms felt like they were burning, and his face hurt.

"Okay," Drexler said, knowing he needed morphine. "I'm going to call for Doc."

Chief Of The Army Says U.S. Needs Consensus To Combat Terrorism (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0078835

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, October 11, 2006

WASHINTON - The United States needs to reach a consensus on how to fight terrorists and increase defense spending to make sure the Army stays ready to fight, the Army's chief of staff said Tuesday.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker also called on teachers, parents and other influential adults to encourage young people to serve in the military.

Speaking at the Army's annual convention, Schoomaker said the United States was "much closer to the beginning than the end" of the war on al-Qaida and other terrorists. "Ultimate victory," he said, would require a common understanding of the enemy and the nature of the conflict, plus a "national strategic consensus" on how to address the threat.

"While such a common strategic foundation - understood and accepted by the American people - existed during the Cold War in the form of `containment,' it is not evident that such common understanding exists today," he said.

Schoomaker didn't give specific figures about the amount of defense-spending increases he thought was necessary. He said the Army had learned a "bitter lesson" during the 1990s when 425,000 soldiers were cut from its ranks and expenditures fell to levels unseen since the late 1940s. From the late 1980s until 2001, there was a $100 billion shortfall in investment in new technologies and $56 billion in equipment shortages, Schoomaker said.

Defense spending now is less than 4 percent of U.S. gross domestic product, compared with 38 percent during World War II, 14 percent during the Korean War and 10 percent during the Vietnam War.

"Let there be no mistake: Our soldiers' effectiveness in battle - both today and tomorrow - ultimately depends upon a national commitment to recruit, train, equip and support them and their families properly," he said. "This is a matter of national priorities, not affordability."

Schoomaker, who's nearing the end of his four-year term, said the Army faced a challenge in recruiting enough soldiers to fight in a protracted war.

"We should see our best young people seeking to serve," he said. "America's future depends on it."

The Army missed recruiting targets in 2005. It made its goals in fiscal year 2006, which ended Sept. 30, but had to make some changes, including increasing the maximum age for recruits to 42 and allowing 4 percent of recruits to score in category 4, the lowest level, compared with a previous limit of 2 percent in the lowest category.

Army officials denied that they'd lowered standards. They said the overall Pentagon standard was 4 percent in category 4 and the change brought the Army's standard in line with that.

Army officials said waivers for crimes had increased but that most were for misdemeanors. Waivers for serious crimes are below 1 percent of the total number of recruits, and waivers for drug and alcohol use also remain below 1 percent of the total.

A study last month by the National Priorities Project, a nonprofit group that examines federal spending, found that new recruits in 2005 came primarily from low- and middle-income neighborhoods, and that recruits from households with annual incomes of more than $55,000 were increasingly underrepresented.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bed Bath & Beyond Admits Extensive Options Backdating (WSJ)

By Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. admitted to rampant backdating of stock-option grants as part of a policy to provide extra incentives to insiders, but said an internal probe found no evidence of "willful misconduct."

The detailed mea culpa by the big Union, N.J., retail chain is another demonstration that the options scandal, which has engulfed more than 100 companies, is reaching far beyond Silicon Valley and the technology sector.

MORE ON OPTIONS

• Bed, Bath & Beyond's Oct. 10 filing on options1

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny2

DOJ_NMG_0078836

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage3

Bed Bath & Beyond said its internal probe examining the period from its 1992 initial public offering through May 2006 found that the company had misdated options on 44 occasions, 37 of them in favor of the recipients. In many cases, the probe concluded, executives used "hindsight" to select favorable grant dates in the past when the stock was trading at low points. (Read the text of the company's report on options.4)

The probe criticized the company's options-granting process as deficient in a number of ways, including the practice of allowing its three senior executives to select the dates for their own options grants. It said the responsibility for selecting grant dates rested with its co-founders and current co-chairmen, Leonard Feinstein and Warren Eisenberg, and its current chief executive, Steven H. Temares.

The company said it doesn't intend to restate past financials to record the extra compensation expense associated with the backdated options. Instead, it said it will cut $66 million from the equity portion of its balance sheet, and expects to record another $8 million in expense in its fiscal third quarter. The company also said it is reviewing potential tax implications of the backdated options.

Backdating involves pretending the option was granted at an earlier time when the stock price was lower, thus handing the employee an instant potential profit. Backdating generally is improper or illegal, and can lead to criminal or civil charges, plus accounting problems. The Securities and Exchange Commission is conducting an informal inquiry of Bed Bath & Beyond, the company has said.

While companies such as Apple Computer Inc. recently have provided only bare-bones disclosures about the conclusions of their internal options probes, Bed Bath & Beyond's statement late yesterday gives copious details.

Bed Bath & Beyond Ends Internal Probe (AP)

AP, October 11, 2006

Bed Bath & Beyond Completes Internal Stock Probe, Will Take $8M Charge in 3Q

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. said Tuesday it completed its internal investigation of stock-option practices, and while the home furnishings retailer will not revise past financial statements, it will take an $8 million charge in third quarter.

The Union, N.J.-based retailer said the general and administrative expense charge represents "the total of the first and second quarter charges related to the impact of the revised measurement dates...and the applicable charge for the third quarter," in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The review committee found 31 off-cycle monthly grant dates not made on the 15th of the month as required by the company's policies, and 12 of them were "at notable low prices." Interviews and the documentation reviewed did not explain the selection of the dates, the company said.

"The low prices were suggestive of the use of some hindsight in selecting the low price off-cycle grant dates," according to the filing. However, the committee found no willful misconduct and no intent to mislead auditors.

At least 136 companies have disclosed internal, SEC or Justice Department investigations into the possible backdating of past stock options to artificially inflate their value.

Bed Bath & Beyond also will reclassify $66 million "within the equity section of the consolidated balance sheet to be included in its Form 10-K for the fiscal year ending March 3, 2007." The charge represents the effect of the adjustment resulting from non-cash charges from fiscal 1993 through the second quarter of this year, according to the filing.

"The company is reviewing any potential tax implications relating to the company's stock option grants and restricted share awards, but believes that such matters will not have a material impact on the company's financial position," according to the filing.

Shares of Bed Bath & Beyond dipped 5 cents to $39.88 in after-hours trading, after losing 6 cents to close at $39.93 on the Nasdaq.

2 Ex-Comverse Execs In Plea Discussions (HC)

By Chad Bray, Dow Jones Newswires

DOJ_NMG_0078837

Houston Chronicle, October 11, 2006

NEW YORK — Two former executives of Comverse Technology Inc. are engaged in plea discussions with the U.S. Justice Department to end the criminal fraud case against them, according to court documents filed late last week.

In separate orders filed late Friday, U.S. Magistrate Judge Joan M. Azrack ordered that the time to indict former Comverse finance chief David Kreinberg and ex-senior general counsel William F. Sorin be extended by 30 days to Nov. 8.

According to court documents, Sorin and Kreinberg are engaged in plea negotiations with the U.S. Attorney's office in Brooklyn, which "they believe are likely to result in a disposition of this case without trial."

Kreinberg and Sorin were charged, along with ex-Comverse Chief Executive Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud in August in an alleged scheme to improperly backdate options at the company. The men were charged at the time under a criminal complaint.

Alexander, who was arrested in the African nation Namibia last month, has since been indicted on charges of conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, mail fraud, wire fraud, money laundering and engaging in unlawful monetary transactions. Alexander was granted bail at a hearing last week in Namibia.

The SEC also has separately filed civil charges against the men.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Brooklyn declined comment Tuesday. Lawyers for Sorin and Kreinberg didn't immediately return phone calls for comment on Tuesday.

Prosecutors have alleged that Alexander and others engaged in a scheme to backdate millions of stock options for themselves and other employees when the stock was trading at periodic lows. The improper grants occurred between 1998 and 2002, according to court documents. As a result, Alexander "reaped substantial personal gain" from his alleged conduct, prosecutors said.

Alexander and others allegedly arranged to award new hires with "in-the-money options backdated to days before the new employees were employed by CTI," according to court documents.

The government also has alleged that Alexander and others used fictitious names to generate hundreds of thousands of backdated options, which were parked in a "secret slush fund" designed to evade the requirements of Comverse's stock-option plans. Alexander then unilaterally awarded options from the slush fund to favored employees, according to prosecutors.

The slush fund was first named I.M. Fanton, after "Phantom of the Opera," according to the indictment against Alexander. The earlier criminal complaint said the assistant who helped manage the slush fund named after "Phantom" said the name fit what they were being asked to do: create phantom employees.

The slush fund's name was later changed "Fargo" _ based on the Coen brothers' movie of the same name, according to the indictment. The earlier complaint said the name was changed after thinking better of the wisdom of naming the fund after "Phantom."

Prosecutors are seeking the forfeiture of about $138 million in Alexander's assets, as well as two apartments in Alexander's name in Manhattan, according to court documents.

Subway Series Alive After All: The Legal One (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

Federal Prosecutors in Brooklyn One-Up Prosecutors Across River, Snag More White-Collar Cases

NEW YORK -- Federal prosecutors in Manhattan aren't used to being upstaged. But if Kobi Alexander, the fugitive executive arrested last month in Namibia, makes it stateside to answer stock-option-backdating charges, he will do so across the East River, in a different borough of New York City: Brooklyn.

Ownership of the case -- involving Comverse Technology Inc., which Mr. Alexander co-founded -- is the latest in a string of white-collar cases overseen by the Justice Department's U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn. Known as the Eastern District of New York, its prosecutors lately have gained ground in a friendly, but sometimes-pointed, rivalry with their Southern District counterparts in the borough of Manhattan, who have stumbled recently on a few big cases.

DOJ_NMG_0078838

That rivalry between prosecutors in two of the country's 93 judicial districts is playing out amid a broader competition for business cases that has intensified nationwide since the dot-com collapse. Led by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, and Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, state and local prosecutors also have jockeyed for prominence, sometimes stepping on the toes of regulators, especially at the Securities and Exchange Commission, which has authority to bring only civil cases.

In the criminal realm, the Manhattan U.S. attorney's office is the "old established group that considers itself the best," says Alan Vinegrad, a former Brooklyn U.S. attorney. But now the scrappy underdog is "on the map."

Unwilling to concede much, Steve Peikin, former head of the Manhattan office's securities unit, quips that Brooklyn is a "great second."

The Eastern District's white-collar troops used to focus mainly on Long Island boiler-room operations peddling dicey stocks.

More recently, they were among the first to jump on stock-options backdating, launching probes of Comverse and Cablevision Systems Corp., of Bethpage, N.Y. No charges have been filed in the Cablevision case. Mr. Alexander and two other former Comverse executives were charged with illegally backdating grant dates to days when share prices were low, potentially increasing the options' value. The others pleaded not guilty, but court records show they are in plea-bargain talks. Prosecutors are trying to extradite Mr. Alexander from Namibia, where he is out on bail.

In the spring, the Brooklyn prosecutors secured guilty pleas from three former executives of CA Inc., an Islandia, N.Y., software company. They indicted about a dozen brokers for allegedly trading on information from brokerage giants' communications systems, known as squawk boxes; five pleaded guilty, the rest await trial. The prosecutors also landed guilty pleas in May from nine people for fraudulently boosting circulation at Newsday, a Long Island newspaper owned by Tribune Co. A former FBI agent was sentenced Oct. 2 in Brooklyn federal court to six years in prison for trading on information about companies under investigation.

One setback for the office: a hung jury in February in an accounting-fraud case against three former Symbol Technologies Inc. executives. A retrial is set for next year. The company's former general counsel pleaded guilty in 2004.

After the collapse of Enron Corp. and the passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-oversight law, the Brooklyn office enhanced its white-collar expertise, says Roslynn Mauskopf, the Eastern District's U.S. attorney. With public companies having proliferated on Long Island, the district was in need of more business policing, Ms. Mauskopf adds.

The office got a boost in July 2002 when the Bush administration formed the Corporate Fraud Task Force, which included both Brooklyn and Manhattan, and decided to spread white-collar cases around the country.

"We quickly leveraged our in-house expertise and made some really smart hires," including lawyers from the SEC, the Manhattan district attorney's office and other U.S. attorney shops, says Ms. Mauskopf, recently nominated for a federal judgeship.

The Brooklyn office's experience in organized-crime cases aided its white-collar push. "If you've tried complicated, multidefendant RICO [racketeering] cases, it's not going to be a challenge to you to try a complicated corporate-fraud case," says Leslie Caldwell, an Eastern District alumna who headed the Enron prosecution team, which included two other former Brooklynites.

The Manhattan U.S. attorney's office -- the nation's oldest, created by President Washington in 1789 -- opened a securities-fraud unit in the 1960s, decades before other offices. It has a reputation for jealously guarding its dominance of corporate-fraud cases, earning the moniker among critics as the "Sovereign District."

Rudolph Giuliani, later New York City's mayor, made his name there in the 1980s, prosecuting Wall Street titans Ivan Boesky, Michael Milken and others. More recently, the office won convictions in a string of cases -- against Martha Stewart, WorldCom Inc.'s Bernard Ebbers and Adelphia Communications Corp.'s John Rigas and Timothy Rigas.

Now headed by Michael J. Garcia, the office recently has hit a rough patch, mostly from missteps that predated him. Charges against former star investment banker Frank Quattrone were deferred in August, after a mistrial and an overturned conviction. A federal judge chastised the office for heavy-handed tactics against former KPMG LLP executives charged with tax fraud. Prosecutors dropped fraud charges against two New York Stock Exchange floor traders after losing trials against two others; another two pleaded guilty, and two were convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0078839

The office still wins most cases, and it remains aggressive on the white-collar front, pursuing some of its own stock-options probes. (An inquiry into buyout deals by private-equity firms is being handled by a separate Justice Department antitrust unit in New York.)

"I am proud of our long history of prosecuting securities-fraud cases," Mr. Garcia said in a statement. "Many offices around the country have increased their efforts in this area, with fine results for the public. We applaud the excellent work of our colleagues."

The two offices have had past turf battles involving mob and drug cases. Their securities units bump into each other less often, battling over boiler-room cases in the 1990s. They butted heads over the securities-fraud prosecution of shoe designer Steve Madden. Each office ended up indicting him. He pleaded guilty in both cases and was sentenced to 41 months.

Ms. Caldwell sees the competition as healthy because it gives investigators in the SEC and Federal Bureau of Investigation alternative avenues to pursue cases.

"In either district here in New York, if a case is not being given the attention it deserves, the agents can just go across the river," she says.

Write to Paul Davies at paul.davies@wsj.com1 and Peter Lattman at peter.lattman@wsj.com2

Skilling Asks Judge To Overturn Conviction (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg News, October 11, 2006

Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, found guilty in May of directing a huge fraud, asked a judge to throw out his conviction, citing a successful appeal in another Enron case.

In a filing yesterday in federal court in Houston, Mr. Skilling, 52, joined other convicted Enron executives in asking a trial judge to void his guilty verdict, based on an August ruling by a federal appeals court in New Orleans. Mr. Skilling's request came as part of a motion to remain free pending an appeal he said he planned to file after his sentencing, scheduled for Oct. 23.

Mr. Skilling told Judge Simeon T. Lake III of the United States District Court that his conviction should be thrown out because the jury might have relied on a prosecution claim that he deprived the company of "honest services," a theory that caused the New Orleans court to overturn four other Enron-related convictions in August.

"The whole theory of deprivation of honest services is that I have a duty of loyalty to the company, yet I'm going out and doing something that hurts the company and benefits me personally," said Barry Pollack, a lawyer who successfully defended Michael W. Krautz, an accountant for Enron Broadband Services. "With these Enron guys, it's different. These individuals went out and did something they honestly believed was in the company's best interest and what the company's management at the highest level wanted done."

Mr. Skilling, convicted of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, faces a sentence of as much as 25 years in prison. Prosecutors gave jurors several situations under which they could find him guilty of defrauding Enron, which collapsed into bankruptcy in December 2001. Having deprived the company of his honest services was one. Deliberately deceiving investors was another.

Since the jury did not explain how it reached its guilty verdict, the fraud and conspiracy convictions were tainted by the possibility that "honest services" played a part. Mr. Skilling argued that his entire conviction should be thrown out, using the logic the appeals court followed in August.

The government will respond to Mr. Skilling's motion "in an appropriate court filing," a Justice Department spokeswoman, Jaclyn Lesch, said. The government has already asked the entire appeals court in New Orleans to review the honest-services issue and reinstate the ex-bankers' convictions.

Third Trial Begins For Former Cendant Exec (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 11, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. — For the third time in the past two years, prosecutors on Tuesday accused former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes of masterminding an accounting fraud that inflated his company's earnings by $252 million. The disclosure of the fraud in April 1998 caused Cendant's share price to plummet 50%, wiping out $14 billion in shareholder value in one day, making it one of the biggest accounting frauds of the 1990s.

In a scene reminiscent of the movie Groundhog Day, the government argued that Forbes, 63, founder of Comp-U-Card International, used CUC's merger-and-acquisition reserves as a slush fund through which his underlings padded the company's earnings.

The government has already put Forbes on trial twice for his alleged actions. In a trial that began two years ago, a jury convicted Forbes' right-hand man, E. Kirk Shelton, of securities fraud, but it deadlocked on the question of Forbes' involvement. Shelton received a 10-year prison sentence. In a retrial of Forbes last year, a different jury also reached an impasse.

In the 1990s, CUC was profitable, prosecutors conceded, but Forbes wanted the company to grow by 25% per year, so he had his subordinates "cook the books," according to assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Martinez.

Forbes allegedly pulled off the fraud, Martinez said in Tuesday's opening arguments, by merging CUC with other companies and creating huge accounting reserves. But the problem with the scheme, Martinez continued, was that CUC had to fill a larger and larger hole each year in order to keep up with the 25% growth rate.

Finally, in 1997, Forbes agreed to merge CUC with a franchise company, HFS, to form the travel and real estate firm Cendant. Under terms of the merger, top HFS executives would run the company the first two years and then Forbes and his executives would assume control. Martinez argued that Forbes tried to hide CUC's accounting games from Cendant CEO Henry Silverman, but that the new management eventually uncovered the fraud.

In response to the government's accusations, Forbes' lead attorney, Brendan Sullivan, said Forbes knew nothing about the fraud. He laid the blame for the accounting mess squarely at the feet of the government's chief witness, former CFO Cosmo Corigliano.

Forbes' first two trials took place in Hartford, before U.S. District Judge Alvin Thompson. The current trial is being heard in Bridgeport before U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas. Unlike Thompson, who gave defense attorneys wide latitude to argue motions, Nevas sternly lectured one of Forbes' lawyers, Barry Simon, for raising questions about witnesses Tuesday afternoon, saying he wanted to deal with specific requests regarding the testimony of government witnesses all at once, not each day on the jury's time.

Buffett Waves Ethical Vigilance Flag (WP/AP)

By Timberly Ross

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

OMAHA -- "Everyone else is doing it" is no justification for unethical business practices, Warren E. Buffett told managers of his company, Berkshire Hathaway Inc.

In a Sept. 27 memo, Buffett cautioned managers that many corporate scandals arise because questionable activity is accepted as normal behavior.

"Somewhere along the line they picked up the notion . . . that a number of well-respected managers were engaging in such practices and therefore it must be OK to do so," Buffett wrote. "It's a seductive argument."

Buffett acknowledged that it is inevitable that someone among Berkshire Hathaway's almost 200,000 workers would give in to temptation. He called on his top executives to resist improper behavior and head it off in employees.

"Berkshire's reputation is in your hands," Buffett wrote.

The memo comes as the former chairman of Hewlett-Packard Co. is being investigated on charges she violated state privacy laws when probing her board for leaks to the press.

Berkshire Hathaway owns 68 companies, according to its most recent annual report, including insurance, reinsurance, carpet, jewelry, furniture, restaurants and utility firms. And it has major investments in such companies as H&R Block Inc., Anheuser-Busch Cos. and The Washington Post Co. Buffett is on the Washington Post Co. board of directors.

The recent ethics lesson is nothing new for Buffett.

"Every couple of years for the past 15 or 20 years, he has been sending out memos to our Berkshire subsidiaries," Buffett's spokeswoman Debbie Bosanek said Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0078841

This is necessary, she said, because Berkshire Hathaway continues to acquire new companies and works with new people in top positions.

He said in his Sept. 27 memo, "Let's start with what is legal, but always go on to what we would feel comfortable about being printed on the front page of our local paper."

The H-P Investigation (WSJ)

By Patricia Dunn

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

When I agreed to accept the position of non-executive chairman of the Hewlett-Packard board during the tumultuous period surrounding Carly Fiorina's departure, I knew there would be challenging and difficult times ahead. Never in my wildest dreams did I anticipate how difficult.

One of the first requests I received from my fellow directors was to find a way to stop leaks of confidential information emanating from our boardroom. The company had actually begun efforts to identify the source of the leaks prior to my assuming the chairmanship, but made no progress. It was of concern to us all. Well, almost all of us.

The most sensitive aspects of a company's business come before its board: strategy, executive succession, acquisitions, new product development. This is exactly the type of information a company's competitors and those who trade in its stock would love to have before that information is properly disseminated. This is exactly why it is so essential that directors respect the confidentiality of the discussions and decisions that occur in the boardroom.

At H-P, all directors, officers and employees are bound by the same Standards of Business Conduct, to which they attest compliance annually, including a section which says, "You may not grant interviews or provide comments to the press without prior approval from H-P Corporate Communications . . ." Boards are also highly regulated, with a myriad of complex structures. These regulations cannot be followed if any individual discloses sensitive information in an unauthorized manner. If any suspicion emerges that one or more board members are violating their oath of confidentiality, then, it is the board's responsibility to do something about it. This is the situation we faced at H-P in 2005, when seven of my nine fellow directors made it clear that taking steps to identify and correct the problem was a top priority of my new appointment.

As I testified before Congress, the first thing I did after being directed by the majority of the board to find and stop the leaks was to approach one of my fellow directors -- who at the time was the company's CFO and acting CEO, and to whom H-P's legal and security departments reported -- to ask him how I should proceed. I said I wanted to make sure that everything done was not only legal and proper, but in the H-P way.

I was told that H-P did this kind of work all the time, and instructed to contact an executive in H-P's security department, who directed me to an outside licensed investigator who was under a long-term contract with H-P to do investigations of this nature. I reiterated to both H-P's head of security and the outside licensed investigator what I had told the acting CEO: Any work undertaken must comply with all applicable laws and H-P's Standards of Business Conduct. I was assured it would.

This first phase of the investigation started in April 2005 and ended in August 2005. While it yielded no information about the identity of the leaker, the leaks ceased or at least slowed dramatically. Satisfied that the investigation had achieved its primary goal -- to stop the leaking of confidential information -- the investigation halted, and I was relieved that the problem was behind us.

That is, until Jan. 5, 2006, when an article appeared in this newspaper about the potential acquisition of Computer Science Corp. by H-P and Blackstone. CSC stock jumped about 8% the day after that article appeared. Approximately 15 days later, two other articles appeared which said H-P was no longer considering this acquisition. CSC's stock dropped approximately 5% the next day. Shortly thereafter, yet another article appeared disclosing sensitive and confidential information discussed by directors at the board's annual strategy offsite.

H-P's board members were upset, and the board, general counsel and CEO felt that the leak investigation should be re-opened. I suggested we use a global investigatory firm to create some independence and assure that top-notch resources were being used. The general counsel advocated the work remain in-house. She recommended that a team headed by the company's head of ethics investigations -- also a lawyer -- be given the assignment, as they regularly dealt with sensitive, high-level issues. The By ethics officer chose to work with H-P's internal security department, which decided to use the same licensed private investigator who had handled the first investigation. I did not learn until late August 2006 that the first investigator subcontracted to a second firm, which undertook the methods now so widely reported in the media.

Despite reports to the contrary, I did not unilaterally decide to initiate a leak investigation. I did not run, supervise or direct the investigations. I did not select or hire the investigators or direct who should be investigated. Nor was I aware of exactly who was being investigated. The company's legal and security departments were in charge of the work. In fact, I was a full subject of the investigations and was "pretexted" along with the others. While I did (appropriately) receive periodic reports on the progress of the investigation, I was not aware until after the investigation was complete and the results were presented to the full board of some of the tactics used. I am still learning about some of the techniques that were used or contemplated.

Throughout the process I asked and was assured -- by both H-P's internal security department and the company's top lawyers, both verbally and in writing -- that the work being undertaken to investigate and discover these leaks was legal, proper and consistent with the H-P way of performing investigations.

Prior to the presentation of the results of the investigation to the board, two lawyers reviewed the report we had obtained. Neither raised concerns about the information or what was known to that point about the process used to obtain it. Subsequently, in response to an email inquiring about the methods and legality of the investigation, a prominent outside attorney stated, "the process was well done and within legal limits."

I offered during the week the story broke, and will continue to offer, my sincere apologies to those whose phone records were accessed, particularly those outside the company. I had no knowledge that journalists' phone records were being accessed. It was always my understanding that their telephone numbers were only being cross-referenced against legally obtained director phone records.

I want to be clear on one point, though: Once conclusive information determined that a director had been disclosing confidential information, the board had no choice but to act. The risk of a future disclosure that could result in a security laws violation or some other problem was too great, and against the backdrop of having done nothing about previous leaks, would have raised serious questions about the board's resolve to deal with a chronic problem.

Upon receiving the report, we were given legal advice that proper handling of the matter was for the full board to deliberate on any appropriate actions. At the risk of bursting yet another myth about this investigation, there was no "Perry Mason" moment, no dramatic revelation about the identity of the leaker. Rather, directors received a reasoned and balanced summary of the matter not from me, but from the audit committee chairman. * * *

As a result of extraordinary negative publicity from these episodes, the board asked me to step down as chairman and director. Less than two weeks later I was charged by the California attorney general on four felony counts of fraud and conspiracy.

Some have said they feel I have been made a scapegoat. That is not for me to say. What I will say is that throughout the process I asked the right questions of the right people at the right times. I have no reason to believe that the people who continually assured me that what was being done was being done both legally and properly did not believe this to be true. And, despite the outrage and incredulity with which my statements about accepting assurances that phone records could be obtained legally, my lawyers assure me that there are in fact ways this can be done. That is one reason Congress is considering a bill against pretexting, which I support.

One more thing: Tom Perkins did not resign from the H-P board because of concern over the leak investigation -- he resigned because he was upset that the full board had been given the chance to decide his friend's fate.

H-P remains a great company with outstanding people. I am proud of the contributions I made during my tenure as a board member, particularly the leadership role I played in bringing Mark Hurd to the company and recruiting two new outstanding directors. I am fully confident that the H-P board and management are completely focused on continuing their work to create value for the customers, employees and shareholders of H-P. The constituents of this great company expect and deserve nothing less.

Ms. Dunn is former non-executive chairman of Hewlett-Packard.

H.P. Could Be A Finger-Pointing Case (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 10 — The five defendants in the Hewlett-Packard spying case must overcome a paper trail of evidence against them. But they could wind up with as much to fear from one another.

At least one lawyer involved in the case and several outside legal experts said the five defendants might wind up turning on one another as part of a way to shift blame away from themselves.

"It's every man for himself," said Stephen Naratil, the lawyer for Bryan Wagner, who is charged with having misrepresented himself to phone companies to obtain calling records of Hewlett-Packard directors. "Everyone is going to pass the buck down, and that's where my guy is sitting."

Mr. Naratil said he would not be surprised ultimately to see conflict between the lawyers for the company's former chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, and its former head of ethics, Kevin T. Hunsaker. "They're going to point fingers at each other and other executives."

His comments, and interviews with lawyers for the other defendants, have begun to bring preliminary shape to a defense strategy in a case that is moving from the political and media stage to the courtroom.

At a joint arraignment hearing on Tuesday in San Jose, Calif., Mr. Wagner and two private investigators — Ronald R. DeLia and Matthew DePante — pleaded not guilty and agreed to return to court on Nov. 17 for a preliminary hearing along with Ms. Dunn and Ms. Hunsaker.

It is not yet clear whether the defendants will be tried together or separately. It is possible that one or more defendants could choose to cooperate with the prosecution and testify against others.

But lawyers for any of the defendants could also try to shade the evidence in a way that is more favorable to their client and less so to another defendant. If the cases are severed, evidence presented in one trial could be subpoenaed in another trial.

Prosecutors want to try all the defendants at once. "We will resist any attempt to sever the prosecution of the case," said Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for Attorney General Bill Lockyer, citing the interest of "judicial economy."

Legal experts and lawyers in the case said that for all five defendants, the case was likely to be fought not just on the facts but also on the law. If there is one theme that will unify the defendants, legal experts said, it is that they will seek to challenge whether California law is even applicable to "pretexting" — a technique involving misrepresentation to get personal and calling records.

The defendants are said to have engaged in a conspiracy to obtain such records to determine the identity of a director who Ms. Dunn and others thought was giving confidential information to the news media.

"The thing we're most interested in is whether the statutes selected for charging do not address the alleged conduct," said Richard J. Preira, co-counsel for Mr. DePante. Mr. Preira said the defense lawyers "have a common interest in educating the court as to the inapplicability of the statutes."

The defendants are each charged with four felony counts. Among the charges, the state accuses them of violating laws against knowingly gaining unauthorized access to computer data to devise or execute a scheme, or using the data to defraud or deceive, or for unlawful purposes.

Legal experts said there would certainly be a vigorous pretrial debate about whether the laws fitted the charges. The legal experts themselves are sorely divided on the question.

"The statutes would have to be expansively interpreted in order to reach pretexting," said Joseph A. Grundfest, professor of law and business at Stanford University. "But courts have interpreted statutes expansively before."

In a recent interview, Mr. Lockyer, the attorney general, said, "I think our laws are sufficient to cover the behavior."

Ms. Dunn's lawyer, Jim Brosnahan, declined to discuss many aspects of his strategy. But he said he might argue that his client had not ordered anyone to commit an illegal act and had not known one was being committed.

"If the attorney general has progressed against Pattie Dunn on the theory she didn't have to know she was doing anything wrong or didn't have to order that something be done wrong, the weakness of that case will be subject to some very interesting motions," Mr. Brosnahan said.

Ms. Dunn also hinted at her own strategy in an interview broadcast Sunday on "60 Minutes." She said she did not recall — as prosecutors assert — that she had given home phone numbers of Hewlett-Packard board members to Mr. DeLia, the investigator.

She also rejected contentions, indicated in interview notes from Hewlett-Packard's outside lawyer, that she had been told that investigators might have to use false pretenses to obtain calling records.

But legal experts said Ms. Dunn might not have done her defense team any favors by appearing on "60 Minutes."

"It was an act of total lunacy," said Jonathan Turley, professor of law at George Washington University. Because everything in the interview can be used as evidence, it could close the door on some lines of defense, he said.

Mr. Turley said Ms. Dunn's best defense is "rather obvious."

"She's got to claim that she did not micromanage the investigation," he said. "Her best defense must not be ignorance of the law, but ignorance of the act."

But he and other legal experts said Ms. Dunn and Mr. Hunsaker might have trouble making the case.

Joel Reidenberg, professor of law and director of the center on law and information policy at Fordham University, said: "Their best argument is to say, 'We didn't know what Wagner was doing'? Is it a credible argument? I don't think so. They got reports of detailed phone records."

Mr. Turley said he expected the challenges to be severe for Mr. Wagner as well, because the other defendants would seek to isolate him as the bad actor.

"He is someone we call the 'designated defendant,' " Mr. Turley said. "He'll be portrayed as the rogue employee or rogue contractor."

But that could work against the other defendants, too, he said. "If prosecutors really want to nail the top executives, they could cut a deal with him."

Mr. Wagner's lawyer, Mr. Naratil, said he was still studying the statutes in the case but said one central question was whether the state of California has jurisdiction over his client, who lives in Littleton, Colo.

Mr. Wagner is said to have been hired to gather phone records in the Hewlett-Packard investigation for Mr. DePante's firm, Action Research Group, based in Florida, which was hired in turn by Mr. DeLia, an investigative consultant in the Boston area.

Outside the courtroom on Tuesday, Mr. Naratil said Mr. Wagner "didn't know anyone at H.P. and he didn't know he was working for H.P."

The lawyer representing Mr. DeLia in court on Tuesday, John Williams, declined to comment after the hearing.

Michael Pancer, the lawyer for Mr. Hunsaker, said he expected to be able to elaborate on his strategy after he got further into the pretrial procedures. For now, he said, his client's defense is based on a good-faith belief that the investigators' conduct was legal.

But Mr. Turley said Mr. Hunsaker could have a tough road, too, partly because of an e-mail message that the defendant is said to have written. In that message — in response to a note from investigators saying that a ruse had been used to obtain phone records — Mr. Hunsaker wrote back that he "shouldn't have asked."

Mr. Turley said that, whatever the defense strategy, that message could become a cornerstone of the prosecutor's case. "The quote supplies a ready-made narrative," Mr. Turley said. "It sums up the case in a single sentence."

He said prosecutors would characterize a corporate culture in which top executives did not confront the hard questions, telling the jurors: "Isn't that what Dunn is all about? She knew not to ask."

Three Investigators In HP Scandal Arraigned In California (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, The Associated Press

AP, October 11, 2006

Three private investigators who allegedly obtained confidential telephone records as part of Hewlett-Packard's boardroom spying probe pleaded not guilty Tuesday to identity theft and other felony charges.

DOJ_NMG_0078845

Ronald DeLia of Massachusetts-based Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., Matthew DePante of Florida-based Action Research Group Inc. and Bryan Wagner of Colorado were arraigned in Santa Clara County Superior Court. Each was later booked and released on personal recognizance.

DeLia, DePante and Wagner are among five people criminally charged last week for their roles in the spying scandal at the computer and printer giant. Former HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn surrendered and appeared in court late last week, and the company's ousted ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker also turned himself in and was released.

The three investigators are accused of impersonating HP board members, employees and journalists to trick telephone companies into divulging their private phone logs.

All five are charged with using false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility; unauthorized access to computer data; identity theft; and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. Each charge carries a fine of up to $10,000 and three years in prison.

They are all scheduled to return to court Nov. 17.

Wagner's defense lawyer, Stephen Naratil, said outside court that his client worked for many companies and didn't know what the telephone records were being used for.

He declined to comment on prosecutors' claims that Wagner acknowledged destroying the computer linking him to the HP probe "because it had incriminating evidence on it."

"He's a hard worker," Naratil said. "He didn't know anything about HP. He didn't know anyone at HP. He was just doing his job."

DePante's defense lawyer, Richard Preira, reiterated his client's innocence but declined to comment further.

DeLia's defense lawyer declined to comment.

State Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said the investigation is ongoing and could lead to more charges.

DeLia, a longtime HP contractor on security investigations, was allegedly the middleman between HP and the other two investigators.

According to an affidavit filed in support of the charges, Dunn worked with DeLia on HP's ultimately unsuccessful media-leak investigation in 2005.

HP then contracted with him again this year after a story appeared on CNET's News.com in January with an anonymous source dishing about a private board retreat.

DeLia contracted with Action Research Group, where DePante is a manager, to obtain the private phone logs, who in turn hired Wagner as a subcontractor, according to the criminal complaint.

Prosecutors say a series of e-mails shows that DeLia regularly updated Dunn, Hunsaker and other members of HP's security team on the investigation, which became public last month and has prompted the resignation of three board members and three top HP employees.

According to the criminal complaint, private investigators working for HP compromised the personal data of more than 24 people. By March, the detectives had compiled records of 1,750 phone calls made on 157 cellular phones and 413 landlines.

In one of the more egregious cases, an impostor had a reporter's cell phone password removed, logged into her online account, changed her password and viewed the detailed call log for nine minutes.

The probe eventually identified longtime board member and former presidential adviser George Keyworth II as the anonymous source in the News.com story. Keyworth was outed in a board meeting, prompting the resignation of another director, venture capitalist Tom Perkins. Keyworth himself later resigned.

Dunn initially said she would cede the chairmanship to HP Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd in January while remaining on the board, but she eventually stepped down entirely.

Hunsaker refused to resign from HP and was fired, according to his defense lawyer, Michael Pancer, who said Tuesday that his client would also be arraigned on Nov. 17.

Pretexting will become a criminal offense in California when a new law signed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger takes effect Jan. 1. Violators will be punished by $2,500 in fines and up to a year in jail, though the law will not retroactively apply to the HP investigation.

Copyright 2006 Associated Press. All Rights Reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed.

How Carly Lost Her Gender Groove (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

Carly Fiorina prided herself on being adept at succeeding in a man's world without whining about sexism.

In her new memoir, "Tough Choices," the expelled C.E.O. of Hewlett-Packard — the first female head of a Fortune 20 company — describes how she insisted on going along to a business meeting at a Washington strip club when she started out as an ambitious young woman at AT&T.

"I was scared to death," she writes, adding that she wore her most conservative dress-for-success business suit and little bow tie, carried her briefcase like "a shield of honor," and repeated the mantra, "I am a professional woman," even when her cabdriver asked her if she was the new act for the club, where babes in see-through negligees danced on tables.

"In a show of empathy that brings tears to my eyes still," she recounts, "each woman who approached the table would look the situation over and say: 'Sorry, gentlemen. Not till the lady leaves.' "

On her first day at HP, she proclaimed, "The glass ceiling doesn't exist." But she now concedes that the glass trapdoor might.

"I think somehow men understand other men's need for respect differently than they understand it for a woman," Ms. Fiorina told Lesley Stahl on "60 Minutes."

The male-dominated board's handling of her exit was "heartless in some ways and disrespectful in other ways," she said. "Maybe they took great pleasure in seeing me beat up publicly for weeks and weeks."

Other controlling blondes, like Hillary Clinton, Martha Stewart and Tina Brown, were slapped back after great success (in a trend that The Times's Alessandra Stanley dubbed blondenfreude), and Ms. Fiorina now thinks she was victimized by gender.

"In the chat rooms around Silicon Valley, from the time I arrived until long after I left HP, I was routinely referred to as either a 'bimbo' or a 'bitch,' she writes. "Too soft or too hard, and presumptuous, besides." She adds: "I watched with interest as male C.E.O.'s fired people and were hailed as 'decisive.' I was labeled 'vindictive."

She reels off things that offended her: The editor of Business Week asked her if she was wearing an Armani suit. She felt adjectives such as "flashy," "glamorous," and "diamond studded" were meant to make her seem superficial. (Who doesn't like being called glamorous?) Stories referred to her by her first name. There was "painful commentary" that she'd chosen not to have children because she was "too ambitious."

"When I finally reached the top, after striving my entire career to be judged by results and accomplishments," she concludes, "the coverage of my gender, my appearance and the perceptions of my personality would vastly outweigh anything else."

One of her foes was Tom Perkins, the 74-year-old rich venture capitalist on the HP board who also tangled with Patricia Dunn, the former board chairwoman. Being married to the romance novelist Danielle Steel and writing his own steamy novel, "Sex and the Single Zillionaire," did not improve Mr. Perkins's skills in dealing with women, it seems.

With several of the few high-profile women at the top tanking, it's interesting to note that Columbia Business School has introduced a new program that teaches the importance of a more empathetic and sensitive leadership style in globalized business, as opposed to the command-and-control style that has dominated the White House and Pentagon for, lo, these many messed up years.

Students learn how to read facial expressions, body language and posture, and get coaching on their brain's "mirror neurons" — how what they're thinking and feeling can affect others.

"This less autocratic leadership style draws on capabilities in which women are as good as men," says Michael Morris, a professor of psychology and management who is running the business school's new program.

Daniel Goleman, whose new book "Social Intelligence" is being taught in the program, points out that "while women are, in general, better at reading emotions, men tend to be better at managing them during a crisis. Women tend to be more sophisticated in reading social interactions but also tend to ruminate more when things go wrong."

And that can lead to score-settling memoirs — Ms. Fiorina fillets both her male tormentors on the "dysfunctional" board and Ms. Dunn — and to the sort of awful judgment and sneaky behavior that Ms. Dunn exhibited.

Neenu Sharma, an M.B.A. student in the new Columbia program, says the moral of the story is that leadership works best with both sexes involved. "You need the woman there to know what's actually going on, but you need the man there to deal with the critical emotions at the time."

Black Ordered Not To Sell Wife's $2.9M Diamond Ring (TORSTAR)

By Rick Westhead, BUSINESS REPORTER

Toronto Star, October 11, 2006

Conrad Black has been slapped with a restraining order that will bar him from selling a rare $2.9 million diamond ring he gave his wife Barbara Amiel-Black as a gift and other antique jewellery.

Black, accused of engineering a racketeering, fraud and tax evasion scheme when he was CEO of Chicago publisher Hollinger International Inc., successfully fought off an attempt by the U.S. Justice Department to force him to relinquish the 26-carat diamond ring he purchased in 2000 at British jeweller Graff Diamonds Ltd. Black has pleaded not guilty to the charges. He is on bail and living in Toronto.

He has said the ring and other antiques were gifts to Amiel-Black, who has not been charged with any wrongdoing. Nevertheless, in an Oct. 6 restraining order, Judge Amy St. Eve in Chicago barred Black from "selling, transferring, assigning, pledging, distributing, encumbering, wasting, secreting, depreciating, damaging, or in any way diminishing the value" of the diamond ring and other antiques.

Black has also been ordered to provide the court by tomorrow with proof he has bought insurance for the items. To post bail, Black, whose trial is scheduled to begin in March, has already has put up as collateral his Palm Beach estate, worth more than $20 million.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Calls For Help In School Shootings (AP-Y)

By Ben Feller

AP-Yahoo, October 11, 2006

President Bush urged the nation Tuesday to help prevent deadly school shootings, saying adults should intervene when they notice children are in trouble.

"Hopefully, out of these tragedies will come the sense of communal obligation all throughout our country, for people to take an extra effort to comfort the lonely," Bush said at a summit he ordered in response to recent violence.

Bush seemed most struck by one of the points raised by experts: When students plot violence, they often brag about it in advance to other students. Safety specialists say schools must encourage students to speak up when they notice any ominous behavioral changes.

"The whole purpose of this exercise is to help educate," Bush said at the National 4-H Conference Center, "and if there needs to be a cultural change inside schools, for teachers to become more aware and more active."

There were no new policies nor new money announced. The administration instead touted Web sites of existing resources. Panelists spent the day sharing examples of local programs.

Democrats mocked the event as a photo opportunity with little substance. Democratic senators challenged Bush to reinstate funding that's been cut from school-safety programs.

"It seems every week we learn of yet another school shooting, and all the president is willing to do is hold a summit," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J.

DOJ_NMG_0078848

Over the last two weeks, school shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania have unnerved the nation. Two involved adult intruders; the other was a student seeking revenge.

The federal role in school safety is limited. It's mainly a local matter. But the White House, sensitive to the concerns of many parents, wanted to show it was doing something.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales led three panel discussions. Time and again, speakers said schools get safer when they take bullying seriously, practice their crisis plans, and talk to parents about what's happening.

"Our first line of prevention is really having good intelligence," said Delbert Elliott, director of the University of Colorado Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence.

Columbine survivor Craig Scott told the wrenching story of the day his sister died. He was in the Colorado school in 1999 when two student gunmen went on a rampage, killing 13 people, including his sister Rachel. He told Bush that kindness and compassion can trump violence.

"Please take my words to heart today," Scott said. "They were bought at a high price."

Bush applauded Scott's efforts. But when responding to an audience member, Bush challenged an assertion that the school testing he champions has crowded out character education.

"I don't think it's zero sum," Bush said. "I think you make sure a child learns and you can instill character at the same time."

He also said it was beyond the federal government to change what is in people's hearts.

"Government is law and justice," Bush said. "Loves comes from the hearts of people that are able to impart love."

At one point, someone in the audience asked Gonzales why the government hadn't done more to keep guns out of kids' hands.

"Obviously, kids should not have access to weapons, and there should be no weapons in our schools," the attorney general said. "That's been the position of our president since his days as governor."

The number of deadly shootings has gone up and down over the last 15 years. Overall school violence has trended downward, although it has increased lately.

Students in middle school and high school reported about 660,000 violent crimes in school in 2002 — a 43 percent drop from a decade earlier. But the number rose to 740,000 in 2003.

Four weeks before Election Day, the event gave Bush a chance to emphasize education, the issue at the center of his domestic agenda. The summit comes as Republicans in Congress have been eager to change the subject from a sex scandal involving former House pages.

Conference Addresses School Shootings (WP)

By Katherine Shaver

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

President Bush said at a conference of school officials, police officers and youth advocates yesterday that communities need a list of "best practices" to prevent and respond to the kinds of school attacks that have occurred in recent weeks.

"In many ways, I'm sorry we're having this meeting," Bush told about 350 people at the National 4-H Conference Center in Chevy Chase. "In other ways, we know how important it is that we're having this meeting."

Bush said he was "troubled" by the recent school shootings in Colorado, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania. "All of us in this country want our classrooms to be gentle places for learning," he said.

His remarks wrapped up the six-hour Conference on School Safety, hastily arranged last week by the White House, the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Department of Education after five girls were killed and five were wounded at an Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania. The president announced no new funding or policy initiatives to handle the problem but said he wanted the conference to reveal "concrete actions to help people understand what's possible and what's working."

"It seems to me, a lot of our attention should be on preventing" such incidents, Bush said. That would require "a mosaic of programs," he said, such as better training for school officials to spot the warning signs of a student bent on violence.

DOJ_NMG_0078849

Bush spoke while seated onstage at a U-shaped table with a Florida sheriff, a Los Angeles specialist in school crisis counseling, a survivor of the 1999 shootings at Columbine High School and the Fairfax County school system's director of safety and security.

The president heard calls for more coordinated planning between schools and police, more character education, more peer mentoring programs, more parental involvement and more counseling for suicidal children who might also have homicidal tendencies. Adding metal detectors and more security cameras can create a "lockdown" atmosphere and make the school less hospitable, several panelists said.

Frederick E. Ellis, head of safety and security for Fairfax schools, said safety plans need to be updated frequently and practiced. Fairfax schools fine-tuned their security plans after the Columbine shootings in Colorado, the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the anthrax mail attacks and the Washington-area sniper shootings, he said.

For example, the system created a plan to shelter in place in response to an attack rather than automatically evacuate.

"We tell [school officials] you can't learn to dance the night of the ball," Ellis said. "It's too late."

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called Fairfax schools a national model for security planning.

In a room full of national experts dressed in conservative suits and police uniforms, it was a 23-year-old Colorado man in a brown leather jacket who received the standing ovation. Craig Scott described how two friends were shot to death next to him under a table in the Columbine High School library. His older sister, Rachel, then 17, was also killed.

Scott now tours the country as part of Rachel's Challenge, a program that urges teenagers to show more kindness and compassion and avoid violent music and video games.

"I've seen depression and a lot of loneliness and anger" among teenagers, Scott said. "Incorporating character back into the education system is something my generation is desperately crying out for."

The conference about school violence began with a national expert saying that schools are still among the safest places. Children ages 12 to 18 are far more likely to be killed or seriously assaulted outside school, said Delbert S. Elliott, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence at the University of Colorado.

Although high-profile attacks are relatively rare, he said, statistics show that "everyday violence," such as fights and gang attacks, are on the rise.

Warlene Gary, chief executive of the National Parent Teacher Association, said she wondered why it took three highly publicized school shootings to prompt a national conference when shootings in and near schools have become a too-frequent occurrence in urban areas such as the District.

"I hope people will collaborate and get things done, but we're sitting in the audience listening to experts talk about issues," said Gary, who lives in Silver Spring.

"The question is, when people walk away from it, what will they do?"

Summit On School Safety Focuses On Collaboration (USAT)

By Greg Toppo, Usa Today

USA Today, October 11, 2006

CHEVY CHASE, Md. — Reacting to a spate of school shootings, President Bush convened a one-day summit Tuesday on school safety and said he expected "some concrete action" out of it.

"All of us in this country want our classrooms to be gentle places of learning," he told a crowd of safety advocates, parents and police, "places where people not only learn the basics ... but learn to relate to one another."

Parents, he added, want to send their kids "to schools that are safe places. The violence we're seeing is upsetting to a lot of people."

Bush attended the last hour of the event, run by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. Though it focused mostly on what communities can do to keep kids from acting out violently, a good portion of the discussion centered on how schools react to violence.

Gonzales said schools need to review "crisis plans" regularly, in part because of staff turnover. "You can't just assume that people know what to do," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0078850

When a gunman entered a Park County, Colo., school on Sept. 27 and took a group of girls hostage, the school had just practiced an emergency "lockdown" drill — officers were "able to get right to Room 206 and pin the shooter down there," said Sheriff Fred Wegener, a summit panelist.

In many ways, the conference pointed to the biggest challenge facing those who would stop school violence: There are different theories about what causes it and how to prevent it.

Panelists and attendees floated at least a dozen theories: bullying, easy access to firearms, a broken mental health system, bad parental role models, absent fathers, the death of God in public schools, not enough character education, too much emphasis on academics, too much testing, too many violent video games and movies, too much violent TV and music, the side effects of antidepressants.

Lisa VanSyckel, a New Jersey mother whose 15-year-old daughter became violent while taking the antidepressant Paxil, said the Food and Drug Administration isn't doing enough to get information about drug side effects into the hands of teachers, who often don't know that kids are taking them. "How is a teacher going to know how to monitor them?" she asked.

When an audience member forcefully recommended limiting access to guns, Wegener suggested guns weren't the problem. "When I went to school, I had a .30-30 (rifle) in the bed of my pickup, but I never thought about shooting anybody with it," he said.

To those steeped in violence prevention and children's well-being, the summit delivered few fresh ideas. But a few attendees said the discussion had advanced since 1999, when two teenage gunmen stormed Columbine High School in Colorado.

Darrell Scott's daughter Rachel was killed at Columbine, and after that horrific attack, he recalled, most discussions centered on metal detectors and other "exterior solutions." Tuesday's summit, with its emphasis on mental health, communication and community building, represented a promising change, he said.

Bush Emphasizes Local, Private Role In Ending School Violence (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

CHEVY CHASE, Md., Oct. 10 — The federal government should not play the primary role in responding to school violence, President Bush said Tuesday, but should instead give out information about strategies to help parents and schools grappling with the threat of deadly outbursts in the nation's schools.

The president and his wife, Laura, both spoke at a conference on school violence here, which he asked Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to convene after a recent spate of school shootings that left six students and a principal dead in three incidents in a single week.

Several of the participants, many of whom run private, nonprofit efforts to prevent school shootings, urged a greater emphasis on character education. Gerard W. Rosolie, principal of Solanco High School, down the road from the Amish schoolhouse where five girls were killed last week, noted that money had been cut from a federal program intended to reduce school violence. Another participant said schools were under such pressure to show academic progress that they had no time to teach morality or values.

Mr. Bush bristled at any suggestion that his cornerstone education plan, No Child Left Behind, which emphasizes academic gains, might be a problem. "I don't think it's zero sum," he said.

He added that it was not up to the federal government to legislate character education. "It requires a higher power than the federal government to cause somebody to love somebody," he said.

No Single Answer To School Violence, Bush Says (MJS)

By Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 11, 2006

Summit explores safety measures after shootings

Chevy Chase, Md. - Spurred by recent school shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania, the White House convened a presidential summit Tuesday to talk about what students, parents, teachers and police can do.

DOJ_NMG_0078851

"In many ways, I'm sorry we're having these meetings," President Bush told participants, many of whom had personal stories to tell about some of the country's most horrific school tragedies, from Columbine High School in Colorado (1999), to Springfield, Ore. (1998), to Jonesboro, Ark. (1998).

Experts at the conference said Tuesday that those killings had led to meaningful changes: new schools designed for safety; anti-bullying programs; and better police training and information-sharing with the schools.

But the fact that seven or eight years later the country has endured another wave of school violence injected a note of caution about finding big lessons and grand solutions.

Recent incidents include the arrest of a student in the shooting of a high school principal in Cazenovia on Sept. 29; a shooting and hostage-taking by a 53-year-old man in Colorado on Sept. 27; and the shooting deaths of five Amish girls a week ago in Pennsylvania.

In the latest incident, a 13-year-old student in Joplin, Mo., was accused of firing an assault weapon in school Monday but was arrested before anyone was hurt.

"The risk of being murdered (for kids) . . . is 70 times greater away from school than it is at school," said Delbert Elliott of the University of Colorado. But the bad news, he said, is that - after a decade of positive trend lines - some overall indicators of school violence are up in the past two years.

Joining one discussion panel, Bush said that schools should be "gentle places of learning," but recent events are "upsetting to a lot of people."

Bush said there was "no single answer" but a "mosaic of programs."

Also speaking were first lady Laura Bush, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings.

Sheriff thought it was drill

The Colorado sheriff who responded to the hostage-taking and shootings there two weeks ago recounted his experiences to an invited audience of several hundred.

"I first heard it over the radio. I think it's a drill," Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener said.

Wegener said law enforcement had the benefit in this case of a "post-Columbine" school design that made it easier to isolate the area where the gunman was, and up-to-date training and procedures, down to "the little cards to slip under the door" of locked-down classrooms to find out whether students inside were safe.

But Wegener said he wasn't sure what lessons he could draw from the incident, in which six girls were held hostage. One was shot dead.

"I still think our school was safe," Wegener said. "I think this is just one of those times when an individual is able to get in."

Encouraging expression

Others talked about the importance of encouraging classmates to let authorities know when students seem deeply troubled or express violent thoughts about school. One expert said that, in about four out of five cases, a student planning a violent act tells others about it beforehand.

Last month in Green Bay, authorities said they pre-empted a plan by students to attack their school when a classmate tipped them off.

The conference was clearly meant to signal that the administration was actively engaged in the issue, even though the president and his education secretary pointed out that matters such as school security and school policy are largely a state and local domain.

By the time it was over, the discussion had veered across a wide range, from the pros and cons of metal detectors to the importance of fatherhood to faith-based programs to post-traumatic stress disorder to the condition of society in general.

The audience members selected by the administration included a large number of advocates of character, or "values," education in the schools, including the father and brother of a student killed in the Columbine massacre, Rachel Scott.

The girl's brother, Craig Scott, speaks across the country about Columbine and promotes values education. Scott spoke to Bush and the conference about surviving the massacre, decried the influence of popular culture and violent video games, and called on schools to put the same priority on building character as imparting knowledge.

DOJ_NMG_0078852

Others in the audience made similar appeals, in one case suggesting that the emphasis on regular achievement tests in schools (a feature of Bush's No Child Left Behind law) left too little room for moral instruction.

In response, Bush said it wasn't a "zero-sum" game.

"I think you can make sure a child learns, and I think you can instill character at the same time," said Bush, who also suggested that the ultimate answers to school violence won't come from government but from parents and communities.

"It's really important . . . that people not think government is a loving entity. Government is law and justice. Love comes from the hearts of people that are able to impart love," Bush said. Recovery after violence

Also discussed Tuesday was how to help communities and students recover emotionally after school violence, from the process of re-opening schools to choosing memorials.

"Recovery takes a long time. We're eight years out, and we're still recovering," said Cathy Paine, who was in charge of recovery programs at Springfield, Ore., after the 1998 incident in which a student killed his parents, then went to school and opened fire in the cafeteria, killing two.

One attendee, Milwaukee Public Schools security director Peter Pochowski, said he didn't expect to change "the way we do things" as a result of Tuesday's conference.

"Nobody expects a magic wand (or) one pearl of wisdom," he said in an interview. But "it's good to have people come together."

Turn Anguish To Action, Bush Says (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, October 11, 2006

President attends meeting in Md. on ways to keep kids safe in school

CHEVY CHASE -- President Bush urged Americans Tuesday to turn their anguish over school shootings in Pennsylvania and around the nation into "concrete action" to prevent further tragedies.

But he told a gathering of educators, activists and law enforcement officials that more federal funding and government regulation won't solve the problem.

"In many ways, I'm sorry we're having this meeting," Bush said as he wrapped up a conference hastily organized by the White House to respond to the recent spate of deadly school violence. "In other ways, I know how important it is."

Bush said the meeting, moderated by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, was part of "a nationwide effort to help people who are responsible to protect our children."

Trading ideas

More than 300 local leaders and specialists from around the country spent about six hours trading ideas, from drafting strong school emergency plans to urging fathers to get more involved in school, to providing character education for kids.

The president, peppered by criticism from Democrats who accused him of short-changing school-safety programs, said the government shouldn't play the lead role in fostering a nurturing school environment.

"The federal government is a limited funder of education, and that's the way it should be," Bush said during a brief question-and-answer session. "It's really important that people not think government is a loving entity. Government is law and justice."

Administration officials also rejected calls for enacting new gun laws, saying Bush is focusing on enforcing existing statutes and prosecuting violent crime.

"There's only one common thread in all of these recent shootings, and that's the easy availability of guns by the assailants, whether they were [age] 15 or 50," said Theo Milonopoulos, a 19-year-old gun control activist from Los Angeles, Calif. "They just didn't want to address it."

Milonopoulos made the only mention of the issue during a question period with Gonzales.

'Complete denial'

Kristen Rand of the Washington-based Violence Policy Center said leaving guns off the agenda showed the administration's "complete denial regarding the catalytic role that guns play in school violence."

DOJ_NMG_0078853

Bush took a seat at a three-sided table on the stage of a packed suburban Maryland auditorium in the headquarters of the National 4-H Council, a youth development organization. The administration had set up a mock classroom complete with fake wood paneling and a chalkboard backdrop emblazoned with the event's title, and Bush questioned participants about how best to share their experiences with others around the nation.

"What it shows is that this is a concern, and they're marshaling these types of figures from the federal government to show that the government is aware of what's going on in our schools," said Russell Tedesco, the director of security for Prince George's County public schools.

Democrats seized the opportunity to blast Bush for his education policy, noting that he worked to wipe out a key school safety grant program, which has been cut by more than 25 percent over the past four years.

Bush slashed the program because his budget office determined it was "ineffective," said Emily Lawrimore, a spokeswoman, and instead proposed "a more targeted and accountability-based approach."

julie.davis@baltsun.com

President Tackles School Safety (LAT)

By Mima Mohammed, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 11, 2006

Recent shootings help prompt the summit on prevention. Bush calls for more civic and parental involvement.

WASHINGTON — In the wake of three deadly school shootings in recent weeks, President Bush convened a conference on school safety Tuesday in which Cabinet members, educators, police and students discussed ways to recognize and prevent violence.

Conspicuously absent in the all-day session was any mention of the role of firearms in the shootings, a politically volatile issue sure to inflame partisan passions in a midterm election year.

"In many ways, I'm sorry we're having this meeting. In other ways, I know how important it is that we're having this meeting," Bush said. "The violence that has been occurring in our schools is incredibly sad."

Bush, joined on a panel by Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, called on parents and communities to take responsibility for ensuring school safety, saying that there are limits to what the government can do.

Indeed, the federal government plays a limited role in school safety, as education is mainly under local and state jurisdiction.

The panel discussions focused on human interaction and the psychology of violence.

Some participants argued that schools needed to do a better job of determining which students might bring weapons on campus. Psychologists pointed out that students who have suicidal tendencies often have thoughts of homicide too. And many panelists focused on the importance of building character in students, which they said had been degraded by media influences such as music and video games.

Harsher measures such as installing metal detectors in schools were viewed with skepticism. Gonzales said metal detectors may not be appropriate, noting that not all school shootings occur inside the buildings.

The conference at the 4-H Youth Conference Center in Chevy Chase, Md., took place four weeks before a midterm election that could cost the Republicans control of Congress and allowed Bush to focus on the seemingly politically safe issue of child safety in schools.

But critics used the occasion to attack the administration's policies on gun control and funding for school safety programs.

"I'm disappointed that today's White House conference on school violence did not focus on the too-easy access to guns in our society," said Paul Helmke, president of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence.

"Two years ago, President Bush abandoned his campaign pledge to reauthorize the federal assault weapons ban," Helmke said. "Yesterday, a 13-year-old Missouri boy brought an AK-47 clone to school and fired it before being apprehended. The Bush administration's inaction two years ago has led to even deadlier weapons being available in our communities."

DOJ_NMG_0078854

In a statement issued Tuesday, the Democratic National Committee weighed in with a shot at White House budget priorities: "Funding for the Cops in Schools program has been slashed on numerous occasions under the watch of Bush and his GOP Congress."

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore responded with an e-mailed statement: "President Bush believes we should target criminals who break our laws — not law-abiding citizens who follow the law.

"At the same time, he has made school safety a priority.… President Bush has proposed a more targeted and accountability-based approach, which we believe would be more effective in making schools safer."

mima.mohammed@latimes.com

Bush Summit On School Violence Begins (GANNETT)

By Ledyard King, Gannett News Service

Gannett News Service, October 11, 2006

CHEVY CHASE, Md. — The Colorado high school where a gunman took hostages and killed a student Sept. 27 had crisis plans in place, limited access to visitors and recently drilled for the possibility of an armed intruder.

"I still think we have a safe school," Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener told police officers, students and teachers gathered for a summit on school violence convened by President Bush on Tuesday. "This is just one of those times when an individual was able to get in. ... We're not supposed to lose our kids at school."

The Conference on School Safety, moderated by top White House advisers, featured more than a dozen education and law enforcement experts trading ideas: encouraging students to come forward with tips, controlling the movement of visitors, running drills so students and staff know what to do when an emergency arises.

"You can't learn to dance the night of the ball," said Fred Ellis, security director of Fairfax County, Va., schools.

But last month's shooting at Platte County High School in Bailey, Colo., suggests that even the most prepared and equipped schools can't always protect children.

"We can never really let our guard down and that was one the things that was clear to us last week," said U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, one of the summit's moderators. "All of us who are parents know it's frightening. This could really happen anywhere."

The summit was called following a spate of school shootings nationwide, including the killing of five girls at an Amish schoolhouse in rural Pennsylvania. Although researchers say that school remains one of the safest places for children, statistics indicate that campus violence and death is on the rise after a decade of decrease.

A recent survey found that 6 percent of students reported carrying a weapon to school within the past 30 days, said Delbert Elliott, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence at the University of Colorado. That makes knowing what students are up to paramount, he said.

"Our first line of prevention is having good intelligence," he told the summit.

Researchers say most students planning attacks often share their intentions with someone. So student-run programs like Walton Senior High School's Youth Crime Watch in Defuniak Springs, Fla., could prove extremely valuable in gauging the student behavior that could lead to violence.

"If you know a real good friend and they start changing, they stop doing stuff that you know that they love, happy one day, depressed the next, talk to (them)," said Chiara Perkins, a junior who leads the program. "If there's nothing you can do as a friend, go ahead and talk to an adult," Perkins, the only student panelist at Tuesday's summit, said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dismissed one questioner's call for increased gun control, saying weapons prosecutions had increased dramatically since Bush took office in 2001. Following the 1999 shooting at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo., then-President Bill Clinton pushed for restricting access to guns.

Panelists also didn't give metal detectors much of a thumbs-up. Not only do they give schools the kind of foreboding climate that feeds into student rebellion, they don't work very well.

"It doesn't take long for students to know how to circumvent (it)," said Thomas Kube, executive director of the Council of Education Facility Planners in Scottsdale, Ariz., adding that 80 percent of school shootings happen outside the building.

DOJ_NMG_0078855

Bush, Others Hear Ideas On School Safety (RTD)

By Gil Klein, MEDIA GENERAL NEWS SERVICE

Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Metal detectors won't stop school shootings, speakers at a conference on school safety told President Bush yesterday. Only listening to students, hearing about their problems and getting them help will stop the violence before it begins.

The White House hastily called the conference of law-enforcement officers, school counselors and safety-advocacy groups after three school shootings in two weeks in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania -- stunned the nation.

"All of us want our classrooms to be gentle places of learning," Bush said. "Rather than be upset . . . it's best to be proactive, and that's what this meeting is all about."

Bush, sitting between Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, heard Craig Scott describe how in April 1999 he hid under a table in the Columbine High School library as his two friends next to him were shot and killed. The rampage took the lives of 12 students and a teacher.

Not until Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold had shot themselves did Scott crawl from under the desk and discover that his sister, Rachel, was the first victim.

Seven and a half years later, Scott now talks to high school students through an organization his family started, "Rachel's Challenge." He told Bush that stressing academics alone will not stop school shootings.

About 300 people attended the conference, which was planned only last week. The Justice and Education departments invited participants.

Bush called on both departments to put together the best practices learned from this conference and distribute them to law-enforcement and education officials.

Gil Klein writes for the Washington bureau of Media General News Service. He can be reached at gklein@mediageneral.com.

Conference On School Safety Ends With Call For Focus On Character (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, October 11, 2006

CHEVY CHASE, Md. - Victims of school violence shared their horrific experiences at a White House conference Tuesday that ended with a call for more focus on character and values in the nation's classrooms.

Sitting at a table with President Bush, Craig Scott, a survivor of the 1999 Columbine High School massacre, urged educators to influence students' hearts as well as their heads.

"Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold were very smart," Scott said of the two shooters who killed his sister and 12 others at the Colorado school. "The problem wasn't their education at my school, Columbine. Their problem was their character."

Other conference participants - including Bush - echoed Scott's assessment. The meeting, hosted in a Maryland suburb of Washington by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, examined ways to prevent school violence and strategies for dealing with the trauma of a school shooting.

Bush announced the conference after recent shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania schools claimed seven victims and left two of the shooters dead.

Experts cited a host of factors that have contributed to the violence, including stress and feelings of alienation among students, negative media influences and inattentive parents. They said shooters tended to be depressed and suicidal.

"What we've learned about shooters is suicide and homicide are two sides of the same coin. They all in some ways express a wish to die," said Marleen Wong, the director of crisis counseling for the Los Angeles School District.

A 2004 threat assessment by the Secret Service warned that attempting to profile school shooters is dangerous, however, because some shooters don't fit the mold.

"Rather than asking whether a particular student `looks like' those who have launched school-based attacks before, it is more productive to ask whether a student is on a path toward a violent attack," the assessment concluded.

DOJ_NMG_0078856

Conference participants urged educators, parents and students to pay more attention to students who complain of alienation, appear depressed or talk about violence. School shootings are rarely impulsive acts; in 81 percent of cases, at least one person knew that the attacker was contemplating violence, the Secret Service report said.

"Teachers should know more about mental health and have a system to report concerns," said Cathy Paine, a crisis-response specialist for the Springfield School District in Oregon. Paine said teachers at Thurston High School in Springfield saw potential warning signs in 15-year-old Kip Kinkel in 1998, but didn't connect the dots until he opened fire in the school's cafeteria, killing two students and wounding about two dozen others.

Scott of Columbine, who's now a film student at the University of Colorado, said he frequently met potential shooters on his travels for Rachel's Challenge, an organization founded in memory of his slain sister. The group urges students to reach out to loners, victims of bullies and other vulnerable students.

"I see a lot of depression. I see a lot of loneliness and a lot of anger," he said. "I've heard all kinds of terrible stories about things they've been through." He urged educators to "take a look at teaching that doesn't just teach the head, but teaches the heart. ... You can help point them to what's right and what's wrong."

Some advocates of character education offered implicit criticism of Bush's No Child Left Behind Act, which stresses academic achievement and requires frequent testing.

"I think you can make sure a child learns, and I think you can instill character at the same time. I don't think you have to choose," the president said after one of the speakers complained that "testing and testing and testing" was crowding out attention to character and values in schools.

He also told the audience members that they shouldn't look to the federal government to bankroll character education or other school programs.

"Let me put the funding issue right on the table. The federal government is a limited funder of education. And I happen to believe that's the way it should be. ... This is a local responsibility," he said.

Acknowledging the reality of school shootings, one conference panel focused on helping students cope with classroom deaths. Experts advised extensive mental-health follow-up.

"Recovery takes a long time. We're eight years out and we're still recovering," Paine said of the Oregon shooting. "Whenever something happens, we're always right back there again in that cafeteria."

Compassion, Not Laws (DENP)

By John Aloysius Farrell

Denver Post, October 11, 2006

Bush meeting on schools big on emotions. The brother of a girl killed at Columbine speaks of healing amid talk of recent safety improvements.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales takes part in a conference on school safety Tuesday in Chevy Chase, Md. (AP / Evan Vucci)

Chevy Chase, Md. - President Bush said he wanted Tuesday's White House conference on school safety to produce a concrete plan of action. But tangible solutions like the use of metal detectors or a ban on assault weapons were rejected and eclipsed by testaments to the power of love.

The conference was quickly staged after recent invasions by berserk intruders at schools in Colorado and Pennsylvania. But the session's most emotionally potent moments were devoted to identifying and communicating with murderous homegrown students like Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, who killed 13 people in the 1999 shootings at Columbine High School.

"The main thing I have learned is that kindness and compassion can be the biggest antidote," said Craig Scott, whose sister Rachel died at Columbine, and who narrowly escaped death himself that day.

"Take my words to heart today; they were bought at a high price," he said.

The audience of several hundred law enforcement officials, educators and others rose and applauded as Scott finished speaking. Bush told Scott's father, Darrell Scott, who was in the audience, that he "raised a good man here."

DOJ_NMG_0078857

Several speakers at Tuesday's conference urged Bush to purge America's coarse and violent culture, and to order that schools teach students about character, virtue and God. But the president noted the limitations of government in the battle against school violence.

Craig Scott "is inspiring others to continue to reach out to say to somebody who is lonely, 'I love you.' And I'm afraid this requires a higher power than the federal government to cause somebody to love somebody," Bush said.

The best solution, he added, is for parents, educators and students to find the love and compassion to reach out to troubled youths before they turn to violence.

"Societies change one heart at a time," said Bush. "This need to say 'I love you' comes from your soul. Hopefully, out of these tragedies will come the sense of communal obligation ... for people to take an extra effort to comfort the lonely."

First lady Laura Bush, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings also addressed the conference, which was held on the campus of the National 4-H Conference Center in one of the capital's wealthy suburbs.

Delbert Elliott, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence at the University of Colorado, spoke approvingly about steps that have been taken since the Columbine tragedy.

"Our kids are safer at school than they are at almost anyplace," Elliott said.

He noted that students today have a greater chance of being killed at a shopping mall or in their home than at school.

Yet in the last two years, Elliott said, gang-related violence and school-related deaths have risen.

Improved safety touted

Law enforcement officials vowed renewed dedication to school design improvements aimed at security, better coordination among local authorities, and lockdown and evacuation drills that have been widely adopted since the Columbine killings.

Such drills "made a big difference two weeks ago in ... the shooting in Bailey, Colo., where they were able to respond in a very effective manner to that tragedy," Gonzales said.

The attorney general and other experts urged parents and educators to stay on the alert for potentially violent students and to get them treatment.

During one panel presentation, Gonzales and Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener, who led the raid that ended the Sept. 27 hostage crisis at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, characterized some proposals - like the purchase and operation of metal detectors and security cameras - as overly expensive and easily evaded.

And both dismissed the proposal of California student Theo Milonopoulos, who suggested that a ban on assault weapons and other gun-control measures might reduce the number of school shootings.

"Obviously, kids should not have access to weapons," said Gonzales, but he advocated tougher enforcement of existing gun laws rather than promoting new ones.

Wegener noted how in his younger days it was not uncommon for students in his rural community to keep rifles in their pickup trucks or to carry knives in school. A subsequent breakdown in society, he said, has led to school violence.

"I'm not sure that response - that society should change - is enough," Milonopoulos replied.

The conference was largely ceremonial, with victims and representatives of volunteer organizations offering testimony to Bush administration officials, who listened but offered little.

Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., joined other Democratic senators in criticizing the administration for cutting the budgets of federal programs that had been adopted after Columbine to funnel funding to law enforcement agencies for community police officers and other assets.

"As the recent tragedies in Colorado, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania have made clear," Salazar and eight other Democratic senators wrote Bush, "our children remain all too vulnerable in school."

Prevent School Violence, Bush Tells Conference (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, October 11, 2006

Panelists focus on warning signs and values issues

DOJ_NMG_0078858

WASHINGTON - Keys to stopping what appears to be an epidemic of school violence include learning how to spot troubled students, boosting their self-esteem and preparing for emergencies, according to panelists at a special White House conference Tuesday.

Organized in response to a recent spate of deadly shootings at schools, the conference did not address gun control or firearms-related issues. Rather, it focused on values and community action.

"The violence we've seen is upsetting to a lot of people and I know it's upsetting to the professionals who are with us," President Bush told participants. "But rather than be upset, it's best for all of us who are responsible for helping the folks not only to cope, but to prevent action from taking place."

Among the recent attacks, a gunman in Colorado took six girls hostage in a classroom, sexually assaulted them and then killed one. In Wisconsin, a 15-year-old student walked into his high school and shot the principal. And in Pennsylvania, an intruder shot five girls to death at an Amish schoolhouse.

Experts said warning signs of possible violent behavior include changes in dress, mood, friends and diet. Students expressing suicidal or despairing thoughts also warrant special attention, they said.

One of the speakers was a survivor of the 1999 Columbine massacre that left 15 people dead. Craig Scott, currently a film student at the University of Colorado, told Bush that his sister, Rachel, died in the attack.

"I'm not promoting that religion be brought back to schools, I don't believe that's the answer," Scott said. "But I do believe in education that touches and teaches the heart and helps form character."

In the Houston area, all school districts have emergency preparedness plans, said Linda Clarke, director of education and special projects in the Office of Mayor Bill White.

"Houston adopted a community-based program to work with kids, and there are programs in the schools to help kids with emotional problems," Clarke said. "And of course there's been a lot done in the past year after the hurricane, to make sure we are better prepared for any kind of emergency situation."

In an effort to make schools safer, many Houston schools employ cameras, uniformed officers and metal detectors — an approach that drew skepticism from Bush administration officials.

"One panel member said that it sends the wrong message about what we think of our kids when we have them come to an environment where they're supposed to learn and have to pass through metal detectors," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Bush said he agreed, but asked whether sheriff departments could be more involved with enforcing school safety.

Democratic leaders, meanwhile, faulted Bush for cutting funding for two programs that provide funding and personnel for law enforcement officers around schools. Eight Democratic senators wrote to Bush Tuesday asking the funding be fully restored in future budgets.

"As the recent tragedies in Colorado, Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania have made clear, our children remain all too vulnerable in school," they wrote.

First lady Laura Bush, a former teacher and school librarian, said easing school violence calls for addressing the underlying causes.

"One of the best ways to keep Americans away from violent behavior, both as young people and adults, is to give our children a more positive vision for their future," the first lady said.

Helping Kids Fight School Violence (NSDY)

By Audrey Dutton, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Nearly 10 years ago, Daniel Gross' brother Matthew was shot in the head by a gunman while standing on an observation deck of the Empire State Building. After watching his brother slowly recover from a coma, Daniel started a gun violence prevention organization, PAX.

The group Gross co-founded runs a nationwide anonymous hotline that, he says, is helping kids fight school violence, 866-SPEAK-UP.

DOJ_NMG_0078859

"You could safely say hundreds of incidents have been averted," Gross said. He cites 15,000 calls to the hotline in the past four years. "New York has lagged behind a lot of other communities" in terms of school violence prevention, he said.

Gross joined other advocates, law enforcement officers and educators from around the country yesterday in Chevy Chase, Md., for a conference on school safety.

President George W. Bush participated in a panel at the conference, which followed recent school-shooting tragedies in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin.

"Hopefully, out of these tragedies will come the sense of communal obligation all throughout our country, for people to take an extra effort to comfort the lonely," Bush said, but he expressed hopes that "people not think government is a loving entity. Government is law and justice."

The rate of violent crime in schools dropped over 10 years, according to the most recent figures from the Bureau of Justice Statistics and National Center for Education Statistics. In 1992, 48 of every 1,000 students would fall prey to violence at school, but in 2003 that number fell to 28 of every 1,000.

"We are, however, seeing some indications in the last two years that those trends are changing," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said.

Of all violent crime in 2004, 14.2 percent occurred inside a school building or on school grounds. But there is no nationally mandated standard for school crime reporting, leaving it up to local officials to decide whether a shove in the cafeteria line should be considered an assault.

This year, Canton and Middletown school districts won a combined $2.9 million in federal funds to merge youth-saving efforts by law enforcement, teachers and mental health professionals. The Uniondale school district also has received grant money from the federal Safe Schools/Healthy Students Initiative.

The Safe Schools program doled out a total of $31 million this year, but of 485 school districts that applied, only 19 received funding. And their grants, which are awarded under No Child Left Behind, expire after three years.

Bush Advocates Volunteers For Schools (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush yesterday said local communities need more impassioned volunteers, not more federal government intervention, as a means for promoting stronger moral values in the wake of several deadly school shootings.

"It's really important to me that people not think government is a loving entity. Government is law and justice. Love comes from the hearts of people who are able to impart love," the president said during a conference on school safety in Chevy Chase, Md., that emphasized the faith-based approaches at the center of some of his domestic policies. "I'm afraid it requires a higher power than the federal government to cause somebody to love somebody."

Mr. Bush called for the meeting shortly after a gunman killed five girls and wounded five others at the West Nickel Mines Amish School on Oct. 2. His administration invited educators, public safety experts, and shooting survivors from across the country, including Craig Scott, whose 17-year-old sister, Rachel, was one of 15 people killed in the 1999 Columbine High School massacre in Littleton, Colo.

The president cited Mr. Scott as a "social entrepreneur" for his work with Rachel's Challenge, an organization -- started by his father, Darrell -- that teaches students about Rachel Scott's life, trying to inspire them to rethink how they treat others. Mr. Bush also pointed to the potential of the USA Freedom Corps, a White House initiative aimed at encouraging more volunteer service among Americans.

Craig Scott, now 23, was in his school library on April 20, 1999 when two fellow students, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, entered and started shooting. He saw them kill several of his close friends. His sister, shot in the head, was the first person to die that day.

Mr. Scott told the president that he thinks schools often focus too much on academic performance, not moral character, echoing a theme stated by several speakers. "The youth are crying for something to stand for, something to believe in," Mr. Scott said.

DOJ_NMG_0078860

Mr. Bush agreed, but defended his administration's emphasis on academic testing through the No Child Left Behind Act.

"I think you can make sure a child learns and you can instill character at the same time. I don't think you have to choose," he said.

He also called on local law enforcement agencies and school districts to start sharing their "best practices" in preventing violence, and he said educators may need to be more aware of sudden personality changes in their students, especially evidence of suicidal tendencies.

Marleen Wong, director of crisis counseling and intervention services for the Los Angles Unified School District, said most school shootings involve children who likely have discussed their plans with fellow students.

She shared a panel with Larry Macaluso, superintendent of the Red Lion Area School District in York County, Pa., where in April 2003 an eighth grade student shot and killed a junior high school principal in the cafeteria before shooting himself.

Mr. Macaluso said his students and staff had made a "remarkable recovery" since then, partly because of steps administrators took in the days and weeks immediately following the shooting.

In particular, he said, officials held an open house with parents and students just before classes resumed, serving beverages in the cafeteria as a symbol of a return to normalcy.

"Try to share with them how safe and warm this environment can be," Mr. Macaluso said.

During the first day of classes, students were encouraged, but not required, to visit the cafeteria and put their handprints on a makeshift memorial there.

This month's violence at the Amish school, however, brought back painful memories for Mr. Macaluso and many others in Red Lion. "The healing process never ends," he said.

In Lancaster County, locals have decided to take down the school house where the girls were killed as part of their recovery.

One panelist yesterday commended the Amish for forgiving Charles Carl Roberts IV, the shooter, and his family. Betty Alvarez Ham, president of City Impact, a Christian outreach group for young people in Ventura County, Calif., said forgiveness is something that should be taught in schools to help children avoid outbursts of anger.

Guns Are In Schools But Not In The President's Vocabulary (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

President Bush has always been a disciplined man, but yesterday he set a new standard for self-control: He moderated an hour-long discussion about the rash of school shootings in the past week without once mentioning the word "guns."

First lady Laura Bush was nearly as good, giving a seven-minute speech at yesterday's White House Conference on School Safety without mentioning guns. Two longtime aides, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, deftly led hours of panels at the National 4-H building in Chevy Chase with only a few glancing references to weapons.

This was no misfire. The White House, hastily arranging yesterday's forum to react to shootings over the past fortnight at schools in Pennsylvania, Colorado, Wisconsin and Missouri, neglected to invite any gun-control advocates. In fact, how the killers had carried out their deeds might have remained a mystery if 19-year-old twin brothers Theo and Niko Milonopoulos hadn't infiltrated the gathering.

Managing to get in front of a microphone during question time, Theo pointed out to Gonzales that "the common denominator in the rash of school shootings" has been access to high-powered guns. He asked what could be done to reduce the spread of such weapons "in light of the expiration of the federal assault weapons ban?"

"Assault weapons," Gonzales repeated. Some in the audience chuckled as he looked to see who on the panel would take the question.

The attorney general decided to do it himself. "Obviously, kids shouldn't have access," he granted, before quickly adding that there is no need for new laws. "We need to make sure those who break the laws are prosecuted," he said.

"There's a big elephant in the room and it's gun control," Niko observed after the panel ended.

DOJ_NMG_0078861

The Bush administration has for years been known for its use of human props to make its points: middle-class "tax families" to pitch for tax cuts, victims of Saddam Hussein's torture to pitch for the Iraq war, and friendly partisans to pitch soft questions at "Ask President Bush" sessions. The technique is not new; Bill Clinton did much the same when hosting events about race.

Still, yesterday's forum was unusual. While experts dispute how much blame to place on children's access to guns, even the invited guests found it a bit odd to banish the topic entirely from a school-violence forum. "No one wants to touch gun control before an election," surmised one participant, Warlene Gary of the National PTA.

Democrats and gun-control advocates shut out of the invitation-only event had to do their sniping from a distance. They pointed out the COPS in Schools program, given $160 million in 2000, has been cut to zero. "The Bush administration is in denial," protested the Violence Policy Center.

At the conference, Bush's thoughts leaned in the opposite direction; he mused at one point about whether schools were becoming too locked down.

Gonzales advised Bush that one panelist said metal detectors send "the wrong message about what we think of our kids."

"I happen to agree," Bush said. "But what do I know?"

"Yes, sir," Gonzales replied, drawing chuckles from those in the crowd who thought he was agreeing with the "what do I know" quip.

Bush and his fellow participants stood in front of a faux blackboard inscribed with the words "Conference on School Safety" 42 times. With gun control off the table, the questions and comments became a bit repetitious, too, as a long line of participants echoed the belief that school violence would be reduced by values education and religious belief.

"It's illegal to say 'God' in the public schools these days," complained one questioner. He was followed by a representative of the American Association of Christian Schools. Craig Scott, brother of a girl killed in the Columbine massacre, said she was "killed for her faith."

"Lots of folks find answers in their faith," Spellings observed.

They certainly did yesterday. Another panelist spoke about the need for churches to "adopt" schools. An organization started by the Scotts, Rachel's Challenge, distributed brochures comparing the slain girl and her father to Anne Frank and her father.

When Bush arrived, Craig Scott was invited to speak again. This time, he read a poem he said his father read while appearing before a congressional committee.

"You've outlawed simple prayer.

"Now gunshots fill our classrooms and precious children die . . .

"You regulate restrictive law through legislative creed, and yet you failed to understand that God is what we need."

Until that point, Bush had been having trouble finding his voice on school shootings, which one of his own panelists asserted could number as high as 600 over the past six years. He labeled the violence "inexplissible," apparently merging "inexplicable" and "inexpressible." And he had to guide the discussion away from one panelist's remark about "computer predators" -- a dangerous topic during the Mark Foley scandal.

But on hearing Scott's "unbelievably eloquent testimony," Bush brightened considerably.

"That was great, Craig," the president said, after the audience finished its standing ovation. "Could I have that?"

Apparent Prank Puts Castro Valley High On Lockdown (CCT)

By Ricci Graham

The Contra Costa Times, October 11, 2006

CASTRO VALLEY - A rumor that a student had carried a firearm onto the Castro Valley High School campus today forced administrators to lock down the school for three hours while nearly two dozen deputies and investigators searched the campus.

No weapon was found, and police later attributed the scare to an apparent prank.

The lockdown was issued around 11:40 a.m. after school officials received word of the report. Teachers were ordered to lock all doors, close all windows and pull down all the window blinds, said Alameda County Sheriff's Sgt. Scott Dudek.

School officials informed the sheriff's office of the threat as soon as the rumor reached administrators. The sheriff's office responded by dispatching 25 deputies and three K-9 units to the 2,800-pupil campus at 19400 Santa Maria Ave., Dudek said.

DOJ_NMG_0078862

Deputies cordoned off the campus, setting up a perimeter where worried parents gathered and waited in vain for about three hours, not sure what exactly had transpired at the 40-acre campus.

As students huddled underneath their desks or gathered in classroom closets, sheriff's deputies patrolled the halls with K-9s trained to detect gunpowder and weapons, Dudek said.

The police dogs searched the lockers, and another K-9 Unit searched the exterior of the campus, but no weapon was found, Dudek said.

At about 2:45 p.m. -- just over three hours after the lockdown was issued -- the campus was cleared by deputies and students were permitted to leave.

Dudek said deputies interviewed a number of students and learned that one pupil whom he described "as a prankster" joked that he was armed with a firearm when he arrived at school this morning.

"Basically, his comment was, 'I'm strapped,'" Dudek said. The teenager then asked a friend, "Are you strapped?" Dudek said.

"I really think that he was a prankster," Dudek said. "If it wasn't for the nature of today's incidents, it would not have made everyone's concern go sky high."

Deputy Superintendent Jerry Marcy said the student who made the comment will face disciplinary action."It's not appropriate to comment on any possible disciplinary action," Macy said. "Obviously, we take this whole thing seriously."

As investigators combed the campus, nervous parents gathered on the surrounding streets, fearful that the recent spate of violence at schools throughout the country had touched down close to home.

"I was thinking about Columbine," said Rhonda Scott, whose son is a junior at the high school. "I was thinking, 'Oh, my God. Not in Castro Valley.'"

As parents waited, many expressed frustration because they said they had to depend on text messages or cell phone calls from their children to find out what was going on inside the campus.

"The only thing that upset me is that they should let the parents know ahead of time," Deborah Dillon said of school officials. "My daughter had to text message me (about what was going on). I got 15 text messages."

Though it was a difficult call to make, Sgt. Scott Dudek said investigators decided against sharing information with parents for fear it would set off a near riot.

"I think the parents were concerned that we didn't come out sooner and let them know what was going on," Dudek said. "But we were concerned that we didn't want to put out false information.

"If we had told the parents the reason for the lockdown, then we would have had parents trying to covertly go onto school grounds," he said. "Then we would have had a nightmare."

Students were clearly relieved when the lockdown was lifted and they were permitted to go home.Andrew Quan, a junior, said students gathered in a closet and waited for three hours with his teacher, who was clearly shaken by the incident.

"We hid in the back and occasionally, when we thought it was safe, we popped out," Quan said. "We had to wait it out. It really was that big a deal."

Joel Becker, another junior, said he found the incident frightening."I was sort of scared," Becker said. "I didn't expect it, because the school is not known for dangerous stuff. It was a drag to have to do that."

The lockdown occurred at a time when public awareness has been heightened by a recent series of deadly school shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania.

In response to the violence, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings convened a school safety conference today in Chevy Chase, Md.

The conference was attended by parents, teachers, researchers, law enforcement leaders and policy officials, who discussed violence prevention and ways to help the schools and their communities recover from the traumatic attacks that have shaken campuses across the nation.

Student Safety (SLT)

DOJ_NMG_0078863

By Julia Lyon, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 11, 2006

BOUNTIFUL - The choir continued to rehearse as a hostage situation evolved in the classroom next door. The music was about to be interrupted.

"Police! Hands up!" the officers yelled as they burst into the room at Bountiful High School. An armed intruder had been "shot" and lay face down on the hall floor. Now the police were looking for more suspects.

The students wound out of the classroom with their hands behind their heads, but many were laughing. One wiggled her hips. They knew this was not real.

It could have been. At Bountiful High on Tuesday morning, the school was teaching a post-Columbine lesson in a subject most of us never expected to study: school violence. By practicing a lockdown situation as it has for several years, members of the staff learned what they need to do to keep students safe. The students taste what a scary situation at school could be like and how to help.

"I'd hate to go to sleep at night thinking we hadn't done our best to prepare," Principal Ryck Astle said.

What was new at Bountiful High this year was the number of police agencies involved and the hostage twist. Schools have been reeling from the spate of shootings over the past few weeks that seemed to leave no community, even the peaceful Amish, untouched. On Tuesday, safety and education experts from across the country met in Maryland at a conference called by the White House.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales led three panel discussions. Time and again, speakers said schools get safer when they take bullying seriously, practice their crisis plans, and talk to parents about what's happening.

"Our first line of prevention is really having good intelligence," said Delbert Elliott, director of the University of Colorado Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence.

Bountiful High is far from a fearful place. Students walk in the high school without having their bags searched or being screened by metal detectors. Several doors are open during the school day. Unlike some schools, it does have an on-campus school resource officer who can react immediately.

While the school lockdown may have been more for the school's benefit, officers Tuesday filmed their exercise and evaluators stood nearby taking notes. The police shouted commands and codes over their radios communicating with an improvised command post outside. Not communicating, as one officer put it, can be deadly.

Joel Briscoe, who began teaching 24 years ago, mused after the lockdown about how times have changed.

"If you would have told me we'd be debating public policy about arming teachers in schools, I wouldn't have believed you," the Bountiful U.S. history and government teacher said.

The drills are worthwhile, the teacher said, if only for the benefit of practice. The unanswerable question is whether any school is ever perfectly safe.

"It's like saying is it safe to fly on an airplane," Briscoe said. "I don't think they can ever be 100 percent safe."

Jake Craig, 16, was in the choir room when the police rushed in the door. It seemed pretty real, he said afterward. They were yelling and running around the room.

Some teens shrugged off the lockdown, but several confessed an underlying anxiety.

"I think everyone fears Columbine a lot," said Heidi Thueson, 16. "Bountiful is a safe place - but you never know."

jlyon@sltrib.com

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

911 Transcripts Are Released In Amish School Shooting; Killer Was Calm (NYT)

By Sean D. Hamill

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

An hour after walking into a small Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania last week with a small arsenal of guns and hardware, Charles C. Roberts IV told a dispatcher in a calm, dispassionate voice just what his emergency was.

DOJ_NMG_0078864

"I just took, uh, 10 girls hostage and I want everybody off the property or, or else," Mr. Roberts told a 911 dispatcher for Lancaster County, according to a transcript of the conversation released yesterday.

As the dispatcher tries to engage him, Mr. Roberts threatens to kill the girls, but his voice "is not angry, there is no yelling and screaming," the county district attorney, Don Totaro, said in an interview.

Mr. Totaro authorized the release of the transcript after formal requests from state and national news media under Pennsylvania's Right to Know Law. He said he listened to the tapes to check the transcript's accuracy.

Mr. Roberts's voice is "flat," Mr. Totaro said. "It's almost like there's no soul there."

"It's beyond comprehension, particularly when you listen to the tapes and realize he's about to shoot 10 innocent Amish girls," he said.

Mr. Roberts, 32, a married father of three children who collected milk from farms in the area and delivered it for processing, shot all 10 girls inside the West Nickel Mines Amish School. Five were killed and five others suffered serious wounds, including at least one who is not expected to recover, officials have said.

The dispatcher's short conversation with Mr. Roberts, as well as calls from his wife, Marie, and the farmer who made the first 911 call, after a young teacher fled the schoolhouse to seek help, show how frantic Mr. Roberts's brief siege was.

Mr. Roberts's call came in at 10:55 a.m. on Oct. 2, and lasted just over a minute, with the dispatcher trying to figure out what was going on.

"O.K., what's the problem there?" asks the dispatcher, who was not identified.

"Don't try to talk me out of it, get 'em all off the property now," Mr. Roberts replies, referring to the state police, who were already on the scene in response to a call some 20 minutes earlier from the farmer, Amos Smoker, who first alerted the police to the situation after the teacher, Emma Mae Zook, fled to his home.

"I'm going to let the state police down there," the dispatcher says to Mr. Roberts. "I need to let you talk to them. O.K., can I transfer you to them?"

Mr. Roberts replies: "No, you tell them, and that's it. Right now or they're dead, in two seconds."

As the dispatcher tries to transfer the call, Mr. Roberts repeats, "Two seconds, that's it," before the line goes dead.

About two minutes later, Marie Roberts called 911 about a phone conversation she had just had with her husband.

"She's obviously distraught and concerned," Mr. Totaro said, characterizing the call. "But she's composed."

During the call, Mrs. Roberts says: "Yes, my name is Marie Roberts, my husband just called me on his cellphone and told me that he wasn't going to be coming home and that the police were there and not to worry about it. And I have no idea what he is talking about, but I am really scared."

Mrs. Roberts tells the dispatcher her husband told her that "he was upset about something that had happened 20 years ago and he said he was getting revenge for it. I don't think he was getting revenge on another person. I'm worried that maybe he was trying to commit suicide."

After her call is transferred to a state police dispatcher, Mrs. Roberts explains that her husband took her grandfather's blue GMC pickup truck that morning and left behind notes expressing the thought of not seeing his children, "not seeing them grow up, like, let's see, uh, I'm not even sure."

"Here it is: 'My daughter Abigail. I want you to know that I love you and I'm sorry I couldn't be here to watch you grow up.' That's how the note starts," Mrs. Roberts says.

A 1999 Pennsylvania Supreme Court decision allows withholding 911 tapes from the news media, but "because of the unfettered media access in this case," Mr. Totaro said, he decided to release a transcript.

He decided against releasing an audiotape of the calls after discussing the issue with the state police commissioner, Jeffrey Miller, and concluding that to do so "would only serve to further traumatize the victim's family and the family of the perpetrator," Mr. Totaro said.

The state police are now considering whether to release a transcript from their dispatch tapes, which would include additional conversations, a spokeswoman, Trooper Linette Quinn, said.

"We've never released them before, but this is a different set of circumstances," Trooper Quinn said.

DOJ_NMG_0078865

Pa. Schoolhouse Gunman Made Demand, Began Firing (WP/AP)

By Mark Scolforo

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

LANCASTER, Pa., Oct. 10 -- The gunman who attacked an Amish schoolhouse opened fire on his 10 hostages just moments after demanding that authorities get off the property, giving state troopers no time to try to save the girls, according to investigators and 911 transcripts released Tuesday.

Charles Carl Roberts IV threatened to kill the children "in two seconds" during a 70-second call to a 911 dispatcher.

"Don't try to talk me out of it, get 'em all off the property now," Roberts told a Lancaster County dispatcher in a calm, flat voice, his only contact with police.

The dispatcher asked Roberts to stay on the phone so he could be transferred to state police. Roberts replied: "Two seconds, that's it." He then hung up, before police could have him talk to a negotiator.

Before authorities could react, he started shooting inside the West Nickel Mines Amish School, killing five girls and wounding five others before killing himself. Police burst in after hearing the gunfire.

"He clearly did not give the police any opportunity to get off the property," said Lancaster County prosecutor Don Totaro, who did not release the actual audiotapes to avoid further traumatizing the Amish community and Roberts's family.

PA. Gunman Intent On Massacre, 911 Tapes Show (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, October 11, 2006

A 911 dispatcher tried to keep gunman Charles Carl Roberts IV on the phone moments before he shot 10 girls at an Amish school, according to transcripts of the call released Tuesday.

Roberts dialed 911 nearly an hour after he entered the Nickel Mines Amish School in Lancaster County, Pa., on Oct. 2. By then, police were outside the school.

Transcripts of the call, along with one from Roberts' wife and two others to 911, were released by Lancaster County District Attorney Don Totaro.

“They tried to keep him on the line as long as possible,” Totaro said. “They tried to diffuse the situation, but there was just no possible way for them to do so. It was clear he was intent on carrying out his mission.”

Roberts' call came in to the Lancaster County 911 dispatch center at 10:55 a.m. By then he had been in the school since about 10 a.m. Asked if he had an emergency, he said “yes.”

The dispatcher asked for the address.

“It's on White Oak Road. I just took, uh, 10 girls hostage, and I want everybody off the property or, or else,” Roberts replied.

The dispatcher responded, “OK. All right.”

Roberts: “Now.”

Dispatcher: “Hold on a second. Hello.”

Roberts: “Yeah.”

Dispatcher: “OK, what's the problem there?”

Roberts: “Don't try to talk me out of it. Get 'em all off the property now.”

Dispatcher: “Sir, I want you to stay on the phone with me. OK? I'm going to let the state police down there — I need to let you talk to them, OK? Can I transfer you to them?”

Roberts: “No. You tell them, and that's it. Right now or they're dead, in two seconds.”

After a pause, he repeats: “Two seconds. That's it.”

Dispatcher: “Sir, listen to me. Listen.”

Totaro says Roberts then hung up.

Moments later, Roberts, 32, a milk truck driver and father of three children, opened fire on the 10 girls he was holding, then turned the gun on himself. Five girls were fatally wounded and five more were injured. Roberts also was dead.

“It was chilling,” Totaro said of listening to the 911 tapes. “There really was no anger. It was very matter-of-fact.”

DOJ_NMG_0078866

Among the other calls released was one made at 10:35 a.m. from Amos Smoker, who lives in a farmhouse behind the school.

A teacher and another adult at the school ran there after seeing Roberts.

"There's a, there's a guy in the school with a gun," Smoker said. The next call was from Marie Roberts, the gunman's wife, at 10:58 a.m. She said she was worried that her husband was trying to commit suicide.

She told the 911 dispatcher that her husband had called her from his cellphone "and told me he wasn't going to be coming home and that the police were there and not to worry about it."

"I have no idea what he is talking about, but I am really scared," she said.

She was transferred to the state police and described notes her husband had left for the family. She read from one:

"My daughter Abigail, I want you to know that I love you, and I'm sorry I couldn't be here to watch you grow up."

First Lady Lauds Sisters (LANNP)

By Colby Itkowitz

Lancaster Newspapers (PA), October 10, 2006

Bush holds summit on school safety

CHEVY CHASE, Md. - Two Amish girls who put their classmates' lives before their own represent the country's best, first lady Laura Bush said during a school safety summit Tuesday.

The first lady was referring to Marian Fisher, 13, and her 11-year-old sister, Barbie Fisher, both of whom beseeched Charles Carl Roberts IV to shoot them first, hoping he'd spare the lives of the younger Amish girls locked inside their one-room schoolhouse on Oct. 2.

"The most recent school attacks have saddened and troubled all Americans, yet these tragedies have also shown the best in our country," Laura Bush said. "We saw tremendous courage in the Amish girls who in the face of immediate danger thought first of the safety of their younger schoolmates."

In response to the string of school shootings, President Bush called a summit Tuesday in suburban Maryland to open a dialogue among experts on how school violence can be stopped. "The violence in our schools is incredibly sad and troubles a lot of folks, and it troubles me," Bush said at the National 4-H Conference Center. "Everyone in our country wants our classrooms to be gentle places of learning."

During three panel discussions, one moderated by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and two by Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, speakers offered their suggestions for the prevention of violence.

GOP Employee Seen As Key To Foley Timetable Investigation (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Andrew Zajac

Chicago Tribune, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A Republican patronage employee who formerly controlled the administrative apparatus of the House emerged Tuesday as a key figure in the scandal over former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate emails to underage pages.

A new account from a Republican congressman who was informed as early as 2000 of suggestive emails from Foley to a former page described a more significant role for then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl. The congressman, Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), said he passed the complaint on to Trandahl, who also was involved in handling a complaint in 2005 about inappropriate emails to another former page.

The account raises new questions about the quiet disposition of the later complaint, which officials handled by privately warning Foley to cease contact with pages.

With an Aurora, Ill. graveyard as a backdrop, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) defended his own staff's handling of the 2005 complaint about inappropriate emails from Foley, saying he could not find any fault in their actions based on what they knew at the time.

"They've handled it as well as they should," Hastert said. " I didn't think anybody at any time in my office did anything wrong."

Hastert added, "in 20/20 hindsight probably you could do everything better."

DOJ_NMG_0078867

However, Hastert said he would dismiss any member of his staff involved in a cover-up, while Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) asked for an independent investigation of Republican leaders' handling of the complaints. The House Ethics Committee is currently examining the response.

More signs of discontent among the party's core social conservative supporters also emerged, with a prominent conservative activist questioning in an article whether gay Republican staffers and members of Congress were working behind the scenes to undercut the political agenda of religious conservatives.

Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, wrote in a web newsletter for members of the organization that the Foley scandal "raises another plausible question for values voters: has the social agenda of the GOP been stalled by homosexual members and/or staffers?"

Several key figures involved in the scandal and its handling are gay or linked to gay causes. Foley has acknowledged he is gay. Kolbe, who is retiring and received the first complaint, is openly gay. And Trandahl, 42, is a board member for the gay-rights group Human Rights Campaign.

Noting that, Perkins continued, "The GOP will have to decide whether it wants to be the party that defends the traditional moral and family values that our nation was built upon and directed by for two centuries. Put another way, does the party want to represent values voters, or Mark Foley and friends?"

Patrick Sammon, executive vice president of Log Cabin Republicans, a gay Republican organization, said the connection was spurious.

"The anti-gay groups are trying to spin this into some kind of gay cover-up," Sammon said. "But I don't think any of this had anything to do with sexual orientation."

Kolbe, who has been traveling in Europe, offered his first account of the 2000 complaint he received about Foley in a written statement.

Kolbe said a former page whom he had sponsored contacted his office to complain about emails from Foley "that made him uncomfortable.

"I was not shown the content of the messages and I was not told they were sexually explicit," Kolbe said in the statement. "It was my recommendation that this complaint be passed along to Rep. Foley's office and the clerk, who supervised the page program. This was done promptly."

Kolbe, who is a former page, was on the House Page Board at the time. But Rep. Sue Kelly (R-N.Y.), who was then the chair of the Page Board, was never informed, said her spokesman, Kevin Callahan.

Five years later, a Louisiana Republican received another complaint about Foley from a page that congressman had sponsored. The complaint was forwarded to Hastert's office, which referred the matter to Trandahl.

Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the Page Board when the second complaint arrived, has said he and Trandahl decided to keep the matter private and ask Foley to cease contact with pages.

Shimkus spokesman Steve Tomaszewski said that Trandahl never informed Shimkus of the earlier complaint, though he acknowledged that Shimkus did not ask about any prior aberrant behavior.

"He had never heard anything before, so there was no impetus to ask about anything else," Tomaszewski said.

Trandahl, who left his House position last November to become a lobbyist for the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, declined through his attorney to comment.

Trandahl "will cooperate fully with the FBI and the House ethics committee investigations," his lawyer, Cono Namorati, said in a statement.

Another key figure in the investigation, Kirk Fordham, a former chief of staff to Foley, is slated to appear before the ethics committee on Thursday, according to his attorney Tim Heaphy. Fordham was interviewed by the FBI last week.

Fordham has said that he warned Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, no later than January 2004 that Foley had exhibited inappropriate behavior with pages.

Hastert has maintained that no one on his staff learned of Foley's aberrant behavior with pages until fall 2005. Hastert said he did not personally know of any inappropriate behavior until Foley resigned late last month.

DOJ_NMG_0078868

Hastert's attorney, J. Randolph Evans, said Hastert has not yet been asked to appear before the committee, but is willing to do so.

"I've reached out to the committee to let them know that we want to be as cooperative as possible," Evans said.

Doubt Is Raised About Foley As Secret Drinker (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 11, 2006

When former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) entered alcohol-abuse treatment amid scandal over his relationships with congressional page boys, his attorney said the ex-lawmaker never drank alcohol in public.

Attorney David Roth categorically stated that the disgraced lawmaker hid his abuse by drinking alone.

But the photograph (above) from The Hill's archives shows Foley holding a glass of wine at a Capitol Hill reception on May 19, 2004.

He went to the reception with several other House members. This and other evidence suggests Foley was a social drinker and a wine aficionado.

The photograph and first-hand accounts of Foley's public drinking told by acquaintances in Washington and Florida could reinforce doubts about the veracity of the claim that a drinking problem fueled his behavior, which included carrying on sexually explicit instant-message chats with former pages.

Reps. Steve Buyer (R-Ind.), Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), Nick Rahall (D-W. Va.) and Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) also appear in other photographs by The Hill of the 2004 event, which was hosted by the Washington Wine Commission to tout the state's wineries and to honor Washington's congressional delegation and the Congressional Wine Caucus, of which Foley was a member.

Thompson cannot recall seeing Foley at the reception, according to his spokesman; calls to the other lawmakers' offices were not returned. Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) also attended but does not remember seeing Foley, according to her spokesman.

Though no law-enforcement authority has filed charges against Foley, his attorney could cite alcohol addiction as part of a legal defense by arguing that Foley was not in complete control of his actions when he contacted former pages over the Internet.

At a press conference in West Palm Beach, Fla. last Tuesday, Roth said that the former congressman did not drink around other people.

"People close to Mark knew that he was a closet drinker, as it is referred to," Roth said, adding, "Mark, to my knowledge and based upon all the information that I have, never drank in public," according to a transcript of the press conference. "However, at night he did drink and has admitted to that and he has indicated that he strongly believes that he's an alcoholic and is receiving treatment for it."

Roth did not return two calls requesting comment.

In addition to the 2004 photograph, news reports during Foley's tenure in Congress have included accounts of him drinking at public events. Recently published interviews with lawmakers and other acquaintances of Foley also indicate that he was often seen at parties, receptions and fundraisers drinking alcohol.

In a story that ran in the St. Petersburg Times (Fla.) on Sunday, Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite (R-Fla.) is quoted saying that while she saw Foley drink alcohol on occasions, "I never saw him inebriated, never saw him even close, never saw him slur a word." Speaking to Fox News Channel after Foley resigned, Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) stated directly that he did not believe Foley's claims of alcoholism.

So far, no one has come forward with a specific account of Foley appearing to be inebriated in public. Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), however, has pressed for an investigation of allegations that a drunken Foley once tried to gain admittance to the House pages' dormitory but was turned away by Capitol Police officers.

The public record seems to belie Roth's claims about Foley's drinking habits.

In one well-reported example, Foley was a co-host of two fundraising events for Ways and Means Committee Republicans that used alcohol as a theme.

DOJ_NMG_0078869

The “D Street Block Party” took place in the spring of 2005 and 2006 in the homes of Foley and four colleagues who live on the same city block in S.E. Washington, D.C.

At the fundraiser on May 18, 2006, Foley served wine to his guests, according to the invitation and reports by The Washington Post and others.

Along with Foley, GOP Reps. Chris Chocola (Ind.), Clay Shaw (Fla.) and Nancy Johnson (Conn.) each offered different alcoholic drinks in their homes, while Rep. Jim Ryun (R-Kan.) served coffee and dessert. The mandatory contribution to visit each home during the event was $1,000.

One criminal-defense attorney who specializes in alcohol-related cases said that if Roth is angling to use Foley's drinking as a mitigating factor in his behavior with pages and former pages, the approach could work.

“From a criminal-defense perspective, somebody being an alcoholic can be helpful,” said Darren Kavinoky, whose practice is in Southern California.

If a defense attorney can convince a jury and a judge that the defendant did not have a specific intent to break a law, the penalty could be smaller, even if the defendant did violate that law, Kavinoky said. Roth could be looking to avoid a prison sentence for his client and hoping to persuade a judge to consider an alternative sentence, such as alcoholism treatment.

“This could be laying the foundation for that kind of defense,” said Kavinoky, who added, “I think it would be effective in court” against any charges that might be levied against Foley.

Ironically, if Foley has successfully hidden an addiction to alcohol from his friends, family and colleagues, as Roth asserts, the alcoholism defense becomes more problematic, Kavinoky said. Without witnesses to Foley being intoxicated, his attorney would have a harder time establishing his condition as an alcoholic, he said.

Staff Heads Would Roll For Foley Cover Ups (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said today that anyone who covered up information about contacts between then Rep. Mark Foley and male pages "really ought to go."

During a question and answer session with reporters outside a meeting of the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce in Aurora, Ill., Hastert said that ongoing investigations in the sex scandal should determine if his staff or anyone in Congress covered up information about the former Florida representative, and the former pages, "shouldn't continue to have their jobs."

Hastert acknowledged today that his office could have handled the matter better. "In 20/20 hindsight, probably you could do everything a little better."

Hastert noted that none of the pages were approached by Foley while they were in Washington — only after they had graduated from the program. Moreover, Hastert said he is still searching for a candidate to run the program. "I asked (former FBI Director) Louie Freeh to do it and (House Democratic Leader) Nancy Pelosi rejected him for some reason."

Witnesses will begin testimony behind closed doors this week in the sex scandal, which has sent shudders through the Republican-controlled Congress and potentially though the upcoming elections.

The investigation, which is being conducted by the House Ethics Committee in an otherwise quiet Capitol, will look into who knew what, and when, about the contacts between Foley and male pages.

In what is shaping up as a classic "he said/he said," Kirk Fordham, a former Foley aide, is expected to testify that he warned Hastert's office in 2003 or earlier about Foley's inappropriate interest in teenage pages.

Officials in Hastert's office have said they did not learn about Foley's interest until last fall, when a Louisiana congressman alerted the office to a series of e-mails Foley sent to a former page. Hastert has maintained that his aides then alerted officials in charge of the page program, who told Foley to cease contact with the teenage boy.

"All eyes will be on Hastert, and the basic point of the interviews with staff and GOP leaders will be to find out when the speaker had serious indications something was wrong with Foley," said Julian Zelizer, a specialist in congressional history at Boston University.

Hastert's attorney, J. Randolph Evans, said, "We're going to be fully cooperative."

DOJ_NMG_0078870

Also Monday, it became clear that the Foley scandal was sparking political concerns at the highest levels of the White House, with strategist Karl Rove conceding in a private briefing that the matter "complicates things" for some Republican candidates who have been linked to the scandal.

Fordham's attorney, Tim Heaphy, said Monday said that he expects the committee investigation to focus "less on what Congressman Foley did and more on who knew what when."

This week's questioning of witnesses and scrutinizing of records comes as the committee broadens its inquiry to determine whether any other House members have had inappropriate contact with the 16- and 17-year-old congressional pages.

Ethics Committee Chairman Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and the panel's top Democrat, Rep. Howard L. Berman of Valley Village, asked all House members to contact current and former pages sponsored by their offices to determine "whether any of those individuals had any inappropriate communications or interactions with former Rep. Foley or any other member of the House."

The politically sensitive investigation also comes as the scandal has become an issue in the battle for control of Congress. The committee has vowed to act swiftly, but it is unclear whether it will be done before the November elections.

The panel conducting the investigation, made up of two Democrats and two Republicans, is trying to determine whether any House members or staff violated House rules. The committee has no power to discipline Foley, who resigned from Congress Sept. 29. A separate criminal investigation is being conducted by the FBI.

The committee is expected to interview Hastert and members of his staff, including Scott Palmer, whom Fordham has said he spoke to in 2002 or 2003 about Foley. Hastert's chief political advisor, Mike Stokke, and his senior counsel, Ted Van Der Meid — both of whom helped field the complaint last year, according to an account prepared by the speaker's office — may be called as well.

So may a host of other lawmakers and staff, and perhaps Foley and former pages. Other possible witnesses include:

.Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, who oversaw the page program and allegedly was asked to talk to Foley after the speaker's office received a complaint last year;

.Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the board that oversees the page program, who allegedly accompanied Trandahl to talk to Foley;

.Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), who sponsored the page who received e-mails from Foley last year;

.Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, who hired Fordham as his chief of staff last year.

.Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), whom the Washington Post reported confronted Foley as early as 2000 about messages to pages. Kolbe issued a statement today, saying he contacted Foley's office after receiving a complaint from a page but knew nothing about contents of the message.

"Some time after leaving the page program, an individual I had appointed as a page contacted my office to say had had received e-mails from Rep. Foley that made him uncomfortable," Kolbe said in a statement.

"I was not shown the content of he messages and was not told they were sexually explicit. It was my recommendation that this complaint be passed along to Rep. Foley's office and the clerk who supervised the page program. This was done promptly."

Hastert said in Illinois that Kolbe was on the page board at the time and "that was his job…that confrontation," but that "if it was something he should have reported" to more authorities, "then he should have done that. If anyone's found to have covered up information, they really ought to go."

The panel has prepared about four dozen subpoenas, but officials refuse to say whom they have summoned. Witnesses called by the committee testify under oath; they can be accompanied by an attorney and can plead the 5th Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

In his private briefing Monday, Rove noted that with the Democrats needing just 15 seats to take control of the House, "every seat matters." It does not help, he suggested, "having Foley's seat up for grabs rather than being safe and having Reynolds responsible now for fighting back on this issue."

Rove's remarks, in a roughly half-hour conference call with GOP supporters across the country, offered a glimpse into private worries over the Foley fallout in a White House that has tried to steer clear of the controversy. A participant in the Rove call invited a Times reporter to listen in. The White House said it would have no comment on private calls, but added that Rove assured activists that the party would overcome the problem.

Overall, Rove sought to sound upbeat as he addressed the activists. He predicted the GOP would hold the House and Senate, but seemed to acknowledge that his hopes had been dampened in recent days

"I felt great about [the House] before Foley," he said. "But I still feel good about it."

Hastert Says Fire Anyone Who 'covered' For Foley (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Dennis Hastert said Tuesday that any staff member who failed to alert him to former representative Mark Foley's advances to congressional pages should be fired.

"If they covered something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs," the Illinois Republican said to reporters in his suburban Chicago district.

The speaker's comments came amid signs that investigations are moving ahead into Foley's sexually explicit e-mails and instant-message exchanges with teenage boys who served in the page program:

•Kirk Fordham, a former Foley aide who says he alerted Hastert staffers to Foley's inappropriate behavior as early as 2003, is scheduled to appear before the House ethics committee Thursday.

•Jordan Edmund, a 21-year-old former page who received electronic messages from Foley, met with FBI agents for two hours in Oklahoma City. He was not required to turn over copies of the messages, and the FBI did not schedule any additional meetings with him, said Edmund's attorney, Stephen Jones.

Jones wouldn't describe the contents of the messages. He said there was no physical relationship between his client and Foley.

Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned from the House of Representatives on Sept. 29 and checked into an alcohol rehabilitation program after he was confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit messages that he allegedly sent pages. His lawyer, David Roth, has said the former congressman did not have sex with minors. Roth also said Foley is gay.

The FBI is investigating the possibility that Foley violated criminal statues against sex with minors. The ethics committee is trying to determine whether members of the House or its staff failed to respond appropriately when alerted to Foley's activities.

At least five FBI field offices are now involved in the federal government's preliminary inquiry into Foley's conduct, two federal law enforcement officials said.

The sources, who are briefed on aspects of the investigation, declined to be identified because they were not authorized to speak publicly. They said agents were working off rosters of current and former pages, dating back at least to 1995, when Foley arrived in the House.

Rep. Jim Kolbe, an Arizona Republican and the party's only openly gay House member, confirmed Tuesday that a former page complained to him several years ago about e-mails received from Foley. Kolbe is a former House page and a strong supporter of the program.

In a statement, Kolbe said that the page told him the e-mails made him "uncomfortable" but that he was not shown the messages. "It was my recommendation that this complaint be passed along to Rep. Foley's office and the clerk who supervised the page program. This was promptly done," the statement said. Kolbe is in Europe and was not available for further comment.

Kolbe press secretary Korenna Cline said the congressman's staff members believe that the page contacted Kolbe in 2000 or 2001. Kolbe assigned an aide to contact Foley's office and the office of the House clerk, which oversees the page program, Cline said.

Jeff Trandahl, House clerk from 1999 until last year, has not commented about the case. Trandahl has retained defense lawyer Cono Namorato to represent him.

Revelations about Foley's contact with pages have created a political nightmare for Republicans one month before an election that will determine control of the House and Senate. In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken over the weekend, 55% of respondents said they have an unfavorable view of the Republican Party; 43% said Hastert should resign.

DOJ_NMG_0078872

Hastert Vows To Fire Aides If A Cover-Up Is Discovered (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And David Johnston

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 10 — Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said Tuesday that members of his staff should be fired "if there was a cover-up" in the way they had handled complaints about Mark Foley's conduct toward teenagers in the Congressional page program.

"They'll be under oath, and we'll find that out," said Mr. Hastert, an Illinois Republican who along with his top aides is expected to be called to give sworn testimony in a House inquiry into the page scandal. "If they did cover something up, then they should not have their jobs."

The remarks by Mr. Hastert, made to reporters in his Congressional district in Aurora, Ill., were the first time he had used the term "cover-up" in talking about the case. Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned late last month after explicit messages he had sent to a former page became public.

Mr. Hastert has contacted the House ethics committee through his lawyer, J. Randolph Evans, who said in an interview on Tuesday, "We want to be as helpful and cooperative as we can."

A former Congressional aide, Kirk Fordham, is scheduled to testify Thursday that he alerted Mr. Hastert's staff to Mr. Foley's behavior at least three years ago. A former clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl, who had received numerous complaints about Mr. Foley's conduct, issued a statement through his lawyer on Tuesday, saying he would "cooperate fully with the F.B.I. and the House ethics committee."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has begun its own inquiry to determine whether laws were broken in the exchange of sexually explicit messages. On Tuesday, F.B.I. officials in Oklahoma City interviewed a former page for more than two hours, said a person briefed on the matter who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the case was under investigation.

The former page, Jordan Edmund, 21, who was accompanied by his lawyer, Stephen Jones, said he had had limited contact with Mr. Foley while he was a page in 2001 and 2002, the person said, but Mr. Foley sent him e-mail after he left the program.

Mr. Edmund said the exchanges led to two meetings with Mr. Foley, the person briefed said, including dinner in San Diego in October 2002. Afterward, Mr. Edmund said, he returned to Mr. Foley's hotel room, where the congressman touched his knee. Mr. Edmund said he had left after about 20 minutes, and he told the agents that nothing untoward had happened.

It was unclear whether this encounter was the one described in instant messages obtained by ABC News, which quoted Mr. Foley writing to a page, "I miss you lots since San Diego."

Also on Tuesday, Representative Jim Kolbe, Republican of Arizona, said a former page had complained to him of being uncomfortable with e-mail messages Mr. Foley had sent him. Mr. Kolbe said he had not confronted Mr. Foley, but had "passed along" the complaint to Mr. Foley's office and the House clerk.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Kolbe confirmed Tuesday that during the Fourth of July Congressional recess in 1996, Mr. Kolbe took two former pages on a three-day rafting trip through the Grand Canyon. The spokeswoman, Korenna Cline, said several of Mr. Kolbe's staff members and his sister had gone on the excursion, and that the former pages had paid their own way.

Hastert Expresses Faith In Staff As FBI Questions Former Page (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said yesterday that he believes his staff has handled the Mark Foley matter properly, but "if they did cover something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs."

Hastert's remarks came amid a quickening pace of investigations into Foley's relationships with teenage congressional pages and the House's handling of warnings about the Florida Republican's behavior. FBI agents interviewed former House page Jordan Edmund in Oklahoma City, and Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, is scheduled to speak with House ethics committee members and staffers on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0078873

Edmund was among the male pages who received sexually explicit instant messages from Foley, a six-term House member. Foley abruptly resigned on Sept. 29, just as ABC News was airing some of the graphic exchanges.

Speaking yesterday to reporters in Illinois, Hastert again said he knew nothing of alarms raised in some circles about Foley's behavior toward pages until the day he resigned. Two high-ranking GOP House members have said they mentioned to Hastert concerns about 2005 e-mails that Foley sent to a former page from Louisiana. The speaker's office says that two of his high-ranking aides -- counsel Ted Van Der Meid and deputy chief of staff Mike Stokke -- also knew of those e-mails but did not inform Hastert.

Hastert said he recalls no such conversations with colleagues. He said his aides have "handled it as well as they should." He added: "In 20/20 hindsight, probably you could do everything a little bit better. . . . If anybody's found to have hidden information or covered up information, they really should be gone."

In Oklahoma City, Edmund and his attorney, Stephen Jones, talked to reporters after meeting with FBI agents. Edmund "answered their questions and cooperated to the fullest," Jones said.

The FBI is investigating only whether Foley committed a crime. The ethics committee has jurisdiction over current House members and employees, and is focusing on how they handled suspicions about Foley.

Foley, who is in a Florida treatment center for alcoholism, has said through a lawyer that he never had sexual contact with a minor. Congressional pages are high school students -- typically 16 or 17 years old -- who spend a semester or two in Washington and live in a Capitol Hill dorm. E-mail records indicate that Foley kept in touch with some of them for several years after they left Washington.

Meanwhile yesterday, Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) issued a statement regarding his knowledge of one complaint about Foley's dealings with pages. Kolbe said that, several years ago, a former page alerted his office to "e-mails from Rep. Foley that made him uncomfortable." Kolbe, a former member of the House Page Board, said he did not see the messages "and was not told they were sexually explicit."

Kolbe said that, at his suggestion, the complaint was taken to Foley's office and to the House clerk, who oversees the page program on the speaker's behalf.

"I believed then, and believe now, that this was the appropriate way to handle this incident," Kolbe said.

Also yesterday, former House clerk Jeff Trandahl said through a lawyer that he will cooperate fully with the FBI and the ethics committee. Trandahl, considered a key witness to several reported meetings regarding Foley and House GOP leaders, has not spoken with reporters since the scandal broke two weeks ago.

Fordham resigned as chief of staff to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) last week after it was learned that he had tried to negotiate with ABC News on Foley's behalf. Fordham has said that several years ago he implored Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, to help persuade Foley to stop showing so much attention to male pages.

Palmer released a statement last week saying: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Hastert Vows To Fire Staff In Foley Cover-up (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 11, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert yesterday said that he would remove from his staff anyone found to have participated in any cover-up of the Foley scandal.

"If they did cover something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs," he told reporters yesterday before a speech in Aurora, Ill.

Mr. Hastert also said that after meeting last week with staff, he thinks they handled the concerns that had been raised about former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contact with teenage boys in the congressional page program.

"In 20/20 hindsight, you probably could have done everything a little bit better," he said.

"But if there is a problem -- if there was a cover-up -- then we should find that out through the investigation process. They'll be under oath, and we'll find out," Mr. Hastert said, adding that he "didn't think anybody at any time in my office did anything wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0078874

The House ethics committee is investigating the matter, including whether there was a cover-up after the initial "over-friendly" e-mails from Mr. Foley to teenage boys came to light.

The panel is expected this week to interview former Foley staffer Kirk Fordham, who resigned last week amid accusations that he tried to suppress some of the more lurid Internet messages. Upon resigning, Mr. Fordham said Republican leadership staff members knew about Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior at least a year earlier than they have said.

Ethics committee members indicated last week that their inquiry into the scandal could be resolved before the November elections.

The FBI is also conducting an investigation and has been contacting former congressional pages who may have been pursued by Mr. Foley. Federal investigators interviewed for more than two hours yesterday a former page in Oklahoma City who reportedly received sexually explicit Internet messages from Mr. Foley.

Mr. Hastert's confidence that his staff will be exonerated in the investigations brought scorn from Democrats.

"America's parents are fed up with double talk and hypocrisy. They want Republican leaders to put politics aside and put our children first," said Stacie Paxton, press secretary for the Democratic National Committee, who accused Mr. Hastert of "fishy explanations, hair-splitting spin and blanket denials about the Republican cover-up of the Foley scandal."

Evidence emerged yesterday that suggests that it wasn't only Republicans who knew about Mr. Foley's bad behavior.

Writing in Harper's Magazine online, editor and blogger Ken Silverstein said it was a Democrat who provided him with the Foley e-mails that Democrats and some conservatives say should have tipped Republicans off that something was wrong. Like Mr. Hastert and several other news organizations, Harper's Magazine decided the e-mails were inconclusive and did not publish the story.

Also yesterday, Rep. Jim Kolbe, Arizona Republican, explained that he, too, had been contacted by a page who said Mr. Foley had sent him e-mails that made him "uncomfortable."

"I was not shown the content of the messages and was not told they were sexually explicit," he said yesterday, adding that he recommended forwarding the complaint to Mr. Foley's office and the House clerk, which he said "was done promptly."

Outside Washington, the scandal continued roiling congressional campaigns.

In California, Democrat Jerry McNerny challenged Republican Rep. Richard W. Pombo to call for Mr. Hastert's resignation and return campaign contributions from the speaker.

"For more than a week, Pombo has remained silent about Dennis Hastert's failure to protect 16- and 17-year-old congressional pages from Mark Foley's predatory behavior," Mr. McNerny said. Continued silence from Mr. Pombo, he added, would be a sign of "complicity."

In West Virginia, meanwhile, a Republican sought to use the issue of child predators against his Democratic opponent, Rep. Alan B. Mollohan.

Republican Chris Wakim said Mr. Mollohan voted against the Children's Safety Act of 2005 to authorize $2 million in federal grants for technology and training for a task force going after online child predators.

"Alan Mollohan owes the voters an explanation of why he voted against authorizing money for a program designed to protect our children from Internet predators," Mr. Wakim said.

Prominent Democrats Refrain From Calling For Hastert's Ouster (HILL)

By Elana Schor, Amy Sherman And Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, October 11, 2006

While House Republicans rush to contain the political damage from the Mark Foley scandal, Democrats have relied on their challengers to push for Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) resignation while party leaders and most vulnerable incumbents refrain from calling for Hastert's head.

More than 20 Democratic opponents of vulnerable GOP incumbents have urged Hastert to abandon the Speakership in the wake of questions over how much and how early Republican leaders knew about Foley's sexual pursuit of House pages. Yet no elected Democratic leader and no Democratic incumbents in competitive races have echoed those challengers, according to a search of public statements conducted by The Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0078875

One senior Democratic aide said it was "normal" for candidates to take the politically potent step of asking for Hastert's resignation while incumbents use more measured rhetoric. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has set the tone for her caucus, stating that the ethics committee investigation should run its course before any leader is asked to step down.

The trend places Pelosi, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Democratic caucus chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), all of whom have declined to urge Hastert to step aside, in a less combative camp than the conservative Washington Times editorial page, several conservative activists and at least one Republican candidate. New Jersey state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R), who is running a close race against Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), said Friday that Hastert should resign his post for failing to put a stop to Foley's behavior.

"The incumbents don't have to do it. Why bother?" University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato said. "They work with the Speaker, and I suppose they want to reduce the friction to a certain degree."

Sabato also noted the political value of staying silent and leaving Republicans to sort out the internal fault lines exposed by Foley's swift and stunning fall. "It's not [Democrats'] story," he added. "Remember the old rule: When your opponent's committing suicide, get out of the way."

Of the eight Democratic incumbents remaining in reelection bids rated highly competitive by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, only Rep. Leonard Boswell (D-Iowa) has publicly entertained the possibility of Hastert's departure, according to The Hill's survey. Boswell said during a debate last week with his GOP foe Jeff Lamberti that an "immediate, quick investigation" should preclude any resignations.

Foley resigned his seat on Sept. 29, soon after the first reports emerged of sexually improper instant message conversations he conducted with underage pages. National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas Reynolds (R-N.Y.) and Hastert have since come under fire for their aides' alleged prior knowledge of Foley's actions.

Hastert stood by members of his own staff while reiterating his call to dismiss any member or aide who covered up Foley's inappropriate contact with the pages.

"If they did cover something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs," Hastert told reporters in Aurora, Ill., yesterday. "But I didn't think anybody at any time in my office did anything wrong."

Across the country, Democratic challengers are readily employing Hastert's role in the scandal. Gabrielle Giffords, who is vying for the open seat created by Rep. Jim Kolbe's (R-Ariz.) retirement, has directly urged an end to the Hastert era, as has Kentucky Democratic nominee Ken Lucas, a former House member. Pennsylvania's three top Democratic challengers, Lois Murphy, Joe Sestak and Patrick Murphy, have repeated the calls.

Other Democratic challengers use Hastert's public troubles to neatly define their outsider status compared with their Republican opponents. In Connecticut, Democrat Joe Courtney has implored Rep. Rob Simmons (R) "to demand the immediate resignation of GOP Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert." California Democratic nominee Jerry McNerney similarly insists that Rep. Richard Pombo (R) explicitly ask for Hastert's resignation, and Colorado candidate Angie Paccione (D) makes a similar request of incumbent Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R).

"It is an organic movement," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokeswoman Jen Psaki said. "See it from New Mexico to Minnesota to New York. Public outcry has come from families in the districts who are outraged with the Republican leadership ...and are outraged with how the republican leadership has mishandled it and brushed the facts under the rug in favor of politics."

A small minority of candidates has not demanded Hastert resign but advocate the incumbent-favored stance of a full investigation of the Speaker's role in the Foley scandal. Democrat Mike Weaver, running against Rep. Ron Lewis (R-Ky.), has said the matter should be investigated before resignations are demanded. Colorado Democratic candidate Ed Perlmutter, running against Republican Rick O'Donnell for an open seat in the 7th district, put himself in line with Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), the former GOP campaign chief, by calling for a probe to play out first.

"We have not called for his immediate resignation and events are continuing to unfold but we want the matter fully investigated," Perlmutter communications director Scott Chase said.

Many of Hastert's top aides are expected to testify before the ethics committee before the November midterms.

DOJ_NMG_0078876

Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff who accused Hastert's chief of staff last week of knowing about the Florida Republican's behavior as early as 2003, is set to testify tomorrow, his lawyer said. Fordham resigned his post last week as chief of staff in Reynolds' personal office amid reports that he tried to suppress the emails that ended Foley's political career.

Timothy Heaphy, an attorney at McGuireWoods, LLP, representing Fordham, would not discuss his clients conversations with Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer or any other members of the Speaker's staff now that the FBI and the ethics committee have both initiated investigations into an alleged cover-up of Foley's relationship with pages.

An attorney for Jordan Edmund, a former congressional page who received suggestive e-mails from Foley, confirmed that his client met with FBI investigators yesterday to discuss the e-mails Stephen Jones, Edmund's attorney, told reporters in Oklahoma yesterday that the House ethics committee had contacted him in order to question his client about the former page's interaction with Foley.

Hastert Meets With Critic Over Scandal (AP-Y)

By Nathaniel Hernandez

AP-Yahoo, October 11, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert met Tuesday with an evangelist who hoped to persuade the Illinois Republican to step down because of the congressional page sex scandal.

Hastert had no comment after the meeting at his home with Christian evangelist K.A. Paul, founder of the Global Peace Initiative.

Paul told The Associated Press he met alone with Hastert for about 30 minutes and prayed with him.

"I am humbled with his humility and simplicity," Paul said of Hastert.

Hastert has resisted calls for his resignation over his handling of the situation involving former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, who stepped down after he was confronted with sexually explicit electronic messages he sent to teenage male pages. Foley is under investigation by federal and Florida authorities.

Paul said the scandal is distracting the country from other issues.

"We don't want the Foley scandal when we have 100 more important things to do," said Paul, whose Global Peace Initiative is a nonprofit group that focuses on causes aimed at peace and humanitarian aid.

The page sex scandal threatens Republicans' congressional control just a month before the elections.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, who has been criticized by Democrats who say he didn't do enough to protect a page from Foley, says he told Hastert months ago about his concerns about Foley.

Hastert has insisted he was not aware of the charges until more recently but has accepted responsibility for the matter.

Hastert's Great Listening Skills (HILL)

By Emily Heil

The Hill, October 11, 2006

John Laesch is not a household name, but he is getting more attention in the wake of the House page program fiasco. Laesch is running against House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who attracted 69 percent of the vote in 2004.

Hastert is still a prohibitive favorite to win on Nov. 7, but his memory lapses may cost him some points this fall.

Reps. John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Thomas Reynolds (R-N.Y.) have said they talked to the Speaker about suspicious e-mails that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to House pages. Hastert had not denied that those conversations took place, but maintains he does not recall them.

His office has also claimed that the Speaker was not made aware of the e-mails until very recently, even though his aides were told of them a year ago.

Laesch doesn't buy it. On his website, he highlights a noteworthy paragraph in Hastert's 2004 autobiography.

On page 186, Hastert writes, "Reading is not my strong point … In our office the basic rule is: 'If you can say it, don't write it down. If you can nod your head, don't say it.'… I'm not comfortable with computers ... I need to be focused on what's going on in the room and who's saying what to whom. I base most of my knowledge on listening to people. I get a lot of briefings and have good people working for me."

DOJ_NMG_0078877

Here's the kicker: "Some say I have an incredible memory or recall for exactly what happened when and who said what to whom. I do listen pretty diligently, more than a lot of people listen, and I do pick up facts that way."

Laesch may not win, but he certainly knows how to compile opposition research.

A spokesman for Hastert did not comment.

American Idol, Senate style

Sens. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and Larry Craig (R-Idaho) aren't quite Jake and Elwood Blues, but they're putting the band back together, and given their conservative credentials, they might think they're on a mission from God.

Well, not exactly a band, it's actually a barbershop quartet, which is just as cool as a blues band — at least that's what someone needs to tell Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.).

That's right, Lott and Craig are putting their quartet, the "Singing Senators," back together after a six-year hiatus. The Republican quartet, which originally included Lott, Craig, Sen. Jim Jeffords (I-Vt.), and Sen. John Ashcroft (R-Mo.), broke up after Ashcroft lost his re-election bid in 2000. Any hopes keeping the group intact with a replacement fell apart half a year later when Jeffords defected from the GOP, swinging control of the Senate to Democrats.

Now that Lott has decided to serve another term, it appears the 65-year-old wants to revive the good ol' days when he sang bass (and also was majority leader).

Lott and Craig are auditioning for new singing partners and they've found two solid prospects in Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah) and Thune.

"Senator Thune has a lovely tenor voice," said Craig, who also sings tenor. "And Senator Bennett has a good baritone."

On the original quartet, Jeffords sang tenor and Ashcroft baritone.

But it appears the comeback tour may be threatened by a generation gap. While the 73-year-old Bennett is enthusiastic, the 45-year-old Thune isn't so sure.

"Bob wants to do it," said Craig, 61. "It's Thune who doesn't know. He thinks it's a little hokey. He asked if senators do this sort of thing."

"I said yes," said Craig, who has advised his colleague to relax and live a little. "You've got to let your hair down and enjoy it."

Iraq as the 51st State? No, we don't think so.

One of the more startling disclosures in Bob Woodward's new book about the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq apparently has been overlooked because of other juicy tales of vicious turf battles among Bush's top advisers.

But turn to pages 223-24 of "State of Denial" to read how a leading Shiite cleric hopes to make Iraq the 51st state.

As Woodward tells it, retired Army Gen. Jay Garner, who briefly served as Iraq's first occupation administrator before being abruptly dismissed, told Bush and Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld during a meeting in the Oval Office about a meeting he held with the cleric.

Asked by Garner for guidance "on what we should do next," the cleric spoke for an hour. He summed up his advice by saying Iraq needed a working government founded on democratic principles and based on a constitution supported by all the Iraqi people.

"So we must follow these principles and we must put a democracy together and we have to write a constitution built on the principles of Jesus Christ," the cleric, identified as Sheik Farqat al-Quizwini, said.

Then, he added, "Once we have this government, you'll bring us in as the 51st state."

Garner said he told the cleric that was "a terrific idea" and he would work on it. Afterward, when talking to Malcolm McPherson, a Time magazine reporter who was at the meeting, Garner asked the journalist if he would report the story.

"For Christ's sake, I'll never put this in Time," McPherson replied. "Nobody would believe it."

Democrats for Mark Foley

Democrats have been scoring some major political points off the Mark Foley scandal, with some predicting it will help them take control of Congress next year.

But a leading Democrat for Congress, at least at first glance, appears to have been a fan of the disgraced lawmaker by registering the domain name democratsformarkfoley.com last year.

The Democrat is Tim Mahoney, who is looking to win Foley's seat on Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0078878

After expressing surprise that Mahoney had reserved the domain name, his spokeswoman Jessica Santillo went searching for answers.

Within a couple of hours, Santillo confirmed it, saying that “our Web guy” registered it “as a strategic move.”

Mahoney is also listed as the contact for the domain name republicansfortimmahoney.com. Neither site is live.

Mahoney’s rights to the Mark Foley domain name expire tomorrow. Will he be retaining those rights?

No comment, Santillo said.

Joe Negron, the Republican who is actually pushing for signs at Florida polling places that say, “A vote for Mark Foley is a vote for Joe Negron,” could not be reached for comment. Despite his resignation, Foley’s name will appear on the ballot while Negron’s will not.

Kolbe Says He Warned Of Foley Years Ago (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP-Yahoo, October 11, 2006

Arizona Rep. Jim Kolbe said Tuesday he told the House official in charge of the page program as early as 2001 about Rep. Mark Foley's "creepy" e-mail to a former page.

Kolbe, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, said a former page he had sponsored contacted his office to complain of e-mails from Foley and that he "passed along" the complaint to Foley, R-Fla., and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl. Kolbe said he did not take the matter to other lawmakers.

Elsewhere on Tuesday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., again said his staff aides acted appropriately last fall in handling information on Foley's conduct.

"I didn't think anybody at any time in my office did anything wrong," Hastert said. But he also issued a stern warning: "If they did cover something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs."

The developments unfolded as a prominent conservative quoted Hastert as casting doubt on claims by two members of the leadership in connection with the page scandal.

Hastert "assured me that the statement by Congressman John A. Boehner ... that months ago he had told Hastert about the page problem with Congressman Foley, was incorrect," Paul Weyrich wrote in an e-mail commentary on the issue. Boehner, R-Ohio, is the majority leader.

"As to Congressman Thomas M. Reynolds, the speaker said, 'If he had mentioned this problem to me, I surely would have taken notice,'" Weyrich added in an account of a phone conversation with Hastert. Reynolds, R-N.Y., heads the House Republican campaign organization.

Weyrich quoted Hastert as saying Reynolds often came to him with numerous requests to help "incumbents who are in trouble. The speaker said he signs off on the majority of requests and only listens with one ear because the requests are repetitive."

Kolbe spokeswoman Korenna Cline said the complaints to the lawmaker from a former page involved e-mails that were described as "creepy" but were not seen by Kolbe, and occurred in 2001 or 2002, well before House leaders say they first learned of inappropriate messages sent by Foley.

Kolbe is the second person to come forward and say that top House officials had early warnings about inappropriate Foley approaches to pages. Trandahl, the top administrative officer of the House, got his job from Hastert.

A lawyer for Kirk Fordham, Foley's longtime chief of staff, said Fordham will tell the House ethics panel Thursday that he warned Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, about inappropriate Foley conduct with pages in 2003 or possibly the previous year. Palmer has denied Fordham's account.

Hastert says he learned of Foley's conduct toward pages only on Sept. 29, when the Florida lawmaker abruptly resigned after being confronted by ABC News with copies of lurid instant messages he had sent to a former page. About a year ago, Hastert aides learned from Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., about "over-friendly" but not sexually explicit e-mails from Foley to a former page from Louisiana. The aides did not inform Hastert, according to an account by his office.

In other developments Tuesday:

DOJ_NMG_0078879

_A former congressional page said to have received electronic messages from Foley met with FBI agents in Oklahoma City. Stephen Jones, an attorney for ex-page Jordan Edmund, said Edmund "answered their questions and cooperated to the fullest" and that he had been contacted by the House ethics committee as well.

• Trandahl's lawyer, Cono Namorato, said Trandahl "will cooperate fully with the FBI and the House ethics committee investigations."

• Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., chairman of the House Page Board, has relayed to the House Ethics Committee his "interest to cooperate" and appear before the panel whenever requested, Shimkus spokesman Steve Tomaszewski said. Shimkus has not been informed when he should expect to testify.

_Ethics Committee Chairman Doc Hastings, R-Wash., told The Associated Press the panel is "moving to have this done in weeks. ... We are moving as quickly as we can." But he declined to say whether the committee would complete its investigation before the elections on Nov. 7.

Kolbe, who is retiring from Congress at the end of this year, defended his actions in response to the complaint from the former page.

"Some time after leaving the page program, an individual I had appointed as a page contacted my office to say he had received e-mails from Rep. Foley that made him uncomfortable," Kolbe said in a statement. "I was not shown the content of the messages and was not told they were sexually explicit. It was my recommendation that this complaint be passed along to Rep. Foley's office and the clerk who supervised the page program. This was done promptly."

Asked about Kolbe's statement, Hastert told reporters in Aurora, Ill.: "I don't know anything more about it. If there's something that was of a nature that should have been reported or brought forward, then he should have done that."

Hastert confirmed reports from last week that he had suggested having former FBI Director Louis Freeh head a Capitol Hill inquiry on the page program, but that House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi objected.

Foley has acknowledged through his attorney that he is gay but has denied having any sexual contact with minors.

Meanwhile, lawmakers are responding to the ethics committee's request that they survey aides and former House pages to find out if any of them had knowledge of inappropriate conduct by Foley toward male pages.

Earlier Warning About Foley Emails Is Confirmed (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A Republican congressman and past member of the House Page Board confirmed an earlier incident in which a former House page complained of inappropriate email from Rep. Mark Foley.

Rep. Jim Kolbe of Arizona said his office informed Kirk Fordham, chief of staff to Mr. Foley -- a former Republican congressman from Florida -- and Jeff Trandahl, then the House Clerk, of the complaint.

"We contacted Kirk Fordham in Foley's office and told him he should advise Mr. Foley to stop communicating with the individual," Mr. Kolbe said Tuesday. "My staff says the Clerk was advised."

The complaint appears to have been made between 2000 and 2002, or more than two years before a separate incident last fall, when a Louisiana family complained to their congressman of Foley emails to their teenage son, also a former page.

In both cases, Mr. Foley was warned directly or through his staff to cease contact with the former pages, and he apparently did. But following Mr. Foley's resignation on Sept. 29 -- and disclosure of his sexually explicit messages to former pages -- House Republicans are under fire for not having done more to investigate these early warnings of his behavior.

Mr. Fordham, who is to testify Thursday before the House Ethics Committee in its probe of the matter, has accused the House Republican leadership of ignoring his pre-2005 warnings about Mr. Foley's inappropriate contacts with House pages. A veteran political operative who left Mr. Foley's employ in late 2003, Mr. Fordham said last week that he went to the leadership because of his own concerns, as well as warnings by Mr. Trandahl about Mr. Foley's conduct.

At a speech about the economy, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) says2 anyone linked to a cover up in the Foley scandal will be fired, but insists that no one in his office did anything wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0078880

Mr. Trandahl, who is described by friends as having been very protective of the pages under his supervision, has declined to comment. The new developments highlight the importance of his future testimony, because he was responsible for the page program and reported to Speaker Dennis Hastert's office. If Mr. Trandahl was informed, the Ethics Committee will want to know if he shared that information with the speaker's office. When the complaint came last year from the Louisiana family, it would have been a second red flag about Mr. Foley's behavior for Mr. Trandahl and anyone he advised in Mr. Hastert's office.

At home in Illinois, Mr. Hastert again defended how his staff handled the 2005 complaint, but said that "in 20/20 hindsight, probably you could do everything a little bit better." He added, "If they did cover something up, then they should not continue to have their jobs."

Mr. Fordham's attorney, Timothy Heaphy, declined to comment about whether his client had been a contact in dealing with the page complaint raised by Mr. Kolbe. Mr. Trandahl's attorney, Cono Namorato, also declined to comment when told of Mr. Kolbe's account.

Mr. Kolbe, a former page, is retiring this year after 11 terms in Congress, during which he served a stint on the Page Board until February 2001.

Traveling in Europe, Mr. Kolbe responded Tuesday, in written answers sent by email to the Journal and then later in a statement from his office.

"I never saw any of the messages," he said, "And was never told they were sexually explicit, only that they made the former page uncomfortable."

He said his best recollection is the complaint came to him "much later than 2000," that he didn't speak directly to Mr. Foley, and instead his office contacted Mr. Fordham and Mr. Trandahl's office.

Mr. Kolbe said that if the former page, whom he appointed to the House program, says the complaint was made in 2000, he wouldn't dispute this. But he believed the date was later and after he had left the Page Board.

"Whenever this happened, it was after his tenure as page," Mr. Kolbe said. "He was no longer a page, not subject to the jurisdiction of the Page Board. I thought then and think now we handled this exactly correctly, given the amount of information we were given."

Nonetheless, the Foley matter has forced the House to rethink its responsibility for teenagers after leaving the page program, in which they work for one or two semesters on Capitol Hill. Mr. Foley showed a pattern of engaging in flirtatious, friendly behavior with pages while in Washington, and then pursuing them on the Internet after their stints as pages.

Retiring Kolbe In Spotlight (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP-Yahoo, October 11, 2006

If Arizona Rep. Jim Kolbe was trying to retire quietly, it isn't working out that way.

Kolbe confirmed Tuesday that he referred concerns about then-Rep. Mark Foley to the House clerk's office in 2001 or 2002 after a former page told him Foley had sent him e-mails that made him feel uncomfortable.

The revelation is key to the question of when top House Republicans knew about Foley's behavior and whether they should have acted sooner to intervene.

It has thrust Kolbe, 64, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, into the spotlight just as he is preparing to leave Washington after 22 years in the House.

Kolbe is best known for his advocacy for free trade, international development and immigration reform. He also has waged a quixotic campaign to eliminate the penny, which costs more to produce than it is worth and which many argue is becoming obsolete.

He served on the board that oversees the page program between 1995 and February 2001. He was a page for Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater from 1958 to 1960, and Kolbe's young staffers have described him as a professor-like figure who was willing to make time to discuss the issues of the day with them.

Spokeswoman Korenna Cline said Kolbe frequently offers his home to former pages, interns, constituents and colleagues.

"We joke in the office that we can't keep track of who is staying there," she said. "He's just very generous."

Kolbe, who is traveling in Europe, has declined interviews about his knowledge of concerns about Foley.

It may have been Kolbe's close relationship to the young staffers that led his former page to approach him about Foley.

Kolbe said in a statement Tuesday that his office reported the matter to the House clerk and took it up with Foley himself. The page did not report further problems, and Kolbe said he believed the matter was resolved.

"I believed then and believe now that this was the appropriate way to handle this incident given the information I had," Kolbe said.

It is unclear whether Kolbe's role in the Foley saga will affect his post-Congress employment options. This week, he was named one of five finalists to head the Global Fund to Prevent AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, the central financing engine of international efforts to fight those diseases.

Among his supporters is Jack Valenti, former president and chief executive officer of the Motion Picture Association of America and president of the Friends of the Global Fight Against AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria.

In an interview, Valenti said Kolbe is ideal for the job because he regularly won consensus while serving as chairman of the appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations, export financing and related programs.

"Members of his subcommittee ... trust him, they respect him and they believe in him," Valenti said.

AP Exclusive: Records Suggest Abramoff, Pombo Lobbying Contacts (AP)

By Erica Werner, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- California Rep. Richard Pombo has insisted he was never lobbied by Jack Abramoff. Records show the disgraced lobbyist billed a client for at least two contacts with Pombo a decade ago.

The lobbying records released by the Northern Mariana Islands show that Abramoff billed once for calls to Pombo, chairman of the House Resources Committee, and a second time for a discussion with him, while lobbying in 1996.

On more than two dozen other occasions from 1996 through 2001, Abramoff associates called or met with members of Pombo's staff, including his chief of staff, the records indicate. As the contacts picked up, Pombo voted Abramoff's way on a bill important to Abramoff's clients.

Pombo spokesman Brian Kennedy disputed the reported contacts, saying direct lobbying by Abramoff "never happened" and the staff-level contacts were "greatly inflated." Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in a congressional corruption investigation, is "an admitted felon" who can't be trusted, Kennedy said.

"I think any of these billing records should be taken with a grain of salt if not dismissed entirely," Kennedy said. He noted that e-mails have surfaced showing Abramoff instructed associates to inflate their billing hours.

Still, the records put in question Pombo's campaign-trail assertions that he barely knew Abramoff and was never lobbied by him. Pombo is running against Democrat Jerry McNerney and is favored to win an eighth term representing California's Central Valley.

The race is drawing attention from the national political parties and from environmental groups that oppose Pombo's pro-industry policies as chairman of the Resources Committee, which writes environmental laws.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to tax evasion and wire fraud and is cooperating in a wide-ranging federal bribery investigation that has already led to guilty pleas from Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and several congressional aides. On Friday, an aide to presidential strategist Karl Rove resigned after a congressional report showed she had extensive contacts with Abramoff.

"I met the guy two or three times in my whole life - he never once lobbied me on anything," Pombo said of Abramoff last week in a debate against McNerney, who's made ethics an issue in the campaign. It's a claim Pombo's made repeatedly during the campaign.

The Northern Mariana Islands, a chain of 14 islands near Guam, became a U.S. commonwealth in 1986. Residents have nonvoting citizenship but the islands are exempt from many federal labor laws.

Democrats, complaining about reported abuses at low-paying garment factories, have sought to end those exemptions and increase the minimum wage, now $3.05 an hour. The Marianas government hired Abramoff to block such moves.

DOJ_NMG_0078882

The island government released billing records and correspondence to The Associated Press and other organizations after Abramoff came under federal investigation last year for his work for Indian tribes.

The records, covering 1996 to 2001, indicate contacts beginning in March 1996 between officials at Abramoff's then-law firm, Preston Gates, and Pombo's staff.

One focus was legislation in the Resources Committee, of which Pombo was then a junior member, to give the Marianas a nonvoting delegate to Congress. Then-Marianas Gov. Froilan Tenorio was opposed. Abramoff and his associates lobbied the Hill, including a July 29, 1996, contact with Pombo's office.

Three days later the bill was narrowly defeated in committee. Pombo voted no.

"I have great news!" Abramoff wrote to Tenorio on Aug. 1, 1996. The delegate bill "was DEFEATED at the markup which finished about an hour ago. ... We were able to add four conservative Republicans to the block of Democrat opponents and defeat the bill by a vote of 13-12."

Kennedy said Pombo's opposition had nothing to do with Abramoff, whom he hadn't yet met. Instead, Pombo believed the Mariana Islands were too politically unstable to merit congressional representation. He now believes the situation has improved and supports a delegate for the islands, Kennedy said.

On Sept. 10, 1996, Abramoff billed for a discussion with Pombo. Two days later he gave Pombo a $500 donation, the first of what would become $7,500 in campaign contributions. Pombo has since donated the money to charity. On Nov. 21, 1996, Abramoff reported putting in calls to Pombo and other lawmakers.

In December 1996, a Marianas newspaper reported that Pombo was among lawmakers who would be visiting the island later in the month. The trip was being arranged by Abramoff's firm, but Pombo didn't end up going; Kennedy said he never was confirmed on the trip. One of Pombo's staffers, Todd Willens, did visit the islands with other congressional staffers on an Abramoff-planned trip the following year.

Pombo became Resources Committee chairman in 2003 when then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay, an Abramoff ally, helped jump him over more senior lawmakers.

Last year, a Mariana Islands audit became public that questioned the island's payments to Abramoff. Democratic Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., called on Pombo to hold hearings in the Resources Committee on Abramoff's conduct with the Marianas.

Pombo declined. Instead he and the Resources Committee's top Democrat, Nick Rahall of West Virginia, sent a letter to the Justice Department asking for the Marianas allegations to become part of the Abramoff investigation.

Judge Orders Government To Respond To Siegelman Evidence Preservation Order (WSFA-TV)

By Helen Hammons

WSFA-TV, NBC 12, Montgomery, AL, October 11, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala., October 10, 2006 -- U.S. District Judge Mark Fuller has given the government until Friday, October 13, 2006 to show cause in writing why the emergency motion submitted by attorneys for Governor Don Siegelman, requesting preservation of evidence related to alleged jury misconduct, should not be granted.

"Upon consideration of the defendant's Emergency Motion For Order to Require Preservation of Evidence (Doc. #469) filed on October 6, 2006, it is hereby ORDERED that the government show cause in writing on or before October 13, 2006 as to why the motion should not be granted."

The action of the judge is standard procedure.

Assistant United States Attorney Steve Feaga told wsfa.com,"We will of course comply with the Court's order. We do not believe the motion is well founded and will so state in our response and provide our reasoning at that time."

Siegelman attorney David McDonald, responding to Mr. Feaga's comment told wsfa.com,"I can't wait for the Justice Department to file a brief that opposes the preservation of evidence. I'm going to blow it up, frame it, and hang it on my wall."

McDonald says he understands the government and the judge need time to respond to the motion concerning alleged juror misconduct and the possible introduction of extrinsic evidence into the jury room. However, McDonald says all he's asking is that all evidence be preserved while the judge takes the motions into consideration. "How in the world is the government going to oppose that?" questions McDonald.

Concerning Judge Fullers order McDonald says, "I think it signifies to us the judge is taking this motion seriously..."

Death Penalty Sought In Puerto Rico Case (AP)

By Manuel Ernesto Rivera

AP, October 11, 2006

Federal prosecutors on Tuesday urged a jury to choose capital punishment for a Puerto Rican man convicted of killing a hospital guard in what could be the first death sentence handed down in the U.S. territory in nearly 80 years.

Carlos Ayala Lopez was found guilty two months ago in the 2002 slaying of Jose Rodriguez Reyes, a guard at the Veteran's Medical Center in Rio Piedras. The jury reconvened Tuesday to decide if Ayala should be executed or sentenced to life in prison.

"Justice will be to give him the punishment that he deserves ... and to sentence Carlos Ayala Lopez to death," Assistant U.S. Attorney Jacabed Rodriguez told the jury of six men and six women.

One of the jurors cried as Rodriguez displayed photos of the crime scene at the hospital just outside San Juan. Prosecutors said Ayala shot the guard while trying to steal the man's gun for a planned drug trafficking operation.

Puerto Rico abolished capital punishment in 1929, but federal prosecutors can still seek the death penalty in some cases because the territory is subject to U.S. federal law. The island's last execution was in 1927, when a man was hanged for murder. The island's legislature approved a resolution reaffirming the anti-death penalty stance in May.

The only other case in which a federal jury in Puerto Rico had to decide whether to impose a death sentence was in 2005. The jury opted to give two men charged with murder a life sentence.

Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila has urged the U.S. Justice Department not to seek the death penalty in cases in Puerto Rico. Anti-death penalty protests are held often in the territory, and local activists have accused the United States of trying to impose federal capital punishment in colonialist fashion.

Supreme Court Considers Indictment Flaws (AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Judges and prosecutors make mistakes, a Justice Department lawyer told the Supreme Court Tuesday, but sometimes those errors are so minor that they don't warrant reversing a conviction in a criminal case.

A jury convicted Juan Resendiz-Ponce of attempting to enter the United States illegally from Mexico. But the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals overturned Resendiz-Ponce's conviction because his indictment by a grand jury did not set out any specific acts showing how he tried to enter the United States.

The omission was so serious that it required automatic reversal of the conviction, the appellate court said.

Deputy Solicitor General Michael Dreeben told justices Tuesday, however, that Resendiz-Ponce received a fair trial at which the government proved that he had displayed two false pieces of identification in an effort to enter the country. Resendiz-Ponce presented his cousin's green card and driver license when he approached the border crossing at San Luis, Ariz., on June 1, 2003.

Dreeben conceded that prosecutors should have included more information in the indictment and, when they didn't, the trial judge should have dismissed the charge before the trial began.

Even so, he said, the conviction should stand.

"Such an error violates the Fifth Amendment, but it is harmless," he said.

Upholding the appeals court ruling would force "the government to pay a tremendous penalty when a mistake is made in the indictment," Dreeben said.

Some justices said they saw nothing wrong with the indictment. "It doesn't seem to me there's any defect in this indictment," Justice Samuel Alito said.

Atmore Baggot, Resendiz-Ponce's lawyer, said the grand jury meets in secret and the only public record of its work is the indictment. If there are errors, the government should be required to have a grand jury correct them, Baggot said.

Resendiz-Ponce remains in jail while the government's appeal is pending. Prosecutors could seek to indict him again.

The case is U.S. v. Resendiz-Ponce, 05-998.

* __

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov

Pilot Didn't Kill Wales, Lawyer Says (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 11, 2006

FBI to reveal new details today on prosecutor's death 5 years ago

The lawyer representing the prime suspect in the killing of federal prosecutor Tom Wales publicly declared his client's innocence Tuesday, rejecting the notion that he held a grudge against Wales and protesting the government's inquisitionlike investigation.

"This is Richard Jewell all over again," Seattle attorney Larry Setchell said, referring to the man wrongly suspected in the 1996 Olympics bombing.

Setchell's client, a 45-year-old commercial pilot who recently moved to Snohomish, has been in the FBI's cross hairs since Wales was shot to death in his Queen Anne home five years ago today.

Next week, Setchell said, the pilot will provide agents with handwriting samples -- hoping to prove he wasn't the author of a bizarre, anonymous letter sent to the bureau earlier this year by someone claiming to be a hit man hired to kill Wales.

After the Oct. 11, 2001, slaying, federal authorities launched a massive manhunt. If Wales was killed because of his job, he would be the first federal prosecutor murdered in the line of duty.

But in an interview with the Seattle P-I, Setchell said the FBI has "no science" connecting the pilot to the scene of the killing.

"They took everything from his house and they have nothing connecting him to Tom Wales. If they did, he wouldn't be walking the streets," the attorney said. The P-I isn't identifying the pilot because he hasn't been charged with a crime.

Making his most extensive comments on the case to date, Setchell likened it to the Atlanta Olympics bombing investigation, which has become synonymous with FBI blunders. Jewell, a security guard at the games, was named in national news reports as the focus of the federal investigation, only to be cleared.

In the Wales case, FBI agents have searched the pilot's homes three times and hauled away clothes, cars and most of his shoes. They got the airline he worked for to ground him. They've also intercepted his phone calls, put him under surveillance, interviewed friends and neighbors -- even talked to the women he was dating. He has since remarried.

Despite the pilot's assertions of innocence, investigators consider him a "vengeful, calculating, controlling" man who had a strong motive to kill Wales.

In 2001, Wales prosecuted the pilot, his business partner and others on charges that they improperly modified a surplus military helicopter for civilian use. Wales ultimately dropped the charges after an expert witness for the government was shown to have lied in another, similar case to the Justice Department, Federal Aviation Administration and the court, Setchell said. An internal investigative report from the Department of Transportation's Inspector General obtained by the P-I confirms that the expert witness lied.

Setchell said his client, who spent more than $100,000 in legal fees, felt "profound frustration" over the prosecution. "How could there not be? He hadn't done anything wrong."

But Setchell said that he and his client "never once blamed Tom Wales."

The pilot later sued the government, alleging that Wales' prosecution had been improper.

In a response to that suit filed shortly before Wales was killed, prosecutors said the pilot had a "violent and retributive nature" and was trying to ferret out the names of government witnesses in order to "avenge himself."

Setchell said two of the witnesses were the pilot's ex-wife, with whom he had a contentious divorce, and a former business partner who had an ax to grind.

DOJ_NMG_0078885

While Setchell insists "there weren't bad words" between his client and Wales, a federal criminal justice source said that in the middle of the helicopter case -- after Wales had talked to the pilot's ex-wife -- the pilot angrily confronted Wales in person and told him to stop talking to her.

Setchell flatly denied that. "It never happened," he said.

In the middle of the pilot's suit to recover attorney's fees, terrorists attacked America on 9/11. Wales, a leading anti-gun activist, argued on television against calls to arm commercial pilots. One federal criminal justice source later speculated that the pilot, whom he called a "Second Amendment nut" who owned several guns, saw Wales on TV and "went over the edge."

A few weeks later, Wales was found dead in his basement. He had been shot through a window while he worked on his computer.

Setchell rejects such speculation, saying his client isn't a gun activist, didn't belong to any gun club and didn't know Wales was an anti-gun activist.

The night of the killing, the pilot maintains he was with a friend at the Cinerama in downtown Seattle watching "2001, A Space Odyssey." They left the film and went to their separate homes, Setchell said.

The lawyer said records will confirm the pilot was at home at the time of the killing, making phone calls. But federal agents say there was enough unaccounted-for time for the pilot to drive to Wales' home, fire the fatal shot and return to his residence in Bellevue.

"Just like any other human being, the pilot can't account for all of his time that night," Setchell acknowledged.

Authorities dissecting the pilot's life started by getting him grounded. On Dec. 20, 2001, U.S. Airways wrote the pilot a letter saying that it had been "notified by federal law enforcement personnel that you are a 'person of interest' in a homicide" and that he was also suspected of transporting illicit drugs on US Airways planes.

The following March, the company allowed him back in the cockpit, saying their internal investigation was complete.

Authorities notified the airline of the investigation on the direct order of then-U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft, according to a federal criminal justice source.

FBI Special Inspector Robert Jordan, who this summer took charge of the investigation, will conduct a media briefing at noon today in which authorities will provide "new information about the investigation." The briefing will follow a memorial observance to be attended by Wales' family members and top federal and local law enforcement officials.

Jordan did not return a call for comment Tuesday. Steven Clymer, the special prosecutor appointed to the investigation, declined to comment.

In their exhaustive investigation into the pilot's life, the feds have found stories that reinforce their psychological profile that the suspect is "the kind of guy that would do this," according to a federal criminal justice source.

The case against the pilot is replete with circumstantial tidbits: For example, shortly after the shooting, the pilot left town and headed east of the mountains for a time, according to the source. The pilot also sent his brother a letter with information just in case "something happened," the source said.

The most tantalizing circumstantial evidence to emerge so far may be the fact that the pilot was in Las Vegas earlier this year when the anonymous "hit man" letter was mailed from there.

Setchell said his client was in Las Vegas at the time on a layover. The August search of his Snohomish home was conducted to obtain examples of his handwriting to compare it with the letter.

P-I reporter Paul Shukovsky can be reached at 206-448-8072 or paulshukovsky@seattlepi.com.

FBI Investigating Actions Of Specter Staff Member (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — The FBI is investigating whether a member of Sen. Arlen Specter's staff broke the law by helping her husband, a lobbyist, secure almost $50 million in Pentagon spending for his clients, the senator acknowledged Tuesday.

In an Aug. 21 letter, FBI official Joseph Persichini Jr. told Specter, R-Pa., that the bureau is investigating “allegations of possible criminal misconduct” by staff member Vicki Siegel Herson. Persichini also asked for a copy of a report summarizing the results of an investigation of Siegel and other Specter employees with relatives who are lobbyists. Specter's former chief of staff, William Reynolds, carried out the investigation.

Specter provided a copy of the FBI letter to USA TODAY and said his staff gave the FBI the report last month.

The federal probe stems from a February report by USA TODAY about Siegel. Specter helped direct $48.7 million in Pentagon spending over the past five years to clients of her lobbyist husband, Michael Herson.

Specter has acknowledged he used his position on the Senate Appropriations Committee to put special-interest language in Pentagon spending bills directing the money to clients of Herson's firm, American Defense International.

Specter says he didn't know of the link to Siegel, who was one of his top advisers on spending issues until last fall.

Specter says he did nothing wrong. “There's no violation of the (Senate) ethics rules,” Specter, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Tuesday.

Siegel and Herson did not return messages seeking comment Tuesday evening.

Specter's investigation found that two lobbyists related to Specter staff members had lobbied the senator's office and that Specter inserted language directing a $200,000 grant to the client of one of them last year. That lobbyist, Eric Wallace, is the son of Specter's Scranton office chief, Andy Wallace.

USA TODAY reported on the findings April 25. That day, FBI agent Jennifer Bach reviewed Specter's personal financial disclosure statements, Senate records show. Specter said his family's assets are in a blind trust, and “I've taken every step to avoid problems.”

After the first report about Siegel, Specter changed his office rules to ban contact with any lobbyists related to staff members. Specter also referred the matter to the Senate ethics committee, which has taken no action.

The Siegel investigation is the latest probe centering on the House and Senate appropriations committees. Federal authorities are investigating the links among House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., his staff and a lobbying firm that employs several of his friends, former staffers and relatives of staffers.

FBI Eyed Specter $$ Reports In Probe Of Aide (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 11, 2006

FBI agents have reviewed U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter's financial disclosure statements as part of an investigation into a Specter aide whose husband's lobbying firm secured millions in federal funds with Specter's help.

The agents are "conducting an investigation into allegations of possible criminal misconduct" by Specter staff member Vicki Siegel Herson, according to an FBI letter sent in August requesting an internal staff report on the aide.

Siegel Herson's husband, Michael Herson, is a lobbyist whose clients secured $48.7 million in appropriations "earmarked" by Specter, R-Pa., according to a USA Today report in April .

Earmarks are funds inserted in legislation by a lawmaker for a specific project that weren't requested by the receiving agency or authorized by previous legislation.

Specter said in a phone interview yesterday that he has not been interviewed by the FBI and neither he nor his staff has received subpoenas in the matter.

"Everything that was ever done here was within the [Senate] ethics rules," Specter said.

After USA Today stories appeared on Siegel Herson and another staff member whose son is a lobbyist for federal funds, Specter said he banned lobbying contact with his office by relatives of his staff, asked for a Senate Ethics Committee probe, and ordered his own staff to investigate.

FBI agents reviewed the staff report, which found no impropriety, in September, Specter said.

The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported yesterday that in April an FBI agent reviewed Specter's own financial disclosure report, a public document on file in Washington.

Specter confirmed the newspaper report yesterday and said he had no idea why authorities might be interested in his financial statement.

DOJ_NMG_0078887

He said he'd placed stocks owned by him and his wife, Joan, in a blind trust and "taken every precaution" to avoid any conflict of interest.

Neither Siegel Herson nor her husband could be reached for comment yesterday.

According to USA Today, Michael Herson's lobbying firm, American Defense International, represented six firms between 2002 and 2005 that got nearly $50 million in funds earmarked by Specter.

None of the firms had gotten earmarks from Specter before hiring Herson's firm.

Specter said he had no idea that the firms were represented by a relative of his staff member, and said that Herson had not lobbied his office.

He also noted that some senators are married to lobbyists, citing former Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D.

USA Today also reported that Specter staff member Andy Wallace has a son, Eric Wallace, whose firm succeeded in getting a $200,000 earmark for a Philadelphia nonprofit.

Specter said yesterday he's suspended the practice of earmarking in his subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, and is considering whether to make the ban permanent.

Specter: FBI Reviewed His Report On Lobbying Ties (PHI)

By Steve Goldstein

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) said yesterday that the FBI reviewed results of an internal investigation by his office into whether staffers on his appropriations subcommittee steered earmarks to relatives working for lobbying firms.

The FBI sent a letter requesting access to the report in late July and examined it in September, Specter said. He said the internal review concluded there was no impropriety.

The senator said he thought the inquiry was prompted by a USA Today story in April that alleged that lobbyists related to Specter aides used that access to obtain earmarks for clients.

The congressional newspaper Roll Call reported yesterday that an FBI agent reviewed Specter's financial disclosure forms when the USA Today story appeared. The FBI acknowledged that it reviewed the forms but had no further comment.

"I really do not know" what the FBI was looking for, Specter said. He said the FBI contacted neither him nor any member of his staff.

Specter referred the matter to the Senate ethics committee, which has not concluded its inquiry. He has also changed the rules in his office to preclude any contact between office staff and relatives of employees engaged in lobbying.

Ney, Still Collecting Federal Salary, To Appear In Court This Week (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, October 11, 2006

With Republicans still reeling from the former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) scandal, more bad news is on the way for the GOP later this week.

Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), who has admitted to corruptly accepting thousands of gifts from lobbyists in exchange for legislative favors, is scheduled to appear before a federal judge on Friday the 13th to formally admit wrongdoing.

And to the dismay of Republicans, he will likely do so as a sitting member of Congress.

Ney has given up his gavels on the House Administration Committee and the Financial Services Housing and Community Opportunity subcommittee, but has kept his seat.

He will appear before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle at 10 a.m. at the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Shortly after announcing his plea agreement with the Justice Department on Sept. 15, Ney checked himself into an alcohol rehabilitation program.

Ney's last vote was cast Sept. 12 in support of a monument to the World Trade Center attacks in 2001 and 1993.

His congressional website makes no mention of his legal troubles and has not posted a new release since August.

Neither Ney's lawyer nor his congressional office returned calls for comment.

A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee confirmed Ney is still on the congressional payroll. Ney makes $165,200 annually, or $452.60 per day.

Ney has ignored calls from colleagues and outside ethics groups to step down from his post, including one from Ohio state Sen. Joy Padgett, who is running to replace him.

On Sept. 18, Padgett said, "Congressman Ney's admission of guilt to serious charges requires his immediate resignation."

She added that if he fails to do so, Congress should take action to expel him.

Earlier last month, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) had promised a "quick solution" to Ney's admissions, as the ethics committee launched an investigation.

Asked whether Ney should resign, Hastert said, "I think you will see a solution to that very, very quickly."

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) was more guarded, saying, "Until he has his day in court, I don't think it is up to me to say what he should and shouldn't do."

Seeking to deflect criticism about Foley, Hastert has noted that the disgraced ex-legislator is no longer a member of Congress, adding that Republicans moved quickly to address the matter.

On CBS's "Face the Nation" on Sunday, Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) also defended Hastert, saying, "I give Speaker Hastert high marks for strong leadership. He took care of [former Rep.] Tom DeLay [R-Texas], his best friend, when Tom was having ethical problems. The Speaker went to him and asked him to leave. When he appointed [former Rep.] Randy "Duke" Cunningham to the Intelligence Committee, he went to Duke and made sure he wasn't on the Intelligence Committee after it was disclosed he took $2.3 million. And when Bob Ney was appointed chairman of the House Administration Committee, he was appointed by Speaker Hastert. Speaker Hastert went to him and told him to step down from that committee after the [Jack] Abramoff disclosures. Hastert has the ability to take on these big ethical challenges that our party has faced."

However, he has apparently fallen short in persuading Ney to step aside.

Hastert's office did not comment for this article.

Current rules permit Ney to keep his pension should he go to prison, which has outraged tax and ethics watchdog groups.

"This Ney thing has been outrageous for years," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "The ethics committee is never going to look into it."

Others echo that claim, saying the ethics panel will focus on Foley in the coming weeks.

Sloan added that she believes the ethics committee would use Ney's plea as an excuse to not aggressively probe his behavior as a member of Congress.

Tim Batkins, a spokesman for the National Taxpayers Union said, "A government pension is basically a federal entitlement. … Some felons can't vote and yet members of Congress [in prison] will receive $30,000 to $40,000 a year," after they are released.

Foley resigned Sept. 29 after inappropriate e-mails and instant messages to House pages surfaced in the media. The ethics committee, the FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are investigating the matter.

Malvo Pleads Guilty To Montgomery Slayings (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

Sniper Lee Boyd Malvo formally took responsibility yesterday for his role in the October 2002 sniper shootings in Montgomery County, pleading guilty to six counts of first-degree murder.

His attorneys said that before Malvo's scheduled Nov. 9 sentencing hearing, they will try to reach a "global resolution," which presumably would entail his pleading guilty to slayings and shootings in other parts of the country where he is a suspect.

If such a deal is reached, Malvo, 21, could benefit by being allowed to serve time in a federal prison rather than a maximum-security penitentiary in Virginia, where he was first convicted of murder. Although defense lawyers raised the prospect of such an agreement, no negotiations appear to be underway.

DOJ_NMG_0078889

Malvo, dressed in a green prison jumpsuit, said little during the 30-minute hearing in Rockville. He spoke softly, answering "yes" or "no" to questions that are routinely asked in plea hearings to ensure that the admission of guilt is being offered freely and legitimately.

"This is an articulate, intelligent kid who was manipulated and cajoled by a monster, a coward," said attorney Timothy J. Sullivan, referring to Malvo's fellow sniper, John Allen Muhammad. "Malvo is making attempts to redeem himself and to move forward."

Malvo pleaded guilty in the slayings of James D. Martin, 55; James L. "Sonny" Buchanan, 39; Premkumar A. Walekar, 54; Sarah Ramos, 34; Lori Lewis Rivera, 25; and Conrad Johnson, 35.

Malvo's attorneys spoke only broadly about his "legal problems" outside the Washington area and declined to describe their efforts to reach a sweeping plea agreement.

"The jurisdictions know who they are, and they know where we are," said William Brennan, Malvo's other attorney.

In June, The Washington Post reported that Malvo told law enforcement officials in the spring that he and Muhammad committed two homicides and two nonfatal shootings outside the area that had not been publicly attributed to them. The slayings happened in California and Texas; the other shootings took place in Florida and Louisiana.

Muhammad and Malvo killed 10 people in the Washington area and wounded four. Including the four crimes Malvo cited this spring, the pair are suspects in seven homicides and six nonfatal shootings that took place before they reached the Washington area.

Montgomery State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said his office made no concessions to Malvo in exchange for his guilty plea in the Maryland cases. Prosecutors intend to ask Montgomery Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan to sentence Malvo to six terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole. His punishment in Maryland is likely to be merely symbolic, however, because he is serving life without the possibility of parole in Virginia.

Gansler said a plea hearing on a deal that would allow Malvo to serve time in a federal prison could provide answers and closure to dozens of victims' relatives.

"It's not about Mr. Malvo," Gansler said. "In our view, the families of victims in other states totally deserve the right to know what happened and why."

If there is no deal, Malvo is expected to return to southwestern Virginia's Red Onion State Prison, which holds some of the state's most dangerous criminals and has been criticized by human rights organizations for what they say are severe conditions.

Gansler said his office won't try to persuade Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) to relinquish custody of Malvo. But he said the office could assist in consolidating dozens of crimes in numerous jurisdictions into a single plea hearing if a deal is reached. Such a plea hearing should happen in the Washington area, Gansler said.

Kevin Hall, a spokesman for Kaine, said no one has formally approached the governor with a proposal that would allow Malvo to serve time outside Virginia. He said Montgomery prosecutors raised the idea this year with the governor, which triggered stern opposition from the Virginia prosecutors in the sniper trials.

"Their wishes carry considerable weight in this discussion," Hall said, referring to Fairfax County Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. and Prince William County Commonwealth's Attorney Paul B. Ebert.

Ebert said criminals shouldn't be allowed to choose their prison.

"I know Malvo doesn't like Red Onion," Ebert said. "He should have thought about that before he came here and committed these crimes."

Ebert said he still has "serious doubts" about Malvo's credibility and thinks that relatives of victims in other jurisdictions "got all the answers they're going to get."

A federal indictment encompassing the unsettled shootings could be an alternative to a plea deal at the state level. But that option seems unlikely.

"This is a state case," FBI Special Agent Michelle Crnkovich said yesterday. "Any deals they're making are being made by the states."

She said FBI agents assisted Montgomery prosecutors during Muhammad's trial but are not actively involved in the case.

DOJ_NMG_0078890

Tom Reedy, a spokesman for the Denton County Sheriff's Office in North Texas -- which is investigating the May 27, 2002, shooting of landscaper Billy G. Dillon, one of the crimes Malvo cited in the spring -- said the case remains unsolved.

"We haven't had any movement on that," Reedy said. "We haven't heard anything from anybody."

Cheryll Witz, the daughter of 60-year-old Jerry R. Taylor, who was fatally shot March 19, 2002, at a Tucson golf course, said she would like her day in court. Malvo told investigators that he and Muhammad were responsible for killing Taylor.

"I really would like an answer as to why and an 'I'm sorry,' " Witz said. "I would like to know that he's remorseful for what he did. You can tell that someone is truly remorseful by looking in their eyes."

Malvo testified against Muhammad during his month-long trial in Maryland in May, providing the first public firsthand account of the shooting spree that the two carried out while traveling in an old Chevy Caprice. The pair shot people in public places with a high-powered rifle, often pulling the trigger from the trunk of the car. Muhammad, 45, has been convicted of murder in Virginia and Maryland for his role in the shootings and is awaiting execution in Virginia.

Malvo said he was indoctrinated by Muhammad, whom he described as a cunning man bent on killing scores of people and then moving to Canada to train dozens of young killers.

Muhammad, who represented himself, described Maryland's case against him as a law enforcement conspiracy. Malvo said he was acknowledging his role because he is no longer under Muhammad's spell.

Malvo Pleads Guilty To 6 Sniper Killings (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, October 11, 2006

Lee Boyd Malvo pleaded guilty yesterday to the six sniper murders in Montgomery County, a deal that might lead to legal conclusion of other shootings in the District, Virginia, Alabama and Louisiana.

Circuit Judge James L. Ryan postponed sentencing until Nov. 9 after public defender William Brennan said time was needed "to reach a global resolution to Mr. Malvo's legal problems."

During the 45-minute hearing, Principal Deputy State's Attorney Katherine Winfree read an eight-page proffer detailing the killings of 13 persons and wounding of seven in Maryland, Virginia, the District, Alabama and Louisiana from Sept. 5 to Oct. 22, 2002.

Wearing a green prison jumpsuit, Malvo, now 21, showed no emotion during the hearing and answered only "yes" or "no" to his attorneys' questions. The proffer included details from his testimony during the May trial of his partner, John Allen Muhammad, 45, who was convicted of the six Montgomery County murders and sentenced to six life terms. Muhammad is now back in Virginia on death row for killing Dean Harold Meyers, 53, in Manassas.

"Mr. Malvo is making attempts to redeem himself and move forward," said his other public defender, Timothy Sullivan. "The first step was when he had the courage to testify against the man who taught him to be a killer. He's going to make the best of what is left of his life.

"This kid was manipulated by a monster," Mr. Sullivan said.

State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said Malvo probably will be sentenced to six consecutive life terms without a chance for parole. The minimum sentence would be a single life term with a chance for parole.

According to an interstate agreement before the Montgomery trials, Mr. Gansler said Malvo will be returned to Virginia, where he was sentenced to life in 2003 for killing FBI analyst Linda Franklin, 47, on Oct. 14, 2002, in a parking lot outside the Home Depot in Falls Church.

Mr. Gansler said the plea deal could mean Malvo won't serve his sentence in Virginia. Malvo could plead guilty to the Oct. 3, 2002, shooting of Pascal Charlot, 72, in the District and thus serve a life term in the federal system, which houses D.C. prisoners.

Malvo is "willing to give these families the satisfaction of knowing what happened, how it happened," Mr. Gansler said of the shootings that have yet to be prosecuted.

But Mr. Gansler said the decision on a plea rests with Virginia authorities, who agreed to let Muhammad and Malvo go temporarily to Montgomery County for new trials.

DOJ_NMG_0078891

Kevin Hall, a spokesman for Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, said the governor's office has not had any recent discussions with Maryland prosecutors on a plea deal for Malvo. The prosecutors who first tried Muhammad and Malvo, Paul B. Ebert in Prince William County and Robert F. Horan Jr. in Fairfax County, were opposed when the idea was proposed a few months ago.

"Their objections were pretty sharp," Mr. Hall said.

Muhammad was described as the killer in the Montgomery County shootings, most from the trunk of a blue Chevrolet Caprice, firing a .223-caliber rifle through a hole just above the license plate.

The first victim in Montgomery County was James D. Martin, 55, who was shot in the parking lot of Shoppers Food Warehouse in Wheaton on Oct. 2. The next day, the victims were landscaper James L. "Sonny" Buchanan, 39, at Fitzgerald Auto Mall in Rockville; cabdriver Premkumar A. Walekar, 54, at a gas station on Connecticut Avenue in Aspen Hill; Sarah Ramos, 34, at the Leisure World shopping center in Silver Spring; and Lori-Ann Lewis-Rivera, 25, at a gas station in Kensington. The snipers struck elsewhere over the next three weeks until they returned to Montgomery County and killed bus driver Conrad E. Johnson, 35, on Grand Pre Road in Silver Spring on Oct. 22.

Malvo and Muhammad were arrested Oct. 24 in Frederick County, Md.

In all, 10 persons were slain and three wounded in Maryland, Virginia and the District.

The short hearing to formalize Malvo's Montgomery County plea contrasted with the two days of riveting testimony Malvo gave in May while helping prosecutors win convictions against Muhammad. It was the first insider account of the three-week rampage across the Washington region. The two snipers shot random victims with the high-powered rifle using the beat-up Chevrolet Caprice as cover.

Malvo described the genesis of the plot, saying Muhammad wanted to use it to extort $10 million and wreak havoc on the Washington area. Malvo described how they mapped out shooting sites in advance and worked as a team -- one spotting random victims, the other firing.

The young sniper also laid out Muhammad's grander scheme to shoot up to six persons each day for a month, target school buses and police officers with explosives, and set up a camp in Canada where homeless children would be trained as terrorists.

Malvo's Lawyers Seek Plea Deal (BSUN)

By Andrea F. Siegel, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, October 11, 2006

Young sniper reportedly seeks prison change for admitting to shootings

Attorneys for Washington-area sniper Lee Boyd Malvo, who pleaded guilty Tuesday to six murders in Montgomery County, are trying to forge a wide agreement that would have him also admit his role in other 2002 shootings in other states.

The deal has the potential to give Malvo what he reportedly wants -- a move from Virginia's Red Onion prison to a federal penitentiary -- if it includes a plea to the fatal shooting in Washington, D.C. to which he and John Allen Muhammad have been linked.

Malvo's lawyers said Tuesday they will move quickly to try to reach an agreement by his scheduled Nov. 9 sentencing in Rockville, where prosecutors are seeking the maximum sentence of six consecutive prison terms of life without parole.

"We are about to hopefully embark on some candid and frank discussions with some local prosecutors," said William C. Brennan, Malvo's lawyer. He said he will try in the coming weeks to "to effectuate a global resolution to Mr. Malvo's legal problems," but he and prosecutors declined to specify which shootings might be involved.

Charges are pending against Malvo and Muhammad in Alabama, Louisiana and Washington, D.C.. The pair is suspected -- in some cases because Malvo reportedly told police about them -- in shootings in Arizona, California, Florida, Georgia, Texas and Washington state.

Malvo, 21, is already serving a life prison term without parole in Virginia for a fatal sniper shooting there. Muhammad is on Virginia's death row for a fatal sniper shooting in that state, and has been sentenced to six life prison terms without parole for his role in the Montgomery County slayings of James D. Martin, 55; James L. "Sonny" Buchanan Jr., 39; Premkumar A. Walekar, 54; Sarah Ramos, 34; Lori Lewis-Rivera, 25; and Conrad E. Johnson, 35.

DOJ_NMG_0078892

Buchanan's sister, Vickie Snider, was the only relative of a sniper victim to see Malvo plead guilty Tuesday before Judge James L. Ryan. She said she has no opinion on where Malvo serves his time, just that he remains incarcerated.

"I don't care whether it's a federal prison or Red Onion" prison in Virginia, said Snider, whose brother was the first of four people fatally shot on Oct. 3, 2002, in Montgomery County. Buchanan was killed while cutting the grass for an auto dealership in Rockville.

More family members of victims are likely to attend the sentencing, when they may speak in court. They also may provide written statements in advance.

Snider said her heart breaks for the families who have yet to hear their murdered loved ones formally named as among Malvo and Muhammad's victims.

Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, the Democratic candidate for Maryland attorney general, agreed: "I would imagine it would give them more peace. They have the right to know what happened."

Malvo cooperated with Maryland authorities, providing details about crimes. He testified in May at Muhammad's trial, breaking his public silence about his role in the crimes, saying his mentor turned him into a killing machine.

Timothy J. Sullivan, Malvo's other lawyer, said that the native Jamaican would like to "redeem himself." No longer under Muhammad's sway, "he is growing every single day in sadness about the life he has wasted," Sullivan said.

An arrangement to shift Malvo into the federal prison system would hinge on authorities in Virginia, where Malvo is serving multiple life sentences for sniper shootings. Virginia authorities sent Malvo to Maryland for trial as part of a pact that says he has to be returned, Gansler said.

"It's really up to Virginia," Gansler said, adding that his office would not be involved in efforts to reach an expansive agreement for Malvo.

But last year when the subject was first broached, the two Virginia prosecutors who obtained convictions in trials against Malvo and Muhammad vehemently objected to what they viewed as letting Malvo pick his prison.

"I don't think any defendant should be able to choose the venue of his incarceration," Paul Ebert, the commonwealth's attorney for Prince William County who obtained a death sentence for Muhammad that is now on appeal, said Tuesday. "He should have thought of that when he came to Virginia to commit his crimes."

Kevin Hall, spokesman for Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine, said the prosecutors' opinions "would be a significant factor if the governor were to be asked to consider such a request." Told that Malvo reportedly might prefer federal prison accommodations to those in Virginia, Hall replied, "He hunted people. Tough."

A deal also would hinge on Malvo reaching an agreement with federal prosecutors in Washington, D.C. They said they cannot discuss any open case.

Ellen Brooks, the district attorney for Montgomery County, Ala., where authorities believe Malvo and Muhammad killed one woman and wounded another as they closed a liquor store Sept. 21, 2002, said she has not heard anything in months about Malvo.

"Certainly, we are interested in a resolution to our case," she said.

In the Washington area, 10 people were killed, three wounded and the region terrified by sniper shootings during the fall of 2002. Malvo maintained that he was following Muhammad's plan to extort $10 million from the government to end the terror. At his Maryland trial last spring. Muhammad claimed innocence, saying he'd come east from Washington state to reclaim the three children he'd lost in a bitter divorce.

Though Malvo initially said he did all the shootings, he later said he took full responsibility to shield Muhammad. He testified that he shot and wounded two people and killed only the final victim, bus driver Conrad E. Johnson, on Oct. 22, 2002, serving as Muhammad's spotter in the rest.

andrea.siegel@baltsun.com

Attorney: Sniper Seeking Deal For Life In Federal Prison (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 11, 2006

(AP) - ROCKVILLE, Maryland-Convicted Washington-area sniper Lee Boyd Malvo is seeking a broad plea agreement in which he would plead guilty to other 2002 sniper shootings that authorities have linked him to, defense attorneys and Maryland prosecutors said Tuesday.

The deal, announced as Malvo formally pleaded guilty to six Maryland murders, could be reached before his Nov. 9 sentencing for those killings. He is expected to receive six life sentences at that hearing.

Malvo lawyer William Brennan told Montgomery County Circuit Judge James Ryan that he hoped to use the time before sentencing to "reach a global resolution to Mr. Malvo's legal problems." Asked later by reporters for specifics, Brennan would only say that he would have "candid, frank discussions with some local prosecutors."

Malvo has already been convicted of shootings in neighboring Virginia. Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas Gansler said such a plea deal could mean Malvo may not serve his sentence there.

Malvo could plead guilty to the Oct. 3, 2002, shooting of Pascal Charlot in Washington, D.C. and serve his life term in the federal system, Gansler said. Federal prosecutors handle murder cases in the District of Columbia.

Gansler said the decision rests with Virginia authorities, who agreed to let Malvo and his one-time mentor, John Allen Muhammad, come to Maryland for new trials. Under an interstate agreement, Maryland must return Malvo after his sentencing.

Kevin Hall, a spokesman for Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine, said Kaine's staff has not had any recent discussions with Maryland prosecutors on a plea deal for Malvo. The Virginia prosecutors who first tried the pair were opposed when the idea was proposed a few months ago.

"Their objections were pretty sharp," Hall said.

Malvo, 21, is already serving a life prison term in Virginia for his 2003 conviction of murdering FBI analyst Linda Franklin at a Home Depot parking lot in Falls Church, Virginia, in October 2002. He later pleaded guilty to another Virginia sniper shooting.

Charges are still pending against Malvo and Muhammad for sniper shootings in Louisiana, Alabama, Washington, D.C., and Prince George's County, Maryland. In addition, authorities and published reports have tied the pair to shootings in Arizona, California, Georgia, Texas, and Washington state.

In all, 10 people were murdered and three wounded during the October 2002 shootings in Maryland, Virginia and Washington, D.C.

Brennan and Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas Gansler would not say which shootings could be included in the larger plea agreement.

Another Malvo attorney, Timothy Sullivan, said Malvo has accepted responsibility for his part in the shootings and wants to make amends.

"Every single day this kid realizes the enormity of what he has done," Sullivan said. "Mr. Malvo is making attempts to redeem himself and move forward."

Muhammad, who was convicted in May by a Montgomery County jury and given six life terms, has already been sent back to Virginia, where he is on death row for a sniper shooting in Manassas, Virginia.

In May, while helping prosecutors win convictions against Muhammad, Malvo gave two days of riveting testimony that provided the first insider account of the duo's three-week rampage across the Washington region, shooting random victims with a rifle while using a beat-up Chevrolet Caprice as cover.

Malvo said Muhammad wanted to use it to extort $10 million (â,¬800,000) and wreak havoc. He described how they mapped out shooting sites and worked as a team - one spotting random victims, the other firing the .223-caliber rifle.

He also laid out Muhammad's grander scheme to shoot as many as six people each day for a month, target school buses and police with explosives, and set up a camp in Canada where homeless children would be trained as terrorists.

Before testifying in May, Malvo also confessed to shooting two liquor store clerks in Montgomery, Alabama.

Wecht Corruption Trial Postponed (PTR)

By Jason Cato, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, October 11, 2006

The federal public corruption trial of Dr. Cyril H. Wecht will not begin next week as scheduled.

DOJ_NMG_0078894

U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab released the jury pool of nearly 300 people, effectively postponing the Oct. 16 trial start date indefinitely.

At issue is whether the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court in Philadelphia will remove Schwab from the case. Wecht's lawyers have asked the court to disqualify Schwab, saying he has exhibited bias against their client by having secret communication with prosecutors and through a number of rulings against Wecht.

The judge and prosecutors have denied the allegations.

Wecht, 75, of Squirrel Hill, was charged in January with 84 counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and theft of honest services. He is accused of using his public office while Allegheny County coroner for private financial gain.

The appeals court has been asked to decide whether internal disciplinary records of the lead FBI agent in the case should be made public and whether a federal court rule in Pittsburgh that keeps lawyers from speaking to the media is constitutional.

There is no deadline for the appeals court to make a decision.

A three-judge panel heard arguments Sept. 12 and issued a stay of Wecht's trial three days later.

Jason Cato can be reached at jcato@tribweb.com or 412-320-7840.

Wecht Trial Delayed While Attorneys Wait For Appeals Court Ruling (AP)

By Joe Mandak

AP, October 11, 2006

PITTSBURGH - Former Allegheny County coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht's federal corruption trial has been postponed indefinitely because an appeals court has yet to rule whether a judge is biased and should be removed from the case.

The order canceling jury selection, which was to have begun next Monday, was issued Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Arthur Schwab.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month ordered all pretrial proceedings halted until it rules on Schwab's alleged bias and other issues. Wecht's attorneys contend Schwab has favored prosecutors in his rulings; the judge has threatened to hold a contempt hearing for defense lawyers after the trial.

Federal prosecutors in Pittsburgh say Wecht used his county staff to do work and otherwise help his multimillion-dollar private pathology practice. Wecht is also accused of trading cadavers for lab space at a local college, and overbilling private clients using faked limousine bills for trips in which he was allegedly chauffeured by county employees in a county car.

Wecht's attorneys appealed to the 3rd Circuit after Schwab upheld FBI searches for Wecht's records and computers. Defense attorneys had attacked the credibility of the FBI agent who obtained the search warrants, but Schwab overruled some of their objections because he said they were filed too late.

Wecht is a renowned pathologist who has consulted on high-profile deaths including those of Elvis Presley and JonBenet Ramsey and, most recently, the son of former Playboy model Anna Nicole Smith. He resigned from county office in January after he was indicted on charges of theft of honest services, mail fraud and wire fraud.

Colma Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Corruption (BCNW)

Bay City News Wires, October 11, 2006

COLMA A Colma city councilman facing public corruption charges was arraigned Tuesday morning in San Francisco federal court.

Philip J. Lum, 53, pleaded not guilty before a U.S. Northern District Court judge to charges he failed to report gifts accepted from the owner of a Colma casino in exchange for voting favorably on City Council matters that benefited the casino.

A federal grand jury in San Francisco indicted Lum on Oct. 3 on one count of conspiracy to commit mail fraud and two counts of mail fraud. If convicted, Lum faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and fines of $250,000 for each count, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

The charges came after a three-year FBI investigation revealed that Lum, who has been on the Colma City Council since 1986, accepted first-class and coach airline tickets to the Philippines from 1999 until 2001 from the owner of Colma's Lucky Chances Casino, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

DOJ_NMG_0078895

The indictment alleges that Lum didn't notify the state of the gifts as required annually by the Fair Political Practices Commission and took part in City Council action in favor of the casino without revealing his profits, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Lum was released on $100,000 bail and is next scheduled to appear in federal court in San Francisco in front of U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White on Dec. 7.

Colma City Manager Diane McGrath said she did not know if the City Council was planning to take any action on the matter, or whether Lum would be at the next City Council meeting, scheduled to take place Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. at the Colma Town Hall.

Figure In Pay-to-play Scandal Sentenced To Probation (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 11, 2006

A Philadelphia architect who participated in a pay-to-play scheme in which $30,000 from a corporation was illegally funneled toward Mayor Street's reelection was sentenced to two years' probation yesterday.

The case is part of a continuing FBI investigation into corruption at Philadelphia International Airport and is related to federal authorities' City Hall probe.

The architect, Terry Crockett, had pleaded guilty to conspiracy and fraud and had helped authorities make a case against two codefendants.

"There's no excuse for allowing friendship and the need to sustain your business to [make you think] you are above the law," Crockett told U.S. District Judge James T. Giles. "This I am very sorry for."

Crockett, 61, generated bogus paperwork for $30,000 worth of architectural services submitted to the victim corporation, Sky Sites Inc., which hoped to continue an airport advertising contract. Sky Sites is a subsidiary of JCDecaux, which specializes in indoor, back-lit advertising displays in airport terminals throughout the world.

After Sky Sites paid Crockett, he gave $10,000 each to consultant Joseph Moderski and Eric Selby, a former vice president of Sky Sites. The three men then each gave $10,000 to a political action committee controlled by Ronald A. White, a chief Street supporter.

It is against state law for corporations to make campaign contributions.

Moderski, Selby and Joseph Evans, former Sky Sites chief executive, have all pleaded guilty and are to be sentenced in January.

White, indicted with former City Treasurer Corey Kemp in a much larger conspiracy case, died before trial.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan L. Markman told Giles yesterday that although Crockett's offense was serious, it was Moderski who proposed the idea, "and the others went along it." Crockett deserved credit for confessing and helping the government, she said.

The advisory federal sentencing guidelines called for a sentence of probation to six months in prison.

Crockett's lawyer, Joel Slomsky, said that "what occurred in this case was an aberration."

"He should have known better," Slomsky said. "He's tried to do the right thing by correcting his mistake and cooperating with the government."

In sentencing Crockett, Giles compared the architect's conduct to that of someone who skates on a pond he knows is covered with thin ice.

When the ice breaks and the skater plunges in, the judge said, "the water is always deeper than was thought to be the case."

Passwords Jump-started Fumo Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Mario F. Cattabiani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 11, 2006

Last fall, agents on the FBI's public corruption squad faced a problem: They couldn't read encrypted e-mail seized from State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's offices.

DOJ_NMG_0078896

